It must be the purpose of the honorable Senator from Virginia to have the revenues collected either in specie, or in paper equivalent to specie. In either case, the revenues would be received, in every practical sense, in a currency not depreciated, but having a standard value; for it seems to me to be wholly immaterial to the public creditor whether he is paid in gold and silver, or in bank paper convertible on the spot into specie. The difference is more in sound than substance. The bill of the committee looks to the collection of the Government revenues in a perfectly sound currency; and this must be the wish of every Senator present. The bill goes farther: it looks to the keeping of this same revenue from every possible change, so that the same may be disbursed in a currency of an equal value; and this, too, must be the desire of every friend of the Constitution and of the country. The direct effect of this policy would be to raise the standard of local bank paper, and to sustain the credit of such State institutions whose credit merited support.

The Senator from Virginia has alluded to the Conservative party, as he has been pleased to call it, and has given an interesting account of the origin and influence of this political association. I am, Mr. President, very certain that the distinctive name of this party was not conferred at any time by way of odium, either by any individual or by any other political sect. It was a name assumed by themselves; and I am equally certain that the chairman of the Committee on Finance, in the course of his very able speech, did not use the word Conservative, or speak of the party either as small in number or as powerless in influence, or in any offensive sense. I leave that matter, however, with him to settle with the Senator himself.

The distinguished gentleman from Virginia has given to the Senate, in the course of this debate, many happy and appropriate quotations from ancient as well as from modern literature. He has made allusions, from his extensive reading, to a historical fact, as illustrative of the peculiar position and destined influence of the political party to which he professes to belong. He has told us that, after the battle of Salamis, those who had taken part in that memorable conflict, according to the custom, were required to place upon the altar of Neptune written billets, designating the person who had rendered most service in the battle and was entitled to the highest distinction. Each one wrote first his own name, and a great majority wrote the name of Themistocles as their second choice. That, although the friends of his policy were few in number, yet the friends of both the great systems, now put forth as antagonistical to each other, would prefer his plan to that of their opponents; and thus he expected, as a second choice, to draw to the support of his measure the unanimous vote of the Senate. I pray that the Senator himself may not become, like Themistocles, dissatisfied with this second choice, and, like him, repair to Sparta, and there have awarded to him again the second honors, but that he will, unlike the Athenian general, love Themistocles less and Greece more.

I would apply this historical fact to political life. I would suppose that the much abused occupant of the White House was a candidate for the Presidency. With his known opinions upon the subject of revenue and of currency, he would command the support of the friends of the measure emanating from the Committee on Finance, and now before the Senate. The National Bank party would put forth their favorite candidate, and these two parties combine the great portions of the people; that the advocates of the State Bank deposite system should rally and present their candidate, and, holding in their hands the balance of power, should compel one or the other party to write Themistocles as a second choice, and thus a candidate might be elevated to the Presidency against the known wishes of the American people; would the Senator lend his powerful influence in thus thwarting popular sentiment? I trust not, sir.

This historical allusion is not without instruction, and I hope not without profit. Another battle of Salamis is to be fought. The Persian monarch, in all the magnificence of wealth and of power, is in the field; the liberties of Athens and of all Greece are again assailed; the friends of equal rights, under their "Aristides the Just," will come to the rescue, and deliver their country, and the institutions of their country, from the assaults of this enemy to public and to private liberty.

The great mass of the bank power of the country is now arrayed against the Government, to affect a revolution in public opinion. True it is that the Senator from Massachusetts, on a former occasion, remarked: "That he considered the question of renewing the bank charter as entirely settled. It could not be renewed. Public opinion, he thought, very unfortunately for the country, had decided against it; and while there was a strong and prevailing sentiment in the minds of the community against a measure, it was quite useless to move such a measure. For himself, he should take no part in any attempt to renew the charter of the bank. The people had decided against its continuance, and it must expire. If, while he remained here, there should be a general call of the country for a new national institution, he should, of course, be ready to aid in its establishment. But, for himself, it was his stated purpose to do nothing more, in relation to a National Bank, till a decisive lead should be given in that direction by the public opinion." But it requires no optics keen to see that, in his view, the fit time has come.

I pray to Heaven that there may be no American Themistocles, who may have contributed to elevate the fame, and to establish the liberties of his beloved country, will, like him, desert that country in the day of its danger, and seek protection, like the Grecian Themistocles, with the enemy of his country, and throw himself into the arms of the Persian monarch, and exert the mighty energies of his mind, in conjunction with that enemy, to supplant the institutions of his native land, even should that enemy give him "a Magnesia for his bread, a Myus for his meat, or a Lampsachus for his wine."

I have, Mr. President, noted some of the objections which have been made to the bill reported from the committee, and I have endeavored to answer those objections. There are still other objections which the Senator from Virginia has urged against this measure, which I may have occasion to consider after I shall bestow upon his substitute a passing notice; and in the outset I freely admit, that it must have required no inconsiderable degree of moral courage to bring forward, at this calamitous period of our history, a measure intending practically to revive a system which has been the fruitful source of the calamities which, as a nation and as individuals, we are now suffering. I purpose to examine the details of the proposed amendment, in order to show that, so far from its being any improvement of the bill of 1836, it is more objectionable; that it throws around the State deposite banks (which, under this amendment, are to be selected) no sufficient guards for the safe-keeping of the public funds, but commits to their custody the whole revenues of the Government, relying on the honor and integrity of these depositories for the forthcoming of the people's money.

I have, with as much time and attention as I could devote to the consideration of this substitute, examined it in its various details, and I must confess that I have not yet been able to understand some of its provisions, when comparing them with the existing provisions of the act of June 23, 1836. It is perfectly apparent, from the phraseology of the fourteenth section of this amendment, that the Senator from Virginia does not contemplate a total repeal of the act of 1836. That section is in these words: "That all acts and parts of acts coming within the purview of this act, are hereby repealed."

The first section of the amendment declares: "That the number of banks authorized by the act of June 23, 1836, to be employed as depositories of the public money, shall not exceed twenty-five—to be selected with reference to the wants and convenience of the Treasury in conducting its fiscal operations."

By the first section of the act of June, 1836, the Secretary of the Treasury is required to select for public depositories such of the banks, incorporated by the several States, and by Congress for the District of Columbia, or by the Legislative Councils of the respective Territories for the said Territories, as may be located at, or convenient to, the places where the revenue may be collected and disbursed; and in the proviso to said section, it is expressly declared that at least one deposite bank shall be selected in each State and Territory, if one can be found in each State and Territory willing to be employed as a deposite bank. I can hardly suppose that the Senator from Virginia intended to prohibit the Secretary from making at least a selection of one bank in each State and Territory; because, in the several States and in each of the Territories, portions of the public revenue are collected and disbursed. In the Territory of Wisconsin, large sums are collected from the sales of the public lands; and in each of the States and Territories more or less of the public money is annually disbursed for the necessary support of the Government, in the payment of its officers, and in the discharge of its liabilities to the public creditors. If, then, sir, the State bank deposite system is to be revived by the express legislation of Congress, I trust that the Senator, if he designs to repeal the act of 1836, will so modify his proposition as to give an undoubted power to select at least one deposite bank in each State and Territory; but if the last section of the amendment only repeals so much of other acts as conflicts with this, it will leave in force the provision authorizing the Secretary of the Treasury to select one bank in each State and Territory; and also, that where there are no banks in States within which the public collections or disbursements require a depository, to make arrangements with a bank or banks in some other State, Territory, or District, to establish an agency or agencies in the States, Territories, or Districts so destitute of banks. And the amendment also leaves in full force the provision which prohibits the Secretary of the Treasury "from suffering to remain in any deposite bank an amount of the public moneys more than a sum equal to three-fourths of the amount of its capital actually paid in."

It certainly may be questioned if the Senator contemplated an entire and unqualified repeal of the deposite act of June, 1836, whether this important restriction of suffering to remain in deposite any more of the public money than a sum equal to three-fourths of the capital stock of the deposite banks, can even apply to the twenty-five banks to be selected. If the Senator designs his substitute as a mere addition to the deposite act of June, 1836, many of the difficulties which now occur to my mind, regarding the amendment as a new and independent system, would be avoided.

The second section of the honorable Senator's amendment contains substantially the third and fifth sections of the act of June, 1836, with one essential addition, that the fifth section of the old law prohibited the Secretary of the Treasury from selecting or continuing any bank as a deposite bank, which shall not redeem its notes and bills on demand with specie. The second section of the substitute extends the prohibition to all banks which shall not pay all demands against it promptly in specie, when required. The third section of this amendment is entirely new, so far as it goes to require the resolution of both Houses of Congress to give effect to any selection of a deposite bank, which the Secretary may think proper to make. This provision is intended by the honorable Senator to check Executive usurpation, and to control Executive patronage.

But this particular provision is not only most extraordinary in its character, but unprecedented in the history of our legislation. The Executive branch of the Government, in relation to all appointments of the highest responsibility, is required to present them for the confirmation of the Senate. From the first judicial officer in our country, down to that of a deputy-postmaster, whose annual receipt shall exceed a thousand dollars, the Senate of the United States, under the Constitution and the law, alone has power to control Executive nominations. The collectors of your revenue, the receivers at your land offices, the treasurers of your mints, can only be appointed with the advice and consent of the Senate of the United States. But under this amendment, the places where these collectors and receivers shall make deposite of the public money, must be selected by the Executive, not only with the advice and consent of the Senate, but with that also of the House of Representatives. Here is a new addition to the appointing power. The popular branch of our Government is to be clothed with Executive authority. That branch nearest to the people, and which ought, according to the doctrine of the Senator from Kentucky, to originate all important measures of a legislative character, is by this amendment to be clothed with power to execute the law. The Senate and House of Representatives is to become not only the law making power, but in conjunction with the Secretary of the Treasury, the law executing power.

I cannot, Mr. President, give to this proposition my support. To my mind it is extremely objectionable, and calculated to produce great embarrassment and confusion. I would ask the Senator from Virginia, (in the event of his substitute becoming the law of the land,) that if the Secretary should select the Manhattan Bank, in the city of New York, as a deposite bank, and Congress should be in session, and the Senate, by its resolution, approve, and the House should disapprove, of the selection—suppose that this selection should become matter of a protracted discussion, what is to be done with the public money collected in that city in the interim? Suppose that the politics of New York should not happen at the time to pass current in the popular branch of the Government, and that no selection could be made in that city of a deposite bank, which would receive the approbation of the House of Representatives, what would be done with the public money under such circumstances? Suppose that precisely the same thing should happen to any selection of a deposite bank in the city of Baltimore, what would the honorable Senator have done with the public money collected and disbursed at those places where "the wants and convenience of the Treasury in conducting its fiscal operations" would seem to demand the deposite of a portion of the public money? I can tell the Senator what might happen; for it will be observed that he has not located his twenty-five deposite banks. They are to be located, in effect, wherever the Senate and the House of Representatives conjointly shall determine. The action of the two Houses might compel the Secretary of the Treasury to select deposite banks in the city of Philadelphia, to the exclusion of the banks of the cities of New York and Baltimore. Let there be a majority of the House of Representatives or of the Senate opposed to the Executive; let there be a Senate and a House of the same political character as distinguished those bodies in the session of Congress in 1833 and 1834, and what could prevent the selection of the Bank of the United States chartered by the State of Pennsylvania, with its branches established, and to be established, as the exclusive depositories of the public money. I know that the Senator from Virginia could not have had that purpose in his mind at the time he prepared the amendment which he has presented. But it has occurred to my mind that the adoption of this third section of the Senator's amendment may lead, for all practical purposes, to the recharter of the Bank of the United States. That it may lead, and in all probability will lead, to give full employment to that institution, its branches, and to those agencies which shall be established in the several States and Territories under its authority, and by its sanction. The moment, sir, that I heard the Senator from Massachusetts say that he should prefer the State bank deposite system—that he should prefer any thing, or even nothing, to the bill reported by the Committee on Finance—sentiments directly conflicting with opinions expressed by him at the extra session of Congress, when nothing was so objectionable to his mind as this State bank deposite system; and the moment I read this third section of the amendment proposed by the Senator from Virginia, I could not but imagine that, when the Senator from Massachusetts gave utterance to his opinion, that he must have been perfectly aware of the true import and tendency of this third section. Sir, would not the honorable Senator from Kentucky, and the honorable Senator from Massachusetts, the great champions for the establishment of a Bank of the United States, be perfectly satisfied with the adoption of this entire amendment, if they could believe that its adoption would lead to the selection of the present Bank of the United States and its branches as the depositories of the public money? Certainly they would.

It is of no use to talk about renewing the charter of the Bank of the United States, by a direct act of Congress, if, by indirection, the same thing can be obtained. That bank, under its charter from the State of Pennsylvania, has authority to establish branches in other States with their approbation. Establish this State bank deposite system, and no difficulty would be experienced by the bank in multiplying its branches, with the understanding that such branches would control the public deposites which it might be necessary to make in the States where such branches would be established.

Notwithstanding the Senator from Massachusetts said, in this hall, in February, 1835: "That he considered the question of renewing the bank charter as entirely settled; that the people had decided against its continuance, and it must expire." Notwithstanding this frank and full declaration, the Senator will now come to the support of the amendment of the Senator from Virginia; which, if I can comprehend the signs of the times, may lead, for all practical purposes, if the proposed amendment should be adopted, to a renewal of the Bank of the United States. The capital of that bank will give to it a perfect control over State institutions, will enable it to resume specie payments at its pleasure, and to keep down other local banks.

I am, sir, utterly opposed to this third section of the amendment; its adoption will, in practice, lead to great embarrassment in the safe-keeping of the public funds, and stands opposed to that policy which seeks the re-establishment of the currency sanctioned by the Constitution and the early enactments of Congress.

Mr. President, when the Senate adjourned, I was considering the details of the amendment proposed by the Senator from Virginia, to the bill reported from the Committee on Finance. I had stated my objections to the provisions of the first and third sections. I will now proceed to state other objections to this substitute.

The sixth section of the amendment is obnoxious to this objection. It is not imperative. It says it shall be lawful for the Secretary of the Treasury to enter into contracts in the name, and for and on behalf of the United States, with the said banks so selected and employed, whereby the said banks shall stipulate to do and perform the several duties and services prescribed by this act." It is a little remarkable, that in no part of the amendment is it made imperative upon the Secretary, either to deposite the money, or to make contracts with the deposite banks to be selected.

It is a matter left after all to the discretion of that officer. I am opposed to it on that ground, after what has taken place—after the entire failure of the deposite banks to perform the offices and duties which they stipulated to perform; I am unwilling to leave this matter of deposites, and of making contracts, to the discretion of any officer. I would plainly and explicitly point out his duty. I would make every part of the law imperative upon those charged with its execution.

The eighth section contains an entirely new provision, and its execution would be altogether impracticable, if I rightly understand its requirements. The object of the Senator from Virginia is, undoubtedly, to check over-issues, and thereby to preserve in better security the public funds. But does not the Senator know that it is the policy of banks, whenever they make an issue of their paper, to ascertain where this emission is to be paid out? and how remote from the bank it is to be put into circulation? A bank in the city of Boston is applied to for a discount of fifty thousand dollars. Suppose it to be one of the favored twenty-five: it makes the discount upon the agreement that the bills shall be put in circulation in the county of Hancock, in Maine, or in the county of Franklin, in Vermont, or in the county of Coos, in New Hampshire, what banks in the vicinity, by reason of this discount, would necessarily have transactions with the deposite banks, requiring a settlement as often as once a week? It is not the good and convertible paper of other banks, (that any deposite bank may have on hand,) which puts it in jeopardy. Such a description of means adds to its strength. The hazard, the exposure, and the whole danger, consists in the amount of its own paper circulation, and this section will prove altogether inefficient in restraining that circulation, or confining the receipt of its paper to banks in the immediate vicinity. There is no occasion to require a deposite or any other bank to exchange the paper of other institutions for specie. Every well conducted bank will always be prompt to get rid of the paper of other banks, in order to be prepared to meet its own liabilities.

The ninth section of the substitute I do not consider objectionable, if this State deposite system is again to receive the legal sanction of Congress.

I would ask the honorable Senator from Virginia to inform me, under his tenth section, what is there to prevent the President of the United States from issuing another Specie circular, requiring that all the revenues shall be thereafter collected in gold and silver? There has been, sir, so much clamor, so much complaint for that act of the late Executive, which, at the time and under the circumstances, was most patriotic and praiseworthy in its conception, and most salutary and useful in its operation, that I could not have supposed that the Senator from Virginia would have again left this matter to Executive discretion.

Let us, for a moment, examine the tenth section of the Senator's amendment. It provides that the revenues of the United States shall be collected and received in gold and silver, or in Treasury notes, or in the notes of banks which are payable and paid on demand in the legal coins of the United States; similar in its provisions, in this particular, to the joint resolution of April, 1816; and as that resolution has already received a construction—as from that period to the present it has not been considered as absolutely imperative upon the Government to take the notes of specie-paying banks in payment of its revenue—what is there, under this section, to prevent the President of the United States issuing a circular, directed to all collectors and receivers, to collect and receive the revenues exclusively in coin? There is nothing. The election, as to the kind of money to be required, is confided to the officers of the Government. If the Senator intends, by the terms of this section, to make it the bounden duty of receivers to take paper money, why not say so, instead of using the precise phraseology of the resolution of April, 1816?

The remaining sections, in the substitute proposed, do not materially change the existing provisions of the act of June, 1836, and the existing provisions of other acts, in relation to the denomination of paper money in which any debt due to the United States shall be received.

This, Mr. President, is the substitute which the honorable Senator from Virginia proposes to the bill reported from the Committee on Finance; and I would ask whether this substitute ought to find favor in this body? Is it justly entitled to favorable consideration in any quarter? At a time like this, when, by one fell swoop, the local banks of our country are involved in an universal bankruptcy—when, with but few honorable exceptions, these State institutions, selected as the depositories of the public money, have either refused to fulfil their engagements to the Government, or have wholly disregarded those engagements for the last nine months—when not only the Government, but every class of our community, is suffering great embarrassment, and is subject to severe pecuniary loss, by the failure of these local banks to redeem their pledges—I say, at a time like this, to bring forward such a proposition, is, to my mind, matter of astonishment. The events which have recently transpired in one of the cities of this Union, should induce the honorable gentleman to pause before he urges his amendment, and should induce every member of this Senate to pause long before he adopts this amendment. Every bank, with the exception of one in the city of Boston, selected as a depository of the public money, has failed, acknowledging itself unable to redeem its paper and to fulfil its obligations to the people. That one, which has breasted the storm unmoved, has long since paid to your order every dollar of your money it had in charge. That one never could have wanted the aid of the public deposites; and, when it received the public funds, was not thereby compelled to depart, in the management of its concerns, from its high and responsible duty to the Government.

But the recent failures of State institutions has not been confined to the deposite banks in the city of Boston. I might name others in that city which had never been selected as the fiscal agents of the Government, that have entirely failed to fulfil their promises. Banks not only having no connection with the Government, but under the direction of men in no respect friendly to the Administration, are no longer classed and numbered with the congregation of living, solvent, and responsible State institutions. And, sir, can it be that the Senator from Virginia is prepared to revive that union between the State banks and the Government of his country which has proved so disastrous in its consequences? It may be well, sir, to trace the history of that connection between the Government and the banks. The public money was withdrawn from the Bank of the United States in 1833, and since that period, and up to January 1, 1837, the Government funds were kept in deposite in certain local banks, selected by the Secretary of the Treasury for that purpose. On the first day of January, 1837, but a little more than three years after State banks had been selected as public depositories, more than forty millions of dollars were then held in deposite by the selected State institutions. On that day, after a deduction of five millions, one-fourth part of the remainder, under the act of June, 1836, was required to be deposited with the States; another fourth was required to be transferred on the first day of April following; and another fourth on the first of July then next; and yet, sir, such was the severe operation of this process of transfer, as required by the act of June, 1836, added to the other existing liabilities of the banks, that an universal suspension of specie payment was resorted to as indispensably necessary to prevent their utter prostration. This catastrophe, like a raging tempest, involved in one general bankruptcy not only the pet banks of the Government, but every other bank of the country, with here and there an exception.

The effects upon the community of that explosion are too fresh in our minds to require recapitulation. Every section of our country, and every class of our citizens, are now suffering under the effects of that event. And shall we not profit from this lesson of experience? Is the Senator prepared, in the midst of all this ruin and devastation, to recommend again this State bank deposite system? as a system convenient for the Government in the management of its fiscal operations, or indispensably necessary for the general prosperity and success of the people? This suspension of specie payment happened on the first of May last, a little more than ten months after the passage of the deposite act of 1836; and at that time the deposite banks held of the public money more than thirty-seven millions of dollars. It is true that nine millions of this sum was transferred to the States on the first of July thereafter. The Senator from Virginia need not be informed of the constant embarrassment and difficulty which the Administration has since experienced in collecting and controlling this portion of the public money. He need not be informed of the odium which has attached to the Government, by the delays to which it has been compelled to resort for want of these very means. The Senator need not be informed that more than four millions of this amount, under the indulgent provision of the act of the last session, has been put beyond the control of the Executive for many months yet to come. And I would ask if these are considerations which should induce the Senate, at this time, to regard with favor the proposition of the Senator from Virginia? The amendment proposed contemplates an union with a moneyed power independent of, and irresponsible to, the Government and the people; an union which puts the whole funds of the country at the mercy of these soulless corporations.

This, sir, is but an imperfect sketch of the character and tendency of the substitute proposed by the Senator from Virginia to the bill reported from the Committee on Finance. I cannot, for one, agree to the revival of a system which sad experience teaches has brought upon the Government nothing but pecuniary embarrassment; upon the banks, suspension and failure; upon the people, disaster and distress.

Such, Mr. President, is the character, the object, and the details of the measure proposed by the honorable Senator from Virginia; a measure which would make it obligatory upon the Government to deposite its funds with State institutions over which the Government has no control, with the creation of which the Government had no concern; a measure which would compel the Government to yield up the public funds—the money of the American people—to the exclusive management of local banks; to mingle the revenues of the country with the revenues of State corporations, whose whole business and object is advancement and profit; to subject the capital of the Government to all the hazards of banking operations.

The late colleague of the honorable Senator, while the bill to continue the charter of the United States Bank was under consideration, remarked that "the recent disclosures have convinced me that a broader metallic basis than now exists, is absolutely necessary to sustain our extended system of bank credit and bank paper currency; and I can readily see that this may be partially effected by State or Federal legislation." This important object the proposed amendment is calculated to defeat. This important object the bill is intended to accomplish.

The Senator from Virginia has intended so to draw his amendment, as to exempt it from the odious objection "that it tends to increase Executive patronage." Take the deposite act of 1836, and can any one say that the power therein conferred upon the Executive, does not necessarily secure ten times the influence and the patronage which the bill reported from the Committee on Finance secures? The whole power of selecting the banks of deposite in every State and Territory of this Union for the safe-keeping of the public money, is expressly vested in the Executive. That act gave to him the disposition and control of all the public money, which shall come into the hands of collectors and receivers. The whole amount of the revenues of the Government may be used by the Executive to build up and sustain State institutions favorable to Executive policy

What is Executive patronage, which has been the subject of so much remark? Is it any thing more or less than the power which the Executive possesses by virtue of law, and which power he may exercise to advance his own purposes—to accomplish his own ends?

The Executive has the power to fill the million of offices under this Government by appointment, some with, and some without, the approbation of the Senate. This is an influence which he may exert to carry out his policy. This is Executive patronage. Under the act of 1836, exclusive control is given to him over the funds of the country, so far as to select the places for their deposite, safe-keeping, and disbursement. This is a power which may be exercised to secure a political advantage, or to effect some particular policy; and this is Executive patronage. And what power has the Executive in relation to this matter, secured to him by the amendment proposed to the bill now before the Senate, by the Senator from Virginia? He has, as he had under the act of 1836, the power of selecting each bank of deposite; but it is true that such a selection is to have no effect until it shall be approved by the resolution of both Houses of Congress. The great source of political power rests in the people; and the exercise of that power, which shall elevate to the Presidency any individual, will ordinarily secure a Senate and a House of Representatives in perfect accordance with the Executive. If such should be the fact, the Administration power and influence, under the proposed amendment, would be fully equal to the Executive power under the act of 1836, and this same power might be exercised by the Executive and legislative branches of the Government in furtherance of great political objects—to accomplish important political purposes; and this is what I suppose would be called Administration patronage. But should it so happen that there should, for the time, exist no unison of political feeling between the Executive and either branch of Congress, as I have before observed, the selection of the deposite banks would lead to great embarrassment and confusion in the fiscal operations of the Government. How stands this matter under the bill emanating from the Committee on Finance? It seems to me, Mr. President, to be free from the charge "of adding to Executive patronage"—of increasing Executive influence. It is true that some half dozen officers are to be appointed by the Executive, with the approbation of the Senate, to perform duties enjoined by the bill itself; and this is all. The Executive has no power to select a single place for the deposite of the public money. He has no authority, in any way, or in any manner, to control a single dollar of the Government funds under this bill. He is entirely bereft of all the power, the patronage, the influence, secured to him by the act of 1836, and again proposed to be conferred by the amendment of the Senator from Virginia. What power has the Executive over the public money more than he enjoyed during the existence of the Bank of the United States? Not any.

Not a dollar then could be, nor can a dollar under this bill be, drawn from the Treasury but in consequence of appropriations made by law Here, then, is the beginning and the end of the Executive patronage, as secured by this bill. In the necessary execution of the measure, there is no power in the Executive to select places for the deposite of the public money—there is no power in the Executive to control the public funds—they are put beyond the reach of any officer of the Government; the bill itself makes it a high misdemeanor for any officer to make use of the public money for any purpose whatever, and subjects offenders to the severe but just punishment of fine and imprisonment. Talk not, then, of the increased patronage of the Executive, by way of objection to this bill; there is not a public act upon your statute-book which is not as obnoxious to the charge "of increasing Executive patronage" as the bill before us. If the proposed measure should become a law, it must be executed; but how or where the Executive can possibly derive any political advantage by its execution, I have not been able to discover. The bill authorizes the Executive not only to appoint Receivers General, but it also gives authority for the appointment of commissioners, to make examinations periodically, as the Secretary shall direct; and it also provides for the employment of clerks, not exceeding the number of ten, and at a salary not exceeding for each eight hundred dollars. How, then, is the appointment of four Receivers General, the occasional employment of a few commissioners to examine into the doings of these public officers, and the permanent employment, also, of ten clerks, requiring in the whole the probable annual expenditure of twenty-five thousand dollars, giving to the Executive of this Government such an increase of patronage and official influence as even to put in jeopardy the continuance of our free institutions?

If, sir, the bill now before the Senate is not obnoxious to any stronger and more substantial objections, then indeed may the committee consider themselves peculiarly fortunate in presenting for consideration so perfect and so faultless a measure.

The Senator from Virginia, in presenting his amendment, has looked to the benefit it would confer upon the local banks. I will not say that he had a single eye to the interest of those institutions—that, in submitting his proposition, relief to them from existing embarrassment was his exclusive purpose. But those of us who were favored with the opportunity of hearing his able argument, cannot doubt that this was an important item in the account. It may be well to examine this matter. Will the adoption of the proposed amendment afford to the local banks any substantial relief, or give to them any permanent protection? Will it yield to the sound and responsible moneyed institutions of the States any essential, any desirable benefit? No, sir—no. I have satisfied my own mind, from the best reflection which I could give to this measure, that the contemplated re-union between the Government and the banks, as proposed, is an event not to be wished for by those banks who would consult their own true interest, and the true interests of their customers. That this connection is opposed to that steady and regular course of operation, which distinguishes the business transactions of every solvent and well regulated banking institution in our country.

I will present to the Senate my own views, my own reflections, with reference to this particular matter. My proposition is, that the sound banks of the States will derive no advantage from the connection—by mingling their funds with the funds of the Government, by an unrestrained use of those joint funds in their banking operations.

The first idea which must occur to every mind is, that the great uncertainty as to the amount of the public funds which may remain in deposite, and the great uncertainty as to the duration of the public deposites, renders all appropriation of the Government funds to the use of the deposite banks, a most hazardous and dangerous operation to the banks themselves.

If, Mr. President, a selected bank should receive, in general deposite of the public funds, one hundred thousand dollars at a given day—no intimation, no suggestion, when the deposite would be withdrawn—the fact must be wholly unknown to the department charged with the custody and disbursement of the public funds. No man can foresee what sums may be required, and when they may be wanted, to carry on the operations of the Government in pursuance of the general appropriations made by Congress—no public officer can judge at what particular period a portion of the public funds may be required even to meet a special appropriation. The time of making these general and special expenditures depends upon a thousand contingencies, wholly without the control of the Treasury Department.

This sum, then, thus deposited, may remain months uncalled for; it may be demanded within a single week. The bank, however, tempted by the love of gain, will proceed at once to discount upon the strength of this deposite. Any man conversant with banking operations, must admit that such would be the practice. It is one of the sources of profit which invariably enters into the calculation of those charged with the direction of these institutions. What are the amount of deposites on hand? to what extent can these deposites be safely used? are questions which are submitted to and determined by every board of bank directors; and the uncertainty as to the continuance of Government deposites, to which I have referred, would not deter the managers of these banks to extend their line of discounts to the full amount of the deposite. This has been the lesson of experience taught us from recent connection with these institutions. These are facts confirmed by the observation of men conversant with the subject. What, then, would be the effect of such a proceeding upon the banks, if the Government should call for the sum in deposite within a single week after the deposite shall have been made? The bank has loaned to its customers the one hundred thousand dollars, upon its usual terms, and upon the strength of this very deposite. The bank must, however, meet the draft; it has the money of the Government; it cannot, without dishonor, shift its responsibility. Its course is plain; payment is demanded, and payment must be made.

Will any one say to me, that the case I have stated, would tend to advance the interests of the bank? Would it not necessarily bring upon the institution certain embarrassment—would it not so increase its ordinary liabilities, as to expose its own credit to hazard? Banks must depend on public confidence for their support. Their credit rests on popular opinion, and a single failure to meet with the utmost promptness and punctuality a liability, would awaken suspicion—excite doubts and fears—produce a panic, and prostrate the institution. In the case I have supposed, the means of the bank may be undoubted; its perfect ability to meet ultimately every engagement may be unquestioned; but the sudden and extraordinary contraction of its circulation to the amount of a hundred thousand dollars, is of itself a circumstance well calculated to create distrust. The bank must incur an actua loss in the case I have stated. And so great is the uncertainty in amount and in time which must inevitably attend all Government deposites, that no well conducted bank, regarding its own interests and the interest of its friends, would desire a revival of that policy.

I cannot, sir, more perfectly illustrate my own views upon this subject, than by referring to the course and conduct of the banks selected, under the act of 1836, in the city of Boston, as the safe depositories of the public money; and it seems to me that the effects of this system, as manifested by the transactions of those institutions, should deter the Senate at once from giving new life to this policy. I have said, sir, that the State bank deposite system is of no practical advantage to sound and responsible institutions. Take the Merchants Bank. Its character, being one of the selected institutions in the city of Boston as a public depository, has been such as to command the public confidence, and to maintain a high credit in the commercial community. That bank received, safely kept, and faithfully disbursed, the public money committed to its charge. It possessed a substantial capital of a million and a half of dollars; not a bloated, unreal and fictitious capital. Its directors were men of character and of business. Feeling the deep responsibilities of the trust committed to them, and with a steady regard to the safety of the community, the Government, and the bank itself, they faithfully discharged that trust. In the course of the few months during which the deposite act of June, 1836, was in practical operation, this bank might have received from $100,000 to $300,000 of the public money in deposite. It undoubtedly intended to use those funds to their advantage, and it undoubtedly did put every dollar out on loan. But, sir, it did all this with the full knowledge that this amount of the public money stood charged for the payment of the public dues; and that the resources of the bank were not only sufficient, but would be required to meet the drafts of the Government, should those who had been accommodated with the loan of this public money fail to refund in season. The fact was so—the sum in deposite was loaned—the loans remained—but the drafts of the department have been paid with the utmost punctuality, and the last return from the Secretary of the Treasury shows that not a single dollar of the public money now remains in that bank in deposite. And, Mr. President, if you will put the question to the board of directors, they will tell you that the deposites which have been made of the public money with the Merchants Bank has been a curse rather than a blessing to the institution—a detriment rather than a benefit; that they have given embarrassment rather than relief.

And if there could be here exhibited an exact balance sheet, it would be found that the pecuniary interests of that bank had not been subserved by this deposite system. That institution, and no other institution equally well conducted, can want the aid of the Government funds. If there is not a sufficiency of bank capital for the commerce, the trade, and the business of Boston, there has been heretofore no want of a disposition to create bank capital. But, even if the fact were so, that it would be a matter of convenience to the business of Boston to control the use of the public funds, is there any man here so regardless of his public duty, who would make a disposition of the public funds to promote such an object? Is there any member of this Senate, under such circumstances, would feel himself ready and willing to transfer any portion of the people's money, against their will, for the convenience or interest of any particular class of the community? I trust not sir.

It is well known that there were three other banks selected in the city of Boston as depositories. I allude to the Franklin, the Hancock, and the Commonwealth Banks. And where are these institutions now? The late public journals have told their fate.

It is perfectly true that irresponsible institutions, trembling and failing banks, may be for a time sustained by foreign aid. An individual who, by over-trading and extravagance, sensibly feels the heavy hand of embarrassment, may for a time be relieved by the interposition of a friend; and I am free to admit that these three selected banks might, and probably did, receive temporary relief from the public deposites. They are the very class of banks that would receive aid and support through the agency of the Government funds. But that support would be only for a time. It would only put off the evil day. That day of reckoning must come. It has already come; and their story is matter of history. I would ask the honorable Senator from Virginia whether these are the kind of State institutions which he would wish to favor? whether these are the banks he would wish to benefit by his amendment?

I must, Mr. President, pursue this subject further. This shows the fatal result of our own experience under the act of 1836, and which the amendment is intended to revive. It is these practical results, these lessons of experience, which cannot fail to enlighten the public mind as to the true character and effect of this State deposite system, and to show the inevitable necessity of some such measure as has been proposed by the committee.

The Franklin Bank, as I have stated, was one of the selected banks, and did receive a portion of the public money in deposite; but I am happy to inform the Senate that, through the vigilance of the head of the Treasury Department, not a dollar will eventually be lost. My present object is to how that it is not always safe to rely upon the official returns of these institutions. This bank was selected by the Secretary from its presumed condition, as exhibited by its official returns, as well as by the force of public sentiment.

The committee appointed by the Legislature of Massachusetts to examine into the doings of the Franklin Bank, have given to the public their report; and, if that committee have correctly reported the facts, they ought to induce every honest man in the community, and every true friend of his country, to use his influence in effecting, without delay, an entire separation between the Government and the State banks.

"The cashier, B. F. Hathorne, declared before the committee, that the books of the bank did not show its actual condition—that they WERE FALSE IN ALL IMPORTANT PARTICULARS, and that the return of 1836 WAS FALSE—that, while by the return it appeared that the amount of loan was $299,284, the actual loan was nearly $370,000—that while the return showed $134,207 as the amount of bills in circulation, the actual amount was near $234,000—and that while by the return, as well as the books of the bank, the amount of post notes out was given at $37,500, the actual amount was $42,000. Hathorne further testified, that this return was designedly false, that it might show a better condition of the bank than was actually true—that he swore to the truth of the return, knowing it to be false, and that THE DIRECTORS WHO SIGNED IT AND SWORE TO ITS CORRECTNESS MUST HAVE KNOWN IT TO BE FALSE."

[Mr. CLAY here inquired what connection there was between the Secretary of the Treasury and this officer of the bank.] I will, Mr. President, with great pleasure, answer the inquiry made by the Senator from Kentucky, as I have no doubt that the answer will give him great personal satisfaction. The Cashier of the Franklin Bank, at the time these monstrous frauds were committed, and these gross impositions were practiced, was no more related to or connected with the Secretary of the Treasury, than he was with the Senator himself. It is perfectly true, that a brother-in-law of the Secretary had been since appointed to the office of cashier of that institution; but he continued in that office for only a period of two months, when he probably determined that a regard to his own reputation, should induce a dissolution of all his connection with that bank.

Entirely different is the return from the Merchants Bank, made I presume by gentlemen well known to the Senator from Massachusetts, with one of whom I have been long acquainted, and who sustains a high character for moral worth, and for business habits.

The report says "that they find the bank to be in a very safe and good condition," and it shows a surplus beyond its liabilities of more than two hundred thousand dollars. It is only from such sifting and thorough examinations, that the truth can be elicited. And it therefore follows, that for the Government to create State banks as its fiscal agents, and to make deposite with them of its public funds, relying for its security on their official returns, made from time to time, is hazardous to the interests, as well of the Government as of the people.

The fact that the General Government has no power over these State institutions; that, by its own authority, it could never bring to light the fraudulent disclosures which have recently met the public eye, should prevent the connection between them and the Government, which the amendment proposes.

The Senator from Virginia has made an appeal to the Senate to guard with vigilance the public funds. He would alarm our fears, by comparing the effect of this bill with that of his substitute in relation to the security and safe-keeping of the revenues of the country. I will, sir, enter most freely and fully into the comparison. And if the public documents contain the truth, the result will show, that not only the Government has experienced much more embarrassment, but has sustained a much greater loss, through the delinquency of State deposite banks, than through the default of public officers. The Senator has stated that within the last two years the Government had lost more than six hundred thousand dollars by the failure of collectors and receivers, and has referred us to House document, No. 111, giving an account of "public defaulters," as containing the most alarming facts and damning proofs of the hazard of this measure. I have with great carefulness examined that document, and as it has been referred to by the Senator from Virginia as the ground work of his particular attack upon the Independent Treasury bill, I must ask the indulgence of the Senate in giving to them the results of that examination. In the first place, I will undertake to show how the Senator must have proceeded in his estimate of the loss which has been sustained within the last two years, through the default of public officers. The whole amount of the reported defaults of the collectors of the revenue, district attorneys, and of all that class of officers immediately connected with the collection of the customs, for the last two years is - - - - $126,822 65

The amount of the reported defaults of the receivers of sales of the public lands within the same period is 476,478 26

The reported amount due from officers of the customs, on account of official emoluments, is - - 11,786 68

Making an aggregate of - $615,087 59

The same document contains explanatory notes, and in almost every instance exhibits the exact state of the accounts between the Government and the reported delinquents. And although the printed tables of the document show this amount of defaults, yet the subsequent pages of the same document most fully and satisfactorily explains this whole matter. My attention had been previously drawn to this subject from having seen in one of the Eastern journals substantially the same statement which is now brought forward by the Senator from Virginia.

"From this list we take the sums which are reported as owing by those officers, which fell due in the years 1836 and 1837 only.

"In the same report we find as debtor or defaulter, 'C. J. INGERSOLL District Attorney, Philadelphia, due 12th January, 1837. $76,491.' We quote the words of the report. If our memory serves us, Mr. Ingersoll has been one of the most vehement declaimers against all banks, and a most thorough going advocate of the Sub-Treasury scheme; for which the Globe has lavishly praised him.

"From a list of Receivers contained in the report, who were out of office on the 12th of October last, whose names and sureties, and the balances standing against them, arising from sales of public lands paid over to them, are given, we take the following amounts, which fell due, by such officers, in the years 1836 and 1837.

"The aggregate sums given in the report, under the two heads of Collectors and Receivers, stated as due from them, amount to some millions. The items we have given above, amount to more than SIX HUNDRED THOUSAND DOLLARS IN THE SPACE OF TWO YEARS ONLY!"

It must be familiar to every member of the Senate how these balances occur against collectors, and those officers charged with the collection of the revenue arising from customs. When they retire from office, they are charged not only with the moneys they may have received, but also with all revenue bonds remaining in their hands. This last item would be discharged at once, by handing over the same bonds to the district attorneys.

Among the items in the first table, and which must go to make up this startling sum of $600,000, is a balance of $76,491, stated to exist against C. J. Ingersoll, the late District Attorney in the eastern district of Pennsylvania; and yet the very document shows that in asserting its claim against Mr. Ingersoll, the Government was only able to substantiate a balance of $3,985 78 against this officer. This course Mr. Ingersoll felt bound to take, to wipe away the odium which had been attached to his official character, by having been charged as a public defaulter. This is not all, sir. It is well known that this same individual is prosecuting his further claim against the Government; which, if allowed, will not only wipe away every dollar of the judgment against him, but leave a balance of thousands in favor of Mr. Ingersoll. So much for this case; and, upon a careful examination of the explanations given in this same document, it will be found that of the $126,822 65, stated to be the sums due from collectors, etc. the Government will not, in any probability, lose a sum equal to ten thousand dollars. The only item which, I think, can be set down as an absolute loss, is the sum of $8,777 25, due from H. Peake, late collector at Alexandria.

And with reference to the recorded defaults of receivers at the various land offices, the balances standing against them, in three-fourths of the cases, will be at once cancelled when their accounts shal be finally settled. In some cases suits have been ordered, and the sums justly due have been secured. And from the information which I have been able to collect, of this sum of $476,533 80, not more than twenty thousand dollars will eventually be lost to the Government.

Among the defaulters, the name of Wiley P. Harris, a late receiver at Columbus, Mississippi, is entered at the sum of $109,178 08; and this item makes up a part of the six hundred thousand dollars which the Government has lost within the last two years through the default of public officers, according to the statement of the Senator from Virginia; and yet the explanatory note shows that this particular demand has, in part, been paid, and the balance perfectly well secured.

In the case of James W. Stephenson, a late receiver at Galena, who is recorded as a defaulter to the amount of $74,859 70, the whole sum is secured to the Government.

In the case of Governor Call, of Florida, who is recorded as a defaulter to the amount of $43,498 54, he is prevented by his public duties from settling this account at the Department, and in cancelling every item of claim.

I would allude to other cases, showing that this document is but a transcript from the books the of Treasury, and that the tables do not exhibit the true state of the accounts between the public officers and the Government. In the case of John Taylor, a receiver at Cahawba, and for the faithful performance of whose duty, my friend from Alabama (Mr. King) was responsible—he stands recorded as a defaulter to the amount of $11,115 20. And yet, in a suit against the administrator to recover this balance, judgment was rendered in favor of the defendant.

Benjamin J. Chambers, late receiver at Little Rock, stands recorded as a defaulter, and yet the money has actually been paid over to the District Attorney; but then these accounts have not actually been settled upon the books of the Treasury, and nothing could be more uncertain and deceptive than to take these tables unexplained as evidence of the state of the accounts between the receivers and the Government. Yet, by a reference to the notes of explanation contained in the same document, and, also, by a reference to the Department itself, information, certain and satisfactory, could be obtained with reference to the recorded list of public defaulters.

[Here Mr. KING gave a history of the case of Col. John Taylor, and Mr. LINN gave a statement of cases within his knowledge, going to confirm the statements made.]

Mr. President, I thank the honorable Senators for the information they have imparted; it shows that the view I had taken was correct. We have no land offices in New England. But it occurred to me that these receivers, holding portions of the public money, must be drawn upon from time to time by the Treasury Department; and that the return of the sales of the public lands would give no certain information as to the true state of the public accounts with those land officers, notwithstanding the accounts are made up at the Department from these very returns. It must, sir, be too severe a tax upon the patience of the Senate to pursue this investigation further. I feel myself warranted in saying, that the whole amount of loss which this Government will sustain since the commencement of General JACKSON'S administration, through the default of officers charged with the collection of the various descriptions of revenue, will not exceed one hundred thousand dollars. And I must also state, as a fact in favor of the bill, that the disbursements of the War Office, in war and in peace, including the disbursements of the Ordnance Department, have all been made for the last twenty years without any loss; and I might add, that from the foundation of the Mint, there has not been a loss of a single dollar.

And how stands the account on the other side? On the first of May last, after anticipating the third instalment to be transferred to the States, there were in the deposite banks over twenty-eight millions of dollars. This sum was charged with the expenditures of the Government, and these expenditures were to be made; contracts had been entered into; the appropriations for specific objects were necessarily applied to those objects; the Government went forward; and notwithstanding the failure of the public depositories, and the control of the public funds was thereby placed beyond the power of the Government, yet the embarrassment, the inconvenience, and the actual loss resulting from such a state of things, must be visited upon the Government; and that loss may be fairly estimated by ascertaining the actual difference between specie and the kind of currency in which the Government was compelled to make its disbursements. That difference has been, on an average, at least five per cent.; and the Government, in making its disbursements, although the public funds were nominally passed at their par value, yet contractors must have calculated for the depreciation in the currency.

In all the supplies made, in all the materials found, and in all the services performed, the difference between a currency equivalent to specie, and a depreciated paper currency, entered into the calculation in determining the value of such supplies, and in fixing the worth of such labor. This difference was indeed a loss then to the Government; and upon the actual sum then in deposite in the selected banks, that loss could not have been less than one and a half millions of dollars. Add to this the vexation and embarrassment which the Government must have suffered by reason of the failure of these public depositories—and, as a further consequential loss, the whole expenses of the late extra session of Congress.

The Senator also has very correctly informed the Senate, that eleven of the selected banks had availed themselves of the indulgences extended to them by the act of the last session. These institutions had in deposite over four millions of the public money. The suspension of specie payments, and the embarrassments of the local banks prevented the importing merchants from meeting their liabilities with promptness and punctuality. The ultimate loss which the Government may sustain by reason of these transactions I will not undertake to estimate. But certain the fact is, that if the balance due from the banks and from the merchants had been promptly paid into the Treasury, the issue of Treasury notes, as provided for at the last session, would have been unnecessary.

The Senator from Virginia will, I think, find that there is much error in the statement that, on a comparison of the losses sustained by the Government through the agency of public officers, with the losses through the agency of banks, that the result would be in favor of the State institutions. Wholly different in my own judgment would be the result of any such comparative view, even during the period of the late and present Administrations of the General Government, when every favor and accommodation was extended to these banks, when they held in deposite all the public funds of the country. But trace the history of our Government from its foundation to the present time, and it will be found that the actual loss sustained by the failure of local banks, and by the depreciation and loss of bank paper, will greatly exceed the amount of loss sustained by the defaults of public officers. The whole loss actually experienced by the Government, including interest, on account of deposites having been made in local banks prior to the commencement of the late State deposite system, exceeds a million and a half of dollars; and the loss sustained through the depreciation of local bank paper in the possession of the Government previous to 1834, could not be less than five millions of dollars. These items form an aggregate of loss quadrupling any loss which the Government, from its commencement, could have suffered through the default of public officers.

The Senator has suggested that the reason why banks afford a greater security, results from the number of their officers—their tellers, cashiers, etc. The Senator is aware, I presume, that the board of directors controls the discount sheet; that they alone have to do with the granting of loans; and if there is a disposition to do what ought not to be done by the acting directors of a bank, the other officers would be unable either to counteract or to expose such transaction. It was the act of the directors of the Commonwealth Bank which gave to their favored associations the use of the whole capital. Nor does the capital of these local institutions furnish any ground of security or of confidence.

The known vigilance, fidelity, and uprightness of the managers of these State institutions, can only inspire confidence and give security. The character and acknowledged responsibility of the customers of a bank, adds much to its credit with the community.

The Senator from Virginia has remarked that by his substitute, every inducement is taken away from the local banks to make use of the public money. If then these institutions are not to derive any advantage by the use of the public funds, for what purpose make the deposite with them? The accommodation the measure will afford to these institutions, has induced the Senator to offer his amendment. And in no way can the interest of the banks be directly promoted, except by appropriating, for a time, to their use and for their benefit, the funds of the Government.

The Senator has remarked that the limitation of local bank capital will check these institutions from imprudently extending their discounts. I can assure the Senator that this fact will afford no sufficient guard. "All banks trade on the average amount of the deposites confided to them, which is ascertained by experience," and as it respects the banks, this very trade upon deposites, whether public or private, has been the source of great embarrassment. It is a most dangerous experiment, and yet it has been done, and will again be done, if opportunity occurs. This trade upon public and private deposites by the banks—this mixing the revenues of the Government with the moneyed means of these corporations—has been the immediate cause of the catastrophe which has befel those institutions, and of the consequent distress which now pervades the country.

The Senator was understood to say that the public money might properly and safely be put out on loan by these deposite banks; that if banks are employed as the fiscal agents of the Government, it would be no more than reasonable to allow them the privilege of using the public money; that such a practice would promote the convenience of the various classes of the community.

In this way, Mr. President, the Senator would most effectually (through the agency of his bill) give directions to the public funds for banking purposes. Although his bill would not, in terms, establish a Government bank, yet the whole pecuniary means of the Government would constitute a "capital" for banks to work upon. This is one of the very evils which the Senator discovered in the bill of the committee—that it went to create a Government bank, and to place the public revenues under the control of the Executive for banking operations; and yet he would deposite those revenues with local banks, with an avowed assent to them to carry on their banking operations by the aid of these public funds. I enter my protest against the whole policy.

The Senator from Virgina urges the adoption of his amendment as a relief measure, and objects to the bill reported by the Committee on Finance, because it is not calculated to afford any relief to the country. That the Government, as calm as a summer's morning, looks out upon the raging storm.

I would desire, Mr. President, to learn from the Senator what relief measure within the competency of Congress, which has not been proposed, can be presented.

The Senator from Massachusets has very distinctly given to the Senate his opinion, that the re-charter of a National Bank can alone regulate the general currency of the country; and that the existing derangement of the currency is the source of the whole evil.

But the Senator from Virginia would not agree to that proposition. What then? A recurrence to the State deposite system for a remedy; the very system which has produced the evil. To go back to the law of 1836, against all the lights of experience which has been cast upon the country.

The Senator says that these State banks have not had a fair trial; that they have been crippled by the acts of the Government; that the distress which now, like a dense cloud, hangs over the land, has been the work of our hands. I have, Mr. President, on a former occasion, answered this statement. It has been said that the Specie Circular was the cause of the suspension of specie payments; and that it was the hostile action of the Government which has produced the pressure which now prevails.

This deposite system had its origin in 1833, and from that time to June, 1836, a few selected banks had the control of all the public deposites. That law was passed, and did it find those deposite banks which had received the public money, prepared to pay over that money agreeable to the provisions of the act of June, 1836? No, sir: no. Every dollar had been loaned; and before the Manhattan Bank, in the city of New York, could comply with the terms of that act; before it could make the transfer of the public money to the new depositories, so as to reduce the sum it held to a sum equal only to three-fourths of its capital stock, it was compelled to make collections of its customers; and the history of the times will show that, with the passage of that act commenced the pressure of the deposite banks.

This was the case with all the banks which had been selected as public depositories previous to 1836. The amount of the Government funds consisted exclusively in the credits of the banks. This act of 1836 was, then, the very first measure which went to impose a check upon the operations of the deposite banks in their extraordinary career. The public money was collected by one set of banks from their customers, and transferred to another set of banks. This operation was, of necessity, peculiarly embarrassing to the old deposite banks; but the language of the act was perfectly explicit. It declared to every new, as well as old deposite bank, that quarter yearly, commencing the first day of January, 1837, the public money then in the Treasury, with the exception of five millions of dollars, was to be transferred to the States. What was their duty? Clearly to be prepared for the crisis; and yet, before the arrival of the period for transferring the third instalment, the banks suspended specie payments.

I can assure the honorable Senator from Virginia that it was not the act of 1836, nor was it the Specie Circular which produced the pecuniary pressure which existed in the autumn of 1836 and the commencement of 1837. There was a pre-existing cause. The evil was beyond the origin of that measure. It was the great extension of individual credit; the most unexampled expansion of a paper circulation, which existed anterior to June, 1836, which furnished an adequate cause for all the pecuniary evils which subsequently occurred. The Specie Circular, then, so far from having an injurious operation, must have tended to check the madness and extravagance of the banking institutions of the country, as well those which held in deposite the Government money as others. It was issued soon after the adjournment of Congress, and before any of the requisitions of the act of 1836 could have been complied with. The operation, then, of this measure was upon those banks which had traded for the two preceding years upon the moneyed capital of the country. The Executive clearly had the right to issue this circular, and to require all payments for the public lands to be made in specie. It was a measure of prudence and discretion, and in its effects beneficial to all well regulated banking institutions.

The Government must have foreseen that a paper currency was literally flooding the country, and as the best evidence of the sagacity of the Executive, this very flood has in less than ten months devastated the whole country. The Executive required for the Government no more of its debtors than an individual had a right to require in his own case—to make payment of the debt in a currency of a standard value, and not in paper subject to depreciation. The Executive, saw with just alarm, that the public lands, one great source of revenue, were rapidly exchanging for bank credits This measure, therefore, seemed to him to be dictated by a high regard to the public interest, and not with a view to harass or oppress the banking institutions of the country.

I have said, sir, the extraordinary expansion of individual credit led to the embarrassment and pressure of the commercial and other classes of the community. There has been exhibited in the business of commerce an extravagant spirit of over-trading.

Take the importations between October 1, 1835, and October 1, 1836, they amount, including those free from duty, and those paying ad valorem and specific duties, to the sum of $189,980,035
Goods, etc. the growth of foreign countries, exported within same period, amount to $21,746,360
The produce of the United States exported in same time, amounted to 106,914,680

Making an aggregate of	128,663,040
Which leaves a balance against us of	$61,316,995

The value of the exports ascertained and estimated for the year ending 30th September, 1837, amounted to $116,906,060, less by nearly twelve millions than was made the previous year. The value of the imports for the same year was $140,852,980, nearly fifty millions less than was imported the preceding year; a fact showing most conclusively the extravagant over-trading in 1836, which governed the commercial portions of the community. The supply was made greatly to exceed the demand.

But this over-trading extended to every class of the community, and to every section of the country. A perfect mania had seized the public mind; and we are now reaping the bitter fruits of that madness. Let us not, then, Mr. President, charge the fruits of our own folly and indiscretion to any act of the Government.

During this debate, we have been repeatedly reminded of the unexampled distress which pervades our common country. We have been most emphatically told that this distress is the work of the Administration; that its measures have involved in one general and sweeping bankruptcy the moneyed institutions of our country; have dried up all the fountains of individual and national wealth; crippled our commerce, trade, and manufactures, and produced an universal prostration of the business and the currency of the Republic. These "ill-boding words" have not for the first time been sounded in our ears. They made up the burden of the Opposition song at the extra session. The press, with its mighty power, has reiterated over and over again these charges against the late and present Administration of our National Government. The public mind has been agitated upon this subject from Maine to Florida. Every argument which the ingenuity of man could devise, has been put forth to produce conviction that the evils which afflict our land are the fruits of the weak and wicked measures of the Administration.

At a late political meeting in Rhode Island, it was

"Resolved, That this most deplorable condition of the country is mainly attributable to the ignorance, the folly, or the wickedness of our rulers."

These charges have been promptly met—boldly and directly controverted—and the issue has been made before the American people. With them I am willing to leave this whole matter. Their deliberate and unprejudiced judgment must be formed, and will be promulgated in a manner not to be misunderstood by their public servants; and, for one, I entertain no doubt what will be that judgment. That there does exist great derangement in the currency—that there does exist a most extraordinary pressure among the various business classes of our community—I shall not deny; the fact is admitted; but I differ—radically and essentially differ—with the honorable Senator from Massachusetts, that these disasters to business and to currency have proceeded from the acts of the Government.

If the fault lies at the door of the Administration—if this universal distress has been produced by those in power—why has not the particular measure of the Administration, chargeable with all these evils, been designated? Why do the honorable gentlemen in the Opposition deal in such general denunciations? Why is not the charge more specific? If the existing pecuniary embarrassment of the country proceeds from the removal of the deposites from the late Bank of the United States, why is it not so alleged? If it results from the refusal of the Government to recharter another national bank, why is not that stated? If the existing pressure and distress, embarrassment and bankruptcy, have been produced by transferring from the local banks the public funds to other places of deposite, why is not the allegation made thus specific? It would be by no means difficult to effectually answer and refute each and all of these allegations; and if, sir, the Administration are, in the opinion of the Senator, chargeable with the existing evils which now pervade our country, why has not a remedy been proposed? Why have not relief measures been presented by those who make these charges? If they believe in the truth of their allegations, it is their bounden duty to offer to the consideration of Congress and of the American people, their plan of relief. They owe this to themselves and to the country. It will not satisfy the intelligence and integrity of the public mind for them to say we prefer the charges, and leave it to the Administration to clear themselves from the imputation. It is well known to the honorable gentleman that these charges have been met, and I trust successfully answered. Gentlemen then are without excuse in remaining passive upon this subject. It is a subject of vital importance to the people; it is a subject affecting every class of our community, and every section of our country.

I ask them, then, to bring forward their plans—their measures for relief. But has such been the disposition of the other side? Has such been heretofore the course of action pursued by those arrayed in this body against the Administration? Far otherwise. Has the honorable gentleman from Massachusetts, who has said much of the constitutional power of Congress over this subject of the currency, and of its imperious duty to exercise that power, recommended any specific and independent measure? I admit, sir, that he has very clearly insinuated what ought now to be done; but this, sir, falls far short of his public duty, entertaining, as he does, and avowing, as he does, opinions as to the cause of the general distress and dismay which overspread the land.

Every measure of relief recommended by the Executive, at the last session, in view of the surrounding difficulties, and every measure reported at that session, by the Committee on Finance, was resolutely opposed as insufficient to meet the crisis and the occasion. This was the course of proceeding then; and what is the indication now? One of a more conciliatory character? One in any way calculated to allay party animosity, or to restore general confidence? No, sir. Opposition was then the order of the day; and the most determined opposition to this bill has already been proclaimed.

The Senator from Massachusetts has declared that he would prefer any thing, he would prefer even nothing, to this measure. And the Senator from Kentucky says "the calamity of a war with the most potent power on earth, would be a blessing to the country compared with it;" and while those gentlemen thus denounce this bill, we have not as yet been favored from them, with any proposition, which, if adopted, would in their own opinion, afford relief to the country.

Mr. President, the Senator from Massachusetts has, with great justice, compared the present condition of the currency of the country to its condition and state immediately subsequent to the close of the last war. And what, sir, I ask was its true condition at that eventful period of our history? It must be fresh in the recollection of every Senator now present, that out of New England a depreciated local bank paper constituted the circulating medium of the country. In the language of the Senator himself, "the immense paper issues had banished specie from circulation." These moneyed institutions, extending from the Hudson to the Mississippi, and from the lakes to the ocean, had literally flooded the country with their irredeemable paper. The system of credit had been carried to its greatest possible extent: an universal suspension of specie payments beyond the limits of New England prevailed. We were then cursed with every description and denomination of depreciated paper. Such a debased medium naturally expelled from circulation every piece of hard money. The Government itself was inevitably involved in great embarrassment in its financial operations. It had been compelled to receive its revenues in this depreciated currency, and was driven to the necessity of making its disbursements in the same currency. We then had a plentiful supply of promises unfulfilled—of corporation pledges unredeemed—of broken banks—of trade embarrassed—and of commerce crippled. And all this evil was entailed upon the country, because, as the Senator from Massachusetts most appropriately remarked:

"There had grown up a currency of paper issued by banks, setting out with the promise to pay gold and silver, which they had been wholly unable to redeem; the consequence was, that there was a mass of paper afloat, which sustained no immediate relation to the legal currency of the country."

This was the state of the currency and of credit—the condition of trade and of commerce then; and is not this a most perfect, exact, and faithful representation of the present state of the currency and of credit—of trade and of commerce? The fact is undeniable. The Senator himself admits it. He made the comparison, and I am free to acknowledge its justice and its accuracy. What, then, was the cause of the calamities—the pecuniary distress—the commercial embarrassments—the bankruptcy and ruin, which pervaded the country in 1816?

It proceeded from an extraordinary and unwarrantable expansion of credit; an over-issue of bank paper, and its consequent depreciation and debasement. These were the causes, and these were adequate causes, for the bankruptcies, both to individuals and corporations, which followed. Like causes will produce like effects. There is no occasion to indulge in speculation on this subject. The man who will look abroad, cannot avoid the conclusion that the evils which now exist in the land are the certain effects of an unwarrantable expansion of the credit system. To this source may be ascribed all the distress and embarrassment which now exist in the commercial, as well as in the other, classes of the community.

It is an undoubted fact, that for a few years anterior to 1816 an immense amount of bank paper had been put in circulation to carry on the war, and to sustain the credit of the Government; and it is equally true that this same amount of paper had been disbursed to the creditors of the Government; and it was the depreciated value of this paper, its irredeemable character, which debased the currency of the country. It was the total inability of the banks to take up this paper which destroyed public confidence, and produced the bankruptcy of the institutions.

These were the true causes which produced the universal distrust and distress which prevaded the country in 1816, and precisely the same causes have operated to produce the same effects in 1837 The great extension of individual credit, a consequent expansion of the paper circulation, has brought upon the country now, the same pecuniary embarrassments which existed then. And what, Mr. President, was the remedy proposed at that time? a National Bank and the joint resolution of 1816. There was then at that time no proposition to make the local banks the depositories of the public money. The great object was to improve the general currency, to resuscitate the State banks, and to secure the public funds, which at that time consisted exclusively of State bank paper, from further depreciation. A National Bank was sustained with great zeal and with great ability, on the goound that, in practice, it would produce a most beneficial influence upon the currency of the country. That it would afford immediate aid to the Government and to the people, and bring into active and useful operation the banking institutions of the respective States. The Senator from Massachusetts then expressed his convictions that a National Bank would not improve the State of the currency.

"It was a mistaken idea, he said, which he had heard uttered on this subject, that we were about to reform the national currency. No nation had a better currency, he said, than the United States—there was no nation which guarded its currency with more care, for the framers of the Constitution, and those who enacted the early statutes on this subject, were hard-money men. They felt, and therefore duly appreciated, the evils of a paper medium; they, therefore, sedulously guarded the currency of the United States from debasement. The legal currency of the United States was gold and silver coin; this was a subject to which Congress had run into no folly. The evil was not to be remedied by introducing a new paper circulation; there could be no such things as two media in circulation—the one credited, the other discredited."

[Mr. WEBSTER here expressed his dissent to the construction which had been given to the speech he delivered in 1816.]

I have, Mr. President, with perfect accuracy, quoted the language which the Senator then used; and I would ask him if he did not then vote against the bill establishing a National Bank? Having spoken against it, and having voted against it, I could not but suppose that his speech and his action was a just expression of his opinion of that measure. But, sir, I will offer another extract from the same speech, as giving a very decided indication of the convictions of his own mind:

"The whole strength of the Government, he was of opinion, ought to be put forth to compel the payment of duties and taxes to the Government in the legal currency of the country."

"In the end the taxes must be paid in the legal money of the country, and the sooner that was brought about the better."

I think the Senator was clearly right. I fully concur with him in the opinions he then expressed, relative to the power of a National Bank over the currency.

It will be recollected, Mr. President, that both of the proposed measures of relief were adopted—a National Bank was chartered, and the joint resolutions of 1816 were passed.

Early in 1817, both of these measures went into practical operation. The effects produced were most disastrous to the State institutions. A resumption of specie payment tested the strength and soundness of every local bank; and it will long be remembered that the uncontrolled and uncontrollable paper issues of these State banks led to their entire prostration.

And the same fate, resulting from the same cause, must have inevitably attended the Bank of the United States in 1819, had it not have been that the moneyed power of this Government was brought to the support of that failing and dangerous institution. And well did the Senator from Massachusetts say that this National Bank was, of itself, unable to rectify the state of the general currency. Admitted, as it is, that the state of the moneyed affairs of the country in 1816 was similar to their condition in 1837, and that the same causes had operated at the different periods to produce the same effects, I would ask, Mr. President, what is now proposed as a remedy for existing evils? First, a United States bank; second, a State deposite system; and thirdly, the bill reported by the committee, providing for the collection, safe-keeping, and disbursement of the public funds. It seems to be very generally conceded that the country is not prepared to receive another national bank; the people have decided against it—so the Senator from Massachusetts has said—and yet the Senator, in his speech recently delivered, has given it as his deliberate opinion, that it is within the constitutional power of Congress to regulate the general currency—to maintain a sound moneyed circulation—and that this great object can be accomplished in no way so satisfactorily, as to establish another National Bank. He differs from the Senator from Virginia, whose strong predilections are in favor of the State deposite system.

If the two Houses of Congress can be said to reflect the opinion of the American people, the fate of a National Bank is hermetically sealed. The Senator from Massachusetts says he does not consider the resolution of the last session as of the least importance, or as any indication of the state of the public mind. On this point the Senator is in error. If I can discern the signs of the times, there is, with the people, a growing and a determined hostility to a National Bank. I then consider tha but two alternatives are now presented as relief measures. The one is the measure emanating from the Committee on Finance, the other is the substitute for that measure, proposed by the Senator from Virginia. The Senator from Massachusetts says he is prepared to take any thing, and even nothing, rather than accept the bill proposed by the committee. And here again, Mr. President, the honorable Senators are not yielding to the force of public sentiment. Experience has decided against a revival of the State bank deposite system. An entire separation of the Government, in the management of its fiscal concerns, from local banks, is demanded by every consideration. The security and proper management of the public funds demand this measure at our hands. A regard to the best interests of the people demands it. The state and condition of the moneyed institutions of the country demand it. A regard to the principles of those "hard money men" who laid the foundation of this extended and extending Republic demands it.

The peace and prosperity which so strikingly distinguished the operations of the people under the first enactments of the Government, requiring the public revenues to be collected and disbursed in gold or silver, speaks loudly in favor of this measure. I would, then, sir, adopt it; and adopt it without delay. There is abroad in the land an extraordinary excitement upon these subjects. The public mind requires repose. This agitating, this embarrassing question, which is now distracting the whole community, should be settled; and not till then will there be a resumption of specie payments. If this bill should now be passed, the local banks, through the influence of the mercantile community, will at once establish a system for the regulation of the internal exchanges of the country; and then peace and tranquillity will again bless the land, and success and prosperity will again crown the efforts of the people.

MR. CALHOUN'S RESOLUTIONS.

DEBATE IN THE SENATE,

SENATE, Jan. 12, 1838.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the resolution submitted by Mr. CALHOUN on the 27th of December, in relation to Domestic Slavery, the following (6th) resolution being under consideration:

"Resolved, That the union of these States rests on an equality of rights and advantages among its members; and that whatever destroys that equality, tends to destroy the Union itself; and that it is the solemn duty of all, and more especially of this body, which represents the States in their corporate capacity, to resist all attempts to discriminate between the States in extending the benefits of the Government to the several portions of the Union; and that to refuse to extend to the Southern and Western States any advantage which would tend to strengthen, or render them more secure, or increase their limits or population by the annexation of new territory or States, on the assumption or under the pretext that the institution of slavery, as it exists among them, is immoral or sinful, or otherwise obnoxious, would be contrary to that equality of rights and advantages which the Constitution was intended to secure alike to all the members of the Union, and would, in effect, disfranchise the slaveholding States, withholding from them the advantages, while it subjected them to the burdens, of the Government."

Mr. CALHOUN said that frequent attacks had been made on the resolution under consideration, in advance, which he did not think were altogether fair. The Senate had determined to consider each resolution by itself, on its own merits, beginning at the first. He felt himself bound by the determination, and, of course, did not feel at liberty to repel attacks made on resolutions in advance. We had now arrived at the sixth, and he would say one of the most important in the whole series. He had reviewed it with care, and believed it was critically true and correct in all its parts; and now stood prepared to meet and repel, he trusted successfully, all attacks that might be made on it, from whatever quarter they might come; and that he might present the points distinctly to those who might desire to attack, he would repeat separately the various positions assumed in this resolution.

Its first and fundamental position is, that the Union rests on an equality among the several States that compose it. To support so obvious a truth, he did not deem it necessary to cite various parts of the Constitution, which expressly recognize it; nor to refer to the journals of the convention that formed the Constitution, nor the debates of the conventions of the States by which it was adopted; all of which would prove that it was constantly acted on as the principle on which the Union rested, and that, as such, it was watched throughout with the greatest care and jealousy. He would ask if there was any one at all conversant with the Constitution, or the history of its formation and adoption, prepared to attack this fundamental position?

The next position assumed was, that whatever destroyed this equality, tended to destroy the Union itself. One so manifestly and irresistibly true, if the first be conceded, as not to admit of dispute.

The next declares that it is the solemn duty of all, but especially of this body, which represented the States in their corporate capacity, to resist all attempts to discriminate between the States, in the action of this Government, so as to give one an advantage over another, which is no less clear.

The next asserts, that to refuse to extend to the Southern and Western States any advantage fairly due them, and which might tend to strengthen them, or render them more secure, by extending their limits and population by the annexation of additional territories or new States, on the ground that their domestic institutions were sinful, immoral, or otherwise obnoxious, would be contrary to that equality intended to be secured by the Constitution alike to all the members of the Union. It claims nothing for the Southern and Western States on account of their domestic institutions. It simply asserts, that to withhold advantages on their account, to which they would otherwise be fairly entitled, would be contrary to the equality to which, as members of the Union, they were entitled. It does not affirm that new territory or States (Texas in a word) should be annexed. That is left an open question, to be decided whenever it may be presented, on its general merits, in reference to the whole, as well as the adjacent section, and not on the ground of the peculiar character of the domestic institutions of the States of that section, on which the Vermont resolutions and the hundreds of petitions which have been presented, place it. If the resolution goes farther, or does not fully and unequivocally express what is intended, he stood prepared to modify it so as to place its intention beyond all doubt. All he regarded was the principle, which he deemed not only clear, but all important, to the slave holding States, and on that he trusted he would be permitted to have an expression of the opinion of the Senate.

Thus regarded, he would ask if there was any one who would venture to controvert this position?

It is next and finally asserted in the resolution, that to withhold from the Southern and Western States the equality of advantages to which they are entitled, would be, in effect, to disfranchise them, and to subject them to all the burdens of the Government, without its advantages—a proposition too clear to admit of argument or illustration. He had now stated clearly and distinctly every position taken in the resolution, and he called on the Senator from Kentucky, (Mr. CLAY,) and others who had attacked it in advance, to bring forward their objections now, when the resolution is before us, and when their assaults can be fairly met. All he asked was, that their objections should be specific—no generalities; no abstractions. (They have too deep an abhorence of abstractions, he was sure, to rely on vague and general assertions.) State the particular position assailed, and make specific objections, and if he should not be able to repel them successfully, he would be more deceived than he ever was, as he felt the utmost confidence in the correctness and strength of all the positions.

Mr. PRESTON then moved to lay the resolution on the table, on the ground that this branch of the subject would be more appropriately discussed in connection with the resolutions introduced by him for the annexation of Texas to the Union, and also because it would be more advantageous to the interests of the South to take the question involved on the Texas resolutions. Mr. P. addressed the Senate in a speech of some length, and with much warmth, in support of the motion.

Mr. CALHOUN said that he would assure his colleague that he had not the slightest intention to interfere with his resolution in reference to Texas;* nor did he think there could, by possibility, be any interference. They related to different objects. His was introduced, as he had frequently said, as antagonist to the Vermont resolutions, and the various petitions against the domestic institutions of the South. Among other objections, they took position against the annexation of Texas to the Union, on the ground that our peculiar institutions were sinful and immoral. In drawing up these resolutions, he felt himself compelled to cover the whole ground assumed against us, and could not by possibility omit so prominent a one as the objection to the annexation of Texas, without a manifest surrender of one of our most important points to the Abolitionists; but in covering it, he had drawn up his resolutions in general terms, and had omitted the name of Texas, so as to avoid, as far as possible, any question in relation to it.

The resolution of his colleague was, on the contrary, a direct question of annexation, which opened the whole ground, in the broadest view of policy and the Constitution. The only effect of the adoption of his resolution would be to raise one of these questions, and that not the least embarrassing, and as such could have no possible injurious effect on the resolution offered by his colleague. But he understood his colleague to say, that a decision on his (Mr. C's) resolution could be had under his, which was broader, and that it would be more easy to get a favorable decision on the whole question than on the isolated point which his presented.

Mr. C. said he could not but believe that his colleague was mistaken. Even an affirmative decision would not cover the broad and general principle of equality, and would discriminate between the institutions of the States of the Union, which his resolution asserted, and which he believed to be all-important to the slaveholding States to be recognised. Nothing more could be inferred from such a decision than that, under all the circumstances of the case, it was expedient to annex Texas, without a distinct recognition of any one principle on which it might be admitted. But he could not think, with his colleague, that it would be more easy to annex Texas than to pass the resolution under consideration. It presented but a single point, and that so unquestionable as to command the assent of all who did not deny so fundamental a principle of our Union as the political equality of the members who composed it; while his colleague's presented, and would have to encounter, all the possible objections which could be urged against the annexation, constitutionally; and all objections as to time, as to mode, as to its effect on our relations with Mexico, as to its disturbing the equilibrium of the Union, as to the hazard of extending its present limits, as to its constitutionality, and many others besides the one presented in his resolution. So far from agreeing with his colleague as to the greater relative ease with which his (Mr. P's) could be passed, that he anticipated that neither his or his colleague's would be acted on, should the motion to lay on the table prevail. It was well known that his (Mr. C's) mind had long since been made up in favor of the annexation. Under any view he could take of it, he believed the union of the two countries was desirable, but he had at all times anticipated much difficulty in the decision of the question, when and however presented.

His colleague had objected to acting on this resolution, on the ground that it would bring up the whole Texan question. He must think that he was mistaken in his supposition. The debate heretofore has been strictly confined to the questions involved in the resolutions, and he saw no reason to believe that there would be a departure on the present occasion. In fact, he could not but think that such a supposition would be an impeachment of the fairness of Senators on the side of the chamber his colleague occupied. The resolution presented but a single point, and that but incidentally connected with Texas. Its decision involved none of the regular and fair objections that might be urged against its admission. To involve them in the discussion, would be unfair, and would be a tacit confession, on the part of those who should force such topics into the discussion, that his resolution was true, and could not be fairly met. He could not believe the able members, who he expected would be opposed to the resolution, would take a course so unworthy of them. If they believe the resolution to be true, he expected them to say so, and to vote for it; but, if not, to say so, and to assign their reasons boldly and directly, and not to kill it by arguments foreign to the question.

In conclusion, he expressed his regret that his colleague should think proper to make the motion he did, and would assure him that, whatever might be their difference of opinion on the great political questions of the day, he would, on all occasions, abstain from making any motion to embarrass any measure which he might think proper to introduce.

After some further remarks from Mr. PRESTON, the question was taken on his motion to lay the resolution on the table, and it was adopted—yeas 35, nays 9, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Allen, Bayard, Benton, Black, Brown, Clay of Kentucky, Clayton, Crittenden, Cuthbert, Davis, Grundy, Hubbard, King, Knight, Lyon, McKean, Merrick, Morris, Nicholas, Niles, Norvell, Pierce, Prentiss, Preston, Rives, Robbins, Smith of Indiana, Strange, Swift, Tallmadge, Tipton, Webster, White, Williams, and Wright—35.

NAYS—Messrs. Calhoun, Clay of Alabama, Fulton, Lumpkin, Roane, Robinson, Sevier, Walker, and Young—9.

So the resolution was ordered to lie on the table.

REMARKS OF MR. WRIGHT, OF NEW YORK,

In Senate, January 18, 1838—Upon the final passage of the bill for the relief of the heirs of Richard W. Meade.

Mr. WRIGHT said he felt, and felt most deeply, that in offering resistance to the passage of this bill, he must appear to be offering resistance to the well known and often expressed will and opinion of a large majority of the Senate; a position which he assumed, upon all occasions, with extreme reluctance. He also felt that, in opposing the bill, he might seem to be insensible to, or regardless of, the condition of those immediately interested in its passage. He was not, however, unmindful that Mr. Meade himself had passed from the cares and troubles of this world; that he had left a widow, and a large family of children, he believed mostly females, and that all were said to be dependent for their worldly fortunes upon the success of this claim. He knew that the claimants had many and valuable and worthy friends in this body, and he was free to admit, that their condition justly drew towards them the sympathies of all. It should be his studied purpose, in the remarks he had to make, to say nothing which could wound the feelings of the most tender friendship, or be offensive to the liveliest sympathies.

When he asked a short postponement of the final question upon the bill, several days since, he avowed his object to be to obtain time to re-examine the claim, having, several years since, and when a member of the other House, made a partial examination of it, and formed conclusions strongly unfavorable to its validity. He had made the examination again, and found his former impressions fully confirmed, and he now merely proposed to give to the Senate, as briefly as it could be done, a statement of the facts upon which his opinions rested. He regretted that he could not have found an opportunity to discharge this duty at an earlier hour of the day, and in a fuller Senate, as he felt conscious that many of the members were even less acquainted with the history of the claim than he was himself. Still he would not ask further delay. He had been prepared for the question upon the bill, on the day to which it was postponed upon his motion, and as none of the delay which had taken place since that time was chargeable to him, so he would not now incur such a charge, but would proceed directly to the task he had assumed.

He found, from the papers in the case, that Mr. Meade, being a citizen of the State of Pennsylvania, left this country for Spain in the year 1803; that his business was exclusively of a private character, and was, as he states himself, to obtain the release of some property detained at Buenos Ayres; that he was unexpectedly delayed in the prosecution of this attempt to release the property, and was finally unsuccessful in the undertaking; that while absent, he conceived the design of establishing a commercial house at Cadiz, in Spain, and, as soon as his other enterprise was abandoned, carried that design into execution; that he opened an extensive American trade, principally in provisions, and succeeded in obtaining various contracts for the supply of the Government and armies of Spain with provisions; that successive contracts were made, and large supplies furnished, through a series of years, during the whole of which time Mr. Meade was a resident of Spain, was domiciliated there, and made commerce his business and pursuit.

In 1806 he was appointed Navy Agent of the United States for the port of Cadiz, which agency of this Government he continued to hold until some time in the year 1816 or 1817; but it does not appear, nor is it alleged, that any of his troubles with the Spanish Government, or any part of this claim, arose from any transaction connected with his agency for the United States. On the contrary, it is admitted on all hands, and so the facts prove, that his claims, whatever they were against Spain, and whatever they may now be against this Government, have grown solely out of his private transactions with the Spanish authorities; out of his contracts to furnish provisions, and the like, and out of litigations between him and the Spanish authorities, and between him and individuals, with which the United States had no connection, directly or indirectly, and in all of which he was acting merely for himself, and in no sense, whatsoever, as the agent, or representative, in any character, or in any degree, of this Government. So much for the origin of Mr. Meade's claims.

He would now proceed to recount, very briefly, the commencement of the troubles between Mr. Meade and the Spanish Government and authorities, so far as he had been able to gather the history from the papers. In the year 1812, Mr. Meade states that he found himself largely in advance to Spain, on account of the supplies he had furnished under his several contracts, to the amount of some eight hundred or more thousand dollars; that he satisfied himself, (upon what evidence he does not state) that the Treasurer General of Spain was using funds which, in good faith, and according to his contracts with the Government, ought to have been paid to him; that he wrote and published a pamphlet, setting forth the nature, character, and extent of his contracts, the amount of his debt against the Government, and complaining, in terms of censure, of the conduct of the Treasurer General, and the other Spanish authorities, and of their bad faith exercised towards him. For this publication he was arrested and confined in prison for a period of three months, when he was released upon bail. He appealed to the Cortes against the injustice of the treatment he had received, and alledged that his imprisonment had been illegal. The Cortes, as he states, ordered the payment of his demands against the Government, pronounced his imprisonment illegal, and decreed punishment against the minister who had given the order for his arrest, and against the judge who executed the order. The order of the Cortes for the payment of his demands was, as he alleges, but very partially complied with, and that in a manner to compel great sacrifices and heavy losses on his part; while the Cortes itself being soon after dissolved, a tribunal denominated "the Supreme Council of War," obtained jurisdiction of the prosecution depending against him for the publication of the pamphlet, pronounced the publication a libel on the Government, and imposed upon Mr. Meade a fine of two thousand ducats, by way of punishment for the offence. This affair seems to have been the commencement of his difficulties with the Spanish authorities.

Another litigation, which seems to have connected itself immediately and importantly with the claims of Mr. Meade, arose as follows:

An individual by the name of Glass, a merchant of Cadiz, sometime in the year 1811, visited England, was arrested there in consequence of his pecuniary liabilities to the House of Hunter, Rainey and Co. of London, and a commission of bankruptcy was obtained against him in England, where he was himself detained upon his arrest. A Spanish tribunal, denominated "the Tribunal of Commerce at Cadiz," took jurisdiction of the affairs and estate of Glass at Cadiz; and it seems to be admitted, on all hands, that the jurisdiction assumed by this tribunal was rightfully assumed. In the course of its proceedings, this tribunal appointed Mr. Meade the assignee of the estate of Glass in Spain, requiring from him bonds, containing, among other conditions, one that he should "be responsible solely to the tribunal" for the proceeds of the estate of Glass, committed to his possession, care, and management. Mr. Meade accepted the trust, and entered upon its discharge. He closed the affairs of the estate in Spain, and paid off all the demands existing against it there. This being done, he found an amount of about fifty-two thousand dollars in money in his hands, being proceeds of the estate unexpended. This balance, he supposed, belonged to the assignees of Glass in England; and he states that he made frequent applications to "the Tribunal of Commerce of Cadiz" for leave to pay it to the English assignees, but that the leave was not granted. Sometime in the year 1816, Hunter, of the London house of Hunter, Rainey and Co. visited Cadiz, upon the business between that house and the estate of Glass. At about the same time, Glass escaped from his bail in England, reappeared at Cadiz, and laid an injunction upon the money in the hands of Mr. Meade, to prevent its payment to Hunter, alleging that the property, of which this money was the proceeds, had been improperly considered as bound by the commission of bankruptcy. A litigation, therefore, arose before "the Tribunal of Commerce of Cadiz," between Hunter, representing the London house of Hunter, Rainey and Co. and Glass, as to which had the right to receive the money from Mr. Meade. Pending this litigation between these parties, the tribunal, upon whose application, or whether upon any application at all, does not appear from the papers, made an order that Mr. Meade should, upon a day named in the order, make a deposite of the money in the royal treasury of Spain, there to await the decision of the question to whom the money of right belonged Mr. Meade made a deposite under the order, and obtained a certificate of deposite therefor, which was laid before the tribunal, or the purport and effect of it made known to that judicatory. Pending the litigation, Hunter appointed a person by the name of McDermot the agent of the London house, and left Spain. DcDermot, subsequently, raised a question before the tribunal as to the sufficiency of the deposite made by Mr. Meade in the royal treasury, in pursuance of its order, alleging that the deposite was not made in specie, but in some description of Government paper less valuable than specie. Mr. Meade contended that the certificate of deposite showed that the deposite had been made in "effective specie," and that, whenever the tribunal should order the payment of the sum, "his Majesty would pay in the same coin." Still McDermot sued Meade, before the same tribunal, for the money, and recovered against him. Meade appealed to a superior judicial tribunal of the country, called "alzadas;" but, before this last named tribunal had gained possession of the cause, and had passed judgment upon it, McDermot obtained an order, by which it was transferred from the "alzadas" to "the Supreme Council of War." This council confirmed the decision of "the Tribunal of Commerce of Cadiz," that Mr. Meade was still liable, notwithstanding the deposite he had made in the King's treasury, to pay the fifty-two thousand dollars to McDermot, or those he represented. From this decision of the Supreme Council of War, Mr. Meade attempted to take a further appeal, but his application for that purpose was not granted. A rehearing, however, before the same tribunal was granted, and five new judges were added to the court, to sit upon the new trial. Before this new trial took place, McDermot made an application for the arrest of Mr. Meade, upon the ground that he was about to leave Spain, which application was successful; and, on the second day of May, 1816, Mr. Meade was arrested and imprisoned in a prison called "Santa Catalina," at Cadiz.

No further history of this litigation has been found in the papers, nor is any further detail in relation to it deemed important to the present discussion. Little is learned, from the documents which have been examined, of the character or severity of the imprisonment suffered, except that our minister in Spain, in the course of his correspondence with the Spanish authorities to obtain the release of Mr. Meade, often styles the prison "a felon's prison;" and a single clause in the memorial of Mrs. Meade to the President of the United States, which will be hereafter more particularly referred to, wherein she says, speaking of this imprisonment of Mr. Meade, that he was "confined in a dungeon, with a sentinel at his door, and for several months locked up at night." This language would seem to imply that the "dungeon in which Mr. Meade was confined was not, for any portion of the time of his imprisonment, locked during the day time, and that it was not locked during the night, except for a few months of the period. These observations would become material hereafter.

At this stage of the proceedings, Mr. Meade commenced his appeals to our minister in Spain, and the correspondence between that minister and the Spanish Government would show that no want of zeal or exertion in the cause of Mr. Meade could be alleged against that agent of the United States, upon which a liability on the part of this Government to pay his claims could be founded. Mr. W. said he had read the correspondence with some attention, that he made no pretensions to the diplomatic science, but that he must say, if any impression had been made upon his mind more strongly than another, from that reading, it was that of surprise that the Spanish authorities had not considered and treated the minister as exceeding his diplomatic character and duties in the warmth and pertinacity of his appeals on behalf of Mr. Meade. Indeed, if his memory served him, the minister did persevere until his notes were returned unanswered by those diplomatic agents of the Spanish Government to whom they were addressed. Nor were his efforts confined to his exertions in Spain, as he did not fail to invoke the aid of his Government by appeals to, and through, the Secretary of State, at various stages of the proceedings.

Still Mr. Meade was not relieved from duress, and, on the 4th of December, 1817, Mrs. Meade addressed to the President of the United States a memorial, detailing his grievances and urging the interference of this Government to obtain his release. A call was made by the House of Representatives upon the President for the information in his possession relating to the arrest and imprisonment of Mr. Meade; and by a message, dated on the 29th of January, 1818, he transmitted copies of the correspondence between our minister in Spain and the Spanish authorities, and between both and the Secretary of State of the United States, together with the memorial of Mrs. Meade, above referred to. The subject was referred to the Committees on Foreign Relations of the respective houses of Congress, from which written reports were made, strongly remonstrating against the treatment under which it appeared to them Mr. Meade was unjustly suffering; and each report concluded with expressions strongly indicative of a disposition, on the part of this Government, to interfere in his behalf, unless his release should follow those proceedings of the National Legislature. These reports were made, that to the Senate on the 24th of March, and that to the House of Representatives on the 4th of April, 1818.

So far did the authorities of this Government, at home and abroad, go to relieve Mr. Meade from his unpleasant situation, growing out of a litigation, not with the Spanish Government, but with a private individual; not out of his claims against Spain, but out of a private trust, voluntarily assumed by him, and involving the interests of those at whose suit, and by whose procurement, he was imprisoned.

He would not here stop to comment upon the propriety of this interference on the part of our Government and its authorities, although, at a subsequent stage of the discussion, it would be his duty to allude to it. His whole purpose, for the present, would be answered by the remark, that, hitherto, most certainly the United States had done nothing, and omitted nothing, from which a liability to pay the claims of Mr. Meade against the Government of Spain could even be pretended, much less sustained. Indeed it was but just to say that he did not understand the friends of the claim to infer liability from any of the proceedings which had yet been recounted.

Mr. Meade was discharged from duress sometime in May, 1818, and seems to have turned his attention immediately to the adjustment of his claims upon the Spanish Government. During the period of his arrest and confinement, the papers show that he was devoting every exertion in his power to the attainment of this object, and that our minister in Spain did not fail, in his correspondence with the Spanish authorities in relation to his imprisonment, to interpose the subject of his claims also, whenever that could be done with propriety, or with any prospect of benefit to Mr. Meade. But after his final release this became Mr. Meade's sole business, and his appeals to our minister abroad, and to the proper department of our Government at home, in reference to the claims, became direct and earnest.

At as early day as the 6th of June, 1818, only one month after his release, Mr. Meade addressed a letter to our Secretary of State, which, in a certain contingency, announced his intention of throwing himself upon the protection and justice of his Government, and abandoning his personal efforts to settle, or obtain payment of his claims. This letter seems, upon its face, to have grown out of a state of circumstances such as follow:

Mr. Meade alleges, that, after his release, it was intimated to him from a strictly confidential, but highly authoritative source, that in case he could make a further advance in money to the Spanish Government, and would accept a grant of land in the Floridas for his whole claims, the business might be adjusted much to his advantage. Knowing that negotiations were depending in the United States for a cession of the Floridas to our Government, he would not venture to make any advance towards an adjustment of his claims upon this basis, until he had written to the Secretary of State, the negotiator on the part of the United States, and learned from him whether, in case a treaty should be concluded, and the cession made, a grant of land to him by Spain, of that date, would be valid. Hence the letter to which he referred, bearing date the 6th June, 1818, at Cadiz, was written, and to make the above inquiry was its principal object. As it was his fixed purpose to occupy as little of the time of the Senate as possible, he would only trouble them with the reading of the last clause of the letter. It was in these words:

"I shall wait in Madrid for your answer; and should it be unsatisfactory, or should I find it impracticable even to obtain this mode of arrangement from the Spanish Government, in case of your answer being satisfactory, I shall enter my protest, and leave the kingdom, and place a full reliance on my own Government for supporting my just demands, when ever an arrangement shall take place between the two countries; being confident that, whenever such an event does take place, provision will be made for the claims of our citizens."

Here was a contingent appeal to our Government to make the claims of Mr. Meade matter of treaty stipulation between us and Spain, and the contingency, in the first aspect of it, was to be put at rest by our Secretary of State. If a grant of land in Florida, made to Mr. Meade by the Spanish Government, would not be recognised in, or made valid by, the treaty of cession from Spain to the United States, then the appeal was no longer contingent but positive; because, in that case, the determination of Mr. Meade was declared, to enter his protest, leave the kingdom of Spain, and rely upon his own Government for his redress. The Secretary of State, immediately, answered his letter, and assured him that, in case a treaty was concluded, and the Floridas ceded, grants of land therein made by Spain, at so late a date, would not be recognised and confirmed. The contingency was, therefore, put at rest by the answer of the Secretary of State to Mr. Meade's letter, and the appeal of Mr. Meade to the protection of our Government remained before the State Department without condition.

Mr. Meade, in some of the papers, seems to suppose that this call from him upon the Secretary of State, and his failure to accept of a grant of Florida lands, gives him a strong equitable claim to appeal to our Government for the payment of his demands against Spain; but was this supposition well founded? His letter to the Secretary of State, making the inquiry whether such a grant to him by Spain would be recognised, in case a treaty was made, was written at Cadiz, in Spain, on the 6th of June, 1818, and the language of the letter conclusively proves that it was written immediately after the intimation had been made to him that his claims might be adjusted in this mode. A treaty was concluded by which the Floridas were ceded to the United States, and that treaty was signed at Washington on the 22d of February, 1819. By it all grants of land in the territories of Florida, made by Spain prior to the 24th day of January, 1818, were confirmed and made valid, and all grants of land in those territories made subsequent to that day, were declared to be null and void. From these dates and facts, it will be seen that, had Mr. Meade taken a grant of Florida lands from Spain, at the time his letter to the Secretary of State was written, or within any period of five months previous, it would have availed him nothing, as the treaty would have made it, as it did make all grants by Spain, within that period, and subsequent to it, absolutely null and void. It is not easy to see how a claim for the payment of money, either legal or equitable, can arise out of this state of facts.

It would seem, therefore, that even at this stage of the proceedings, so far as our Government was concerned, Mr. Meade stood in the condition of a voluntary applicant for its protection, and its justice, whenever an arrangement should take place between the countries, being confident, as in his letter to the Secretary of State, he expressed himself to be, that, whenever such an event should take place, provision would be made for the claims of our citizens.

But the strength of the argument does not rest here. This appeal of Mr. Meade, it is true, was made to the negotiator, on our part, of the treaty, which concluded that negotiation; it was made pending the negotiation, not only, but was made when Mr. Meade knew that negotiation to be pending, and because he knew it to be pending. Still it was not the only, or the most material, appeal to our Government, to include his claims in the treaty arrangement; and to show this, he would refer to another step taken on his behalf, prior to the signing of the treaty, and, as the document referred to will prove, by his express direction.

Under date of the 17th January, 1819, Mrs. Meade writes from the city of Philadelphia to the Secretary of State, as follows:

"I have the honor to hand you, enclosed, a statement of the grounds of my husband's claims on the Spanish Government, which will be followed by a specific statement of the amount due him from the said Government, showing the amount due on libramientos now in his possession, on contracts, and on damages, on bills received from said Government, as well as his reclamation on the score of the unjust imprisonment suffered by him for two years.

"The time allowed him to avail himself of the opportunity by which I received this statement was too short to enable him to make out a detail of his claims; but thinking it important that some statement should be immediately forwarded to you, he hastily made out the enclosed; trusting that, in the event of a speedy conclusion of a treaty between our country and Spain, this document would serve as a guide for that protection which his Government may think proper to grant him."

Enclosed in this letter was a very general, and somewhat argumentative, statement of the claims of Mr. Meade upon Spain, and which, the letter shows, was transmitted, by his wife, to the Secretary of State, in contemplation of "a speedy conclusion of a treaty between our country and Spain;" was sent by him to her for the purpose of such transmission; was made by him in haste because of the necessity of the presentation, to the Department of State, of some statement of his claims, before the signing of the treaty; and was such a statement as, he trusted, "would serve as a guide for that protection which this Government might think proper to grant him."

The treaty was speedily concluded, after the transmission of this statement of Mr. Meade's claims, it having been signed by the high contracting parties on the 22d of February, 1819, but little more than one month after the date of Mrs. Meade's letter, at Philadelphia. Surely, then, it would not be contended that our Government was not both authorized and urged by Mr. Meade to make his claims the subject of treaty arrangement, and of arrangement under that identical treaty, or that there was any thing in his authority and appeal different from that which must always be supposed to attend the appeal of a citizen to his Government to protect his interests with a foreign power. In his first letter to the Secretary of State, before referred to, he says he is confident that, when a treaty shall be concluded, "provision will be made for the claims of our citizens," thus expressly placing his claims upon the same footing with those of all our other citizens, who might have claims, of any character, against the Spanish Government. In Mrs. Meade's letter, just read, she says she trusts that the statement of her husband's claims, enclosed by her in pursuance of his direction, "would serve as a guide for that protection which this Government may think proper to grant him." Could authority, or appeals, be more broad, more general, or place the whole matter more within the power and discretion of this Government? It seemed to him not.

Did the treaty affect the claims of Mr. Meade against Spain, and if so, to what extent and in what manner?

He was well aware that he had now reached the question, whether or not the treaty did, in fact, embrace the claims of Mr. Meade, and did release Spain from any further liability to him? This question he did not propose to discuss, but to leave that discussion to others, who had examined it more deeply than he had, in case the debate should call for it. He must say, however, that, were the claims now rested upon this point alone, he believed it would be possible to sustain, and sustain triumphantly, the position that the claims of Mr. Meade, as subsequently liquidated between himself and the Spanish authorities, were not released by the treaty in question.

To pass this point, however, he would, for the sake of the argument merely, assume that these claims were embraced by the provisions of the treaty, and were provided for under it; and would look into the treaty to determine what provision was made, and how it was to become available to Mr. Meade.

The treaty, among other things, contained a cession of the Floridas from Spain to the United States, established and defined the boundary between the United States and the Spanish possessions in the Southwest, contained mutual releases of all claims to the territory upon each side of the defined boundary, and bound the United States, as an equivalent for the advantages in territory we were to acquire by the treaty, to pay the sum of five millions of dollars. This money was to be paid, not to Spain, but to citizens of the United States, who had valid claims against the Spanish Government. The claims embraced in the treaty are enumerated with great particularity and precision, and are subdivided into five classes. It is necessary here to refer to but one of those classes, as it is admitted on all sides, that, if the claims of Mr. Meade come within the provisions of the treaty, they are brought there by the fifth classification, which is in the following words:

Art. 9, clause 5. "To all claims of citizens of the United States upon the Spanish Government, statements of which, soliciting the interposition of the Government of the United States, have been presented to the Department of State, or to the minister of the United States in Spain, since the date of the convention of 1802, and until the signature of this treaty."

In any event, the United States were to pay but five millions of dollars, and they were to pay that to all the classes of claimants named, according to the same uniform rule. That rule was the appointment of a commission by our Government, to consist of three persons; the commission was to meet at Washington, and, within three years from the time of its first meeting, to "receive, examine, and decide upon the amount and validity of all the claims" provided for under the treaty. By necessary consequence, as the whole fund from which payment was to be made was but five millions of dollars, if the commissioners should find valid claims to more than that amount, it would be their duty to divide the five millions among the respective claimants, according to the amount of the claim of each, determined by them to be valid. Nothing in the treaty gave one claimant, or any one class of claimants, a preference over another, either in the manner of satisfying the commissioners of the validity of their claims, or in the rates of payment.

These were the provisions of the treaty. The duty of the Government, in case the treaty should be ratified, was to institute the commission, composed of honest and competent men, and to pay the awards as the commissioners should make them, in the manner pointed out in the treaty.

The duty of the commissioners was to sit, receive the claims, hear and examine the proofs presented by the respective claimants, and, within the period of three years allowed them by the treaty to do the business, to decide honestly and impartially, according to the proofs before them, and their best judgment, upon the amount and validity of each claim.

The duty of each claimant was to present his claims, and support them by proper and sufficient evidence.

To preserve the order of time, it would now be necessary to refer to the efforts of Mr. Meade in Spain to adjust his claims there, as, notwithstanding the signing of the treaty, on the 22d of February, 1819, and the knowledge of that fact on his part, and of the provisions it contained in favor of our citizens who had claims against the Spanish Government, his efforts were continued to make his own arrangement with the Spanish authorities. A very brief reference to his progress and the results, will answer the present purpose.

On the 7th of May, 1819, Mr. Meade succeeded, for the first time, in obtaining from the King of Spain the appointment of a commission to examine and liquidate his claims. This, it will be remarked, was nearly three months after the signing of our treaty with Spain, in this city, and, of course, after the knowledge of that fact must have reached Spain. The commission reported to the Minister of Finance of Spain on the 30th of September, 1819. On the 22d of October after, the Minister of Finance returned to them their report for re-examination. The commission reaffirmed their first report, and returned it again to the Minister of Finance on the 15th of November, 1819. This award, so made, in favor of Mr. Meade, by a special commission, appointed by the Spanish Government, and so reaffirmed by that same commission upon re-examination, did not receive the requisite confirmation from the King of Spain until the 9th of May, 1820, more than a year after the appointment of the commission; nearly the half of a year after the award of the commission had been not only made to his Minister of Finance, but re-examined under the order of that minister, and re-affirmed; and, what is not less material, about fifteen months after the signing of the treaty, which, as the Spanish authorities, the King himself being included, are said, subsequently, to have contended, was to throw upon the Government of the United States the satisfaction of the identical claims which were liquidated by the award. Another fact, drawn from Mr. Meade's own statement, is material, which is, that the confirmation by the King of this award of his own commission, was accompanied by a direction that the amount should "be paid out of the funds of the Royal Finance Department, with interest."

It now becomes material to state that the treaty, to which so frequent reference has been made, had not yet received the ratification of either Government. It was not, therefore, binding upon either Government, when the settlement between Mr. Meade and the Spanish Government was perfected, in the manner above related. The treaty, upon its face, and by its terms, referred to the claims of our citizens against the Spanish Government, as they existed at its date, 22d February, 1819, and not as they might be made by arrangement between the parties, after that negotiation was consummated between the two Governments in the treaty in question. The treaty, being signed by the negotiators, was transmitted to Spain, that it might receive the ratification of that Government first, as it had been formed and signed under the personal and immediate observation of ours.

On the 24th of October, 1820, more than five months after the King of Spain had confirmed the award of the Spanish commission in favor of Mr. Meade, and had directed the payment of his demands to be made "out of the funds of the Royal Finance Department, with interest," the treaty in question received the full and perfect ratification of the Spanish Government, without any change or modification whatsoever, which had the most remote relation to this, or any other of the claims of our citizens against that Government.

Another fact, most material to the investigation, is that Mr. Meade left Spain for the United States either in May, or early in June, 1820, within a month after the confirmation by the King of the award in his favor, and some five months before the ratification of the treaty by Spain. He did not, therefore, remain in Spain to obtain the compensation awarded to him, although the award itself directed its payment "out of the funds of the Royal Finance Department, with interest," but left for his native land with the simple award in his pocket, and that, too, before the Spanish authorities had, by a ratification of the treaty, made it binding upon that Government, so as even to give him the prospect of indemnity presented by it.

It had been seen, however, that the treaty was ratified by Spain, some five months after Mr. Meade left the country, and that it was thus made obligatory on that Government, provided it should receive a similar ratification, in its then existing form, by the United States. It was returned to this country to receive that ratification, and was by the then President of the United States, Mr. Monroe, laid before the Senate, with his recommendation that it should be ratified.

This presentation of the treaty to the Senate was accompanied by a memorial from Mr. Meade, addressed to the President, and dated 8th February, 1821, in which he labors to show that the treaty ought not to be so construed as to include his claims; or that if it was, our Government ought not to ratify it, and thus release Spain from his demands, without assuming upon itself the obligation of instant payment of the whole amount of the award of the Spanish commission in his favor. He enters into an ingenious and learned argument to establish these positions, but seeks, most ineffectually, to extricate himself from the force of his appeals to his country for protection, which have been before read to the Senate, and which fully authorized a provision for his claims among the treaty stipulations. When these appeals were made, Mr. Meade had effected no settlement with the Spanish Government. His claims were, then, all disputed, resisted, or delayed, and whether, without the aid of the authorities of his own country, he would obtain any thing, was, to use the mildest language, matter of great doubt even to himself. In this condition his affairs remained until after the signing of the treaty, on the 22d of February, 1819.

Shortly after that time, however, the King of Spain manifested more liberal dispositions towards this private claimant, and appointed a special commission to adjust his claims. How far the existence of the treaty, in its inchoate state, might have promoted this change of conduct on the part of the Spanish authorities he would not venture to say. That the treaty was made, and signed, and in Spain, waiting the ratification of that Government, before the commission was appointed to settle the accounts of Mr. Meade, are facts apparent from the papers. That it was not ratified by Spain, until after that settlement was finally completed, is perfectly certain. That the award in favor of Mr. Meade was, upon its face, made payable "out of the funds of the Royal Finance Department, with interest," would seem to indicate that payment was intended from other resources, and not from the money to be advanced by the United States under the treaty; but that Mr. Meade almost instantly left Spain, after the award was made, without even a demand for payment there; that he came to this country with the award as the evidence of his claim, and that the Spanish authorities ever, after the perfection of the treaty, insisted that the claims of this individual were, and were intended to be, embraced under its provisions, would seem pretty effectually to rebut any presumption that the Spanish Government ever intended to pay the award, or that Mr. Meade ever expected to receive payment, in any other way than from the provisions made in the treaty for the claims of our citizens.

A further examination of the facts in the case will confirm this view of it. The treaty was ratified by Spain in October, 1820. Mr. Meade was then in this country, with the award of the Spanish commission as evidence of his claims, and, as we shall soon see, contending that the treaty should be so amended as expressly to exempt them, or to provide for their instant and entire payment. These facts, connected with the ground constantly assumed by Spain, that the treaty did provide for Mr. Meade's claims, would certainly authorize the inference, without a want of charity to either of the parties, that the existence of the treaty, in its unfinished state, was not disregarded, when the final steps were taken for the settlement between them.

But to recur again to the argument. Mr. Meade solicited, in his memorial to the President, which was transmitted to the Senate with the treaty, that his claim should be wholly exempted from its operation, or that an amendment, "by way of rider," should be incorporated in the ratification by the United States, containing a distinct recognition of his claim, so that it might be specifically provided for in the appropriations necessary to carry the treaty into effect.

As some of the friends of the bill found the claim of Mr. Meade against this Government, upon the ratification of the treaty by the Senate, in open disregard of these requests of his, and in its original shape, as signed by the negotiators, he was bound to give this point a moment's examination. And here, he must ask, what was the state of things? What were the relations of the high contracting parties? and what were the public and private interests involved in the ratification or rejection of the treaty?

The history of the period answers all these inquiries. The claims of our citizens upon Spain for spoliations upon our commeree, and other acts, strictly and only cognizable by the national authorities, were numerous and large. The settlement of those claims, and the security of the most ample indemnity which could be obtained, was the imperious duty of our Government towards its suffering citizens. A difficulty as to the boundary between the possessions of the two Governments in the southwest, had given rise to some disturbing questions, and promised, unless amicably settled, to be a fruitful source of discord in future. Spain owned a tract of country between the territories of the United States and the Gulf of Mexico, which it was highly desirable to us to own, that we might push our limits to that natural boundary, and that we might gain jurisdiction over the ferocious bands of savages inhabiting the territory and endangering our border settlements. Recent disturbances, and the law of self-preservation and protection, had compelled us to carry our arms into that territory in pursuit of the hostile savages; and this had given rise to complaints on the part of Spain. The adjustment of all these difficulties had been the object of the negotiation which resulted in the treaty in question, and the treaty, as made and signed, had settled them all.

In nothing did these important matters involve mere dealings by contract between any of our citizens and the Spanish Government; nor did our Government, in making that treaty, pretend to take jurisdiction of any such dealings, but upon the appeal, and at the solicitation, of the citizens interested. This was Mr. Meade's case, and he had before shown his repeated and express appeals to the protection of his Government in reference to this particular treaty.

What, then, was the character of his request made to the Senate, through the President, and what might be its influence upon the claims of other citizens provided for in the treaty, and upon the public interests of the whole nation? It might, and most likely would, if complied with in either form, by any alteration of the treaty, have defeated and destroyed the treaty itself. The ratification of it in its original shape was reluctantly made on the part of Spain. It was not made at all within the time stipulated in the treaty, and not till many months after that time. It was then made without any change of the instrument from its original form, and to our Government was left the option to take the treaty as it was, or to open again, to new negotiation, at the pleasure of Spain, all the important public and private interests of which he had spoken, and which a simple ratification of that treaty by the Senate would finally, and for ever, adjust. Could the Senate hesitate? Ought they to have hesitated, because an individual, who held claims against Spain—claims not such in their character as to make it the duty of his Government to interfere with them; claims such as his Government had no right to interfere with but upon his direct solicitation, and which it did interfere with upon such solicitation, repeatedly made, so far as there was in fact any interference by this treaty; claims which, if affected at all by the treaty, were provided for in the same manner, by the same rule, and to the same extent, with the claims of the other citizens of the country—had changed the condition of his claims, and therefore changed his mind, after the treaty was signed? Because that individual, not only after the treaty had been signed, but after it had been solemnly ratified by Spain, with a full knowledge of the changed condition of his claims, chose to interpose himself, and to ask that he should be specially preferred to all other claimants, or that the final conclusion of the treaty, and consequently the indemnities of five millions to others, and the great public interests secured by it, should be put at hazard, or wholly defeated? Most certainly not. The Senate would not have been true to the country, or to the other citizens interested in the treaty, if they had, by an amendment added at the personal solicitation, and for the sole benefit, of this individual, incurred even a risk of the final loss of the treaty itself; much less, if they had done that under the circumstances surrounding this negotiation, and proving that the other contracting party had most reluctantly consented to the adjustment as it was. The memorial of Mr. Meade was dated on the 8th of February, 1821. On the 13th of the same month it, together with the treaty, was communicated by the President to the Senate; and, on the 19th, the Senate gave its advice and consent to the ratification of the treaty, without alteration or amendment. He had already said that, in this act, the Senate, in his judgment, discharged an imperious duty to the country and its citizens.

Did they, in that act, incur a liability on the part of our Government in favor of Mr. Meade? This was contended, but upon what foundation? The claims of Mr. Meade either were, or were not, embraced within the provisions of the treaty, and provided for by them. If they were embraced and provided for, they were placed upon a precise equality with the claims of all other citizens, of whatever character their claims might be; and surely, as his claims were not such as entitled him to the protection of the Government, and that protection, if extended to him at all, must be so extended as a matter of favor exclusively, and upon his direct application, he could not expect that a preference would be given to him over those claimants whose claims gave them the right to call upon their Government for protection and indemnity. Did he expect, or even ask, such a preference? No. In his first appeal to the Secretary of State for the protection of his country, made on the 6th of June, 1818, he concludes in these words: "being confident that, whenever such an event (the conclusion of a treaty) does take place, provision will be made," for what? For his whole debt? No, but "for the claims of our citizens." What was the language of his second appeal, made through Mrs. Meade, on the 17th of January, 1819, but one month before the treaty was actually signed? This appeal concludes with this language; trusting that, "in the event of a speedy conclusion of a treaty between our country and Spain, this document (a statement of his claims, prepared by Mr. Meade himself, and, by his direction, transmitted to the Secretary of State by Mrs. Meade) would serve as a guide for that protection which his Government may think proper to grant him." By himself then his claims are classed with "the claims of our citizens" generally, and no preference is asked or expected, and the protection he demands, or asks, is "that protection which his Government may think proper to grant him." If, then, his claims be included in, and provided for, by the treaty, they are placed exactly upon the same footing with the claims of all other citizens, and that was the protection which he asked, and which his Government thought proper to grant him. Every thing was therefore, done in conformity with his personal appeals and requests, and neither preference, nor prejudice, as to him, was expected on his part, or intended on the part of his Government. Up to this period, then, there is no pretence for a claim on the part of Mr. Meade against the United States, even upon the assumption that his demands upon Spain were embraced by the treaty, and Spain thus discharged from them; and, if they were not so embraced, most certainly there is no ground of claim, as it had been seen, and was admitted on all hands, that the character of the claims were such as to give him no right to protection, and to make that protection, if extended at all, a mere favor. The withholding it, therefore, could not create a liability, or lay the foundation for a claim, against our Government.

If, then, no liability, or foundation, for a claim existed, up to the time that the treaty was ratified by the Senate, can either be derived from that act? The treaty was, among other things, one of indemnity to our citizens who had claims upon Spain. Among the most material of its provisions were those securing this personal and individual indemnity to our suffering countrymen. If Mr. Meade was one of the citizens thus protected, it had been already seen that he was so by his own request, as a matter of mere favor, and upon the same footing with those claimants, who had a right to appeal to their Government for protection. Thus all were placed by the treaty in February, 1819, and with that condition, neither Mr. Meade, nor any other claimant, then expressed discontent. No act of our Government, from that time until February, 1821, changed at all the relations of any of the parties. Not so, however, with Mr. Meade. His acts, and those of the Spanish Government, had changed his claims, so far as those two parties were concerned, from a disputed and unliquidated balance to a defined and specified amount. This change, however, had taken place months before the ratification of the treaty by Spain, and yet that ratification was not made to conform itself to any changed state of any of the relations, public or private, affected by the treaty. Still, when that ratification comes up for action by our authorities, Mr. Meade presents himself, and, upon the ground of the change which had been produced, as to his claims, by the co-action of himself and the authorities of Spain, claims that the Senate should refuse to ratify the treaty, without special provisions for his benefit. Upon what ground of right could this claim upon the action of the Senate rest?

That the treaty, so far as Mr. Meade and his claims were concerned, was right in itself, and strictly conformable to his own requests, at the time it was signed, has been seen. That our Government had made itself a party to no change of circumstances, either affecting his claim, or any other interest under the treaty, after its execution by the negotiators, and before its ratification by the Senate has also been seen. If, then, the treaty had been ratified by the two Governments, immediately after its conclusion, no pretence of claim could have arisen on the part of Mr. Meade. The provision for him would have been the same as for our other citizens, as he requested it should be, and would have been that protection which his Government thought proper to grant him, and the only protection he asked or claimed. The delay in the ratification of the treaty was not that of our Government but of Spain; and it only remains to decide whether the acts of the Spanish Government and Mr. Meade, in reference to his claims, performed during that delay, could change the duties or liabilities of the United States, without their consent. That he considered a proposition too plain for argument, and he would not attempt to spend the time of the Senate upon it. The United States was a party to the treaty. As such the negotiator on its part signed it, in conjunction with the negotiator on the part of Spain. As such, it consented to the transmission of the treaty to Spain for ratification. As such it was received back by the President of the United States, with the ratification of Spain, and sent to the Senate, for its advice and consent to its ratification on our part; but to any intermediate transactions between Mr. Meade and Spain our Government was not a party, and could not be bound.

There was still another view of this matter, however, which had been presented and urged, and which required a moment's notice. It had been said that Mr. Meade's request to our Government to protect him by the treaty was subject to revocation by him, at his pleasure, at any time before the treaty should be fully ratified; and that his memorial, before alluded to, transmitted to the Senate with the treaty, contained that revocation; and the inference was thence drawn, that the ratification of the treaty, without an express exemption of his claims after this act on his part, had made the United States liable to pay his full demands against Spain. This was an argument proceeding upon the assumption that the treaty did provide for the claims of Mr. Meade, and did, therefore, discharge Spain from them; and, without admitting the assumption, it would be answered in that aspect.

What, then, was the foundation of the argument? Here was an individual who had left his own country, and domiciliated himself abroad; had entered into extensive contracts with a foreign power, from which claims had arisen, or were asserted, in his favor. The foreign Government did not settle, or pay; and the individual appeals to his own Government for protection. The case is one in which, without his appeal, his Government has no right to interfere, and, even under his appeal, is not bound to notice. His Government, however, is negotiating a treaty with the power in question, embracing, among other things, indemnity to its citizens for wrongs sustained from that foreign power, and, as an act of favor to the complaining citizen, consents to cover his rights by the same provisions of a treaty which protects those rights of its other citizens, which it is bound to protect. The treaty is signed, and the faith of the Government so far pledged to its fulfilment, when the single citizen, whose interests have been cared for at his own solicitation, as a mere matter of favor, not as a duty, comes forward and dissents to the ratification of the treaty, and the redemption of the faith of the nation in this respect, unless he can be preferred to the citizens whose claims the Government was bound to protect, and his whole claims, principal and interest, can be paid in instant cash as a part of the means to carry the treaty into effect. The claim of the citizen so ungracious is disregarded, the treaty is ratified, he being left to avail himself of the indemnity provided for others, and this is made the ground of a liability against his own Government to pay his whole claim. The statement of the argument was the strongest refutation he could give it.

Was this right of revocation peculiar to that class of claimants whose rights the Government was not bound to protect; and did they, in case their Government should consent to favor them with its protection, possess such an advantage over those who could claim, as a matter of right, what the others must solicit as a mere favor? Would it be contended that the citizen thus favored had placed in his hands, and under his control, the fate of the treaty to be made, or that his Government must, as the penalty of ratifying a treaty against his consent, pay whatever demands he might choose to prefer, as claims he intended the treaty should secure to him? If this ground should not be assumed, and this preference given to such as asked the protection of their Government as a favor, over those who rested upon it as a right, then would it be contended that all claimants under our numerous treaties for indemnities could, by coming forward at the moment when a treaty for their protection was about to be ratified, and protesting against its ratification, without full and instant provision for the payment of their demands, either arrest the treaty, whatever national rights might be involved in it, or charge upon the Treasury of the nation their whole claims? What Government could submit its foreign relations to such caprice, or could encounter such responsibilities? Would not the practical effect of such a rule be to put an end altogether to the attempts of Governments to protect their citizens against the aggressions or injustice of foreign powers? Such must be the effect; and the establishment of such a principle would be as hostile to the interests of the citizen as it would to sound public policy.

He would now proceed to examine the course pursued by Mr. Meade under the treaty, and the reasons why he failed to receive the indemnity which that secured to him.

The claims to be paid under the treaty were, by its terms, to be adjudicated and settled by three commissioners, who were to be citizens of the United States, to be appointed by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, were to hold their sittings in this city, and were to complete their adjudications, upon all the claims, within the period of three years from the time of their first meeting. The commissioners were duly appointed, held their first meeting, and organized themselves as a board to hear and determine upon the claims, early in June, 1821. Mr. Meade presented himself before the board of commissioners, and assumed and contended that he was a claimant under the treaty. To show his diligence in prosecuting his claims before this tribunal, it is necessary to remark, that the date of his first memorial to the commissioners was 6th January, 1822, about seven months after the first meeting of the board. The evidence then presented of his claims was simply the award of the Spanish commission, perfected, as has been before seen, on the 9th May, 1820, nearly fifteen months after the treaty was signed by the negotiators of the respective Governments.

Two questions were immediately raised before the commissioners as to these claims:

First. Did the treaty embrace claims arising upon contract between the claimant and the Spanish Government, and thus not, in their nature or character, calling upon our Government to protect the interests of the individual?

Second, Was the proof of the recognition of the claim, given by the Spanish authorities more than a year after the conclusion of the treaty, and after all interest on the part of that Government in the amount, or character, of the claim had ceased, in case it was embraced by the treaty, evidence, such as the commissioners ought to receive, to prove its authenticity?

Upon the first point, Mr. Meade produced voluminous proofs, and finally satisfied the commissioners that his claims were embraced by the terms of the treaty, and obtained their decision to that effect.

Then arose his duty to prove the claims. This he did not then, nor did he ever do. He persisted in relying upon the award of the Spanish commission as sufficient proof, though Mr. W. said, he was authorized to say, by a member of the Senate, who was one of the commissioners under the treaty, that, at the first presentation of the claim before the board of commissioners, it was intimated distinctly to Mr. Meade, that the board considered it to be their duty to adjudicate the several claims, as they existed at the time of the signing of the treaty, and not as they might have been subsequently made, by the assent of the Spanish authorities, by any mode or form of settlement between that Government and any of the claimants.

The final decision of the board of commissioners was in conformity to this intimation, and consequently the award of the Spanish commission, made more than fourteen months after the conclusion of the treaty, was rejected as sufficient evidence of the claims of Mr. Meade under the treaty.

From this state of facts it will be seen that he was cautioned, at the very first presentation of his claims, that other and further proof than that presented by him might be required. The treaty showed him that all the proofs must be perfected, and the final awards of the commissioners made, within three years from the first meeting of the board; and if he wanted proofs from the Spanish archives, the treaty pointed out the manner in which those proofs were to be obtained.

Still no effort was made by Mr. Meade to avail himself of these provisions of the treaty, and to obtain these proofs from Spain, until the 18th day of April, 1823, more than twenty-two months after the board of commissioners under the treaty was organized, and less than fourteen months before their final awards must be made, and their powers cease, by the express terms of that instrument.

The board instantly communicated to the Secretary of State Mr. Meade's requisition for testimony, and the Secretary forthwith gave the necessary directions in the matter to our minister, then just commissioned and about to leave the country for the Spanish court. No complaint of delay or neglect on the part of any of the agents of this Government, in obtaining the proofs he sought, has been made by Mr. Meade, or on his behalf. Still the proofs were not obtained; and on the 7th of June, 1824, and, as is believed, on the very last day of the life of the commission, a decision was made against his claims, upon the ground that they were not sustained by the requisite evidence.

A circumstance related to him by the commissioner under the treaty before alluded to, and at present a member of the Senate, he considered too material to omit in this connection. It was this: When Mr. Meade first presented his claims, they embraced not only what he alleged to be due from Spain to himself, in his own right, but the demands of sundry other individuals whom he claimed to represent; all, however, covered by the award of the Spanish commission, upon which he relied as evidence for all the claims. As part of the amount, there was a demand due to a mercantile house in Richmond, Virginia, of about $30,000. As soon as this house saw the posture in which Mr. Meade was placing their interests, they memorialized the board of commissioners, praying that they and their claim might be severed from the other demands represented by Mr. Meade, and be placed at their own disposal. This request was granted, and the severance took place. The house obtained the necessary proofs within the time allowed by the treaty, substantiated their claim before the board, received its award therefor, and obtained their dividend under the treaty. This would seem to show, beyond the possibility of doubt, that, had Mr. Meade exercised the same vigilance, all the other proofs required by him might have been obtained in time for the action of the commissioners upon them.

Mr. Meade, however, did not obtain his proofs; his claim was rejected by the board of commissioners under the treaty, for the want of them; by the terms of the treaty the decision of that board was final and conclusive; and now, as the last resort, he appeals to Congress for relief.

Where is the claim to find a resting place here? Does it grow out of the efforts of our Government, and of our authorities at home and abroad, to extricate him from prison, when his private difficulties abroad had brought him into disfavor with the authorities of a foreign power? Most surely not. This is not pretended. Does it grow out of the efforts of our minister in Spain, and of our authorities at home, to persuade the Government of Spain to make a just and equitable settlement with him? No. This is not pretended. Does it grow out of the favor of our Government, in attempting to secure for him that indemnity by treaty which he repeatedly solicited, but which, from the nature of his claims, it could only grant as a favor? This is pretended, but he had labored in vain, if he had not shown that the pretension was wholly unsupported, even upon the assumption that the claims were merged, and Spain discharged from them by the treaty.

Is, then, the claim to be rested upon the fact that the commissioners under the treaty did not admit the award of the Spanish commission in favor of Mr. Meade as competent proof of his claims? That could not be assumed by the friends of this bill, because it was conteded that the bill did not, in its original form, require the commissioners appointed under it, to take that award as evidence of the claims, and because it had been amended, upon its passage, by the consent of its friends, with the avowed purpose of avoiding the possibility of such a construction. This was a sufficient answer to this ground of claim, though it had been well said, in a report, a most pungent report, against the claim, drawn by a member of the Senate, when it first made its appearance here, and who is now a member of the body, that the United States are not responsible for an erroneous decision of those commissioners, even if it were determined that the decision was erroneous, which does not seem to be contended.

This ground of claim being yielded, he would again ask, where is the claim to rest? If its friends were unwilling to place it upon any one of the grounds stated, and he believed they covered the whole case, would they attempt to sustain it upon all, without location? He thought not. He could not believe that such a defence of a bad claim would be attempted.

There was another position, however, which had been assumed by a committee of the other branch of Congress, and which was independent of all the points he had made. It was that, by the treaty, Spain was bound to furnish the proofs, so far as they were in its power, to sustain the claims under it, when those proofs should be demanded in the form and manner prescribed; that this demand, in the case of Mr. Meade, was made, but the proofs were not furnished; that, hence, has arisen a liability against Spain, which can only be enforced by our Government; and that, therefore, we should pay to our citizens their claims, and look to Spain for our indemnity. He referred to the first report upon this claim, made to the House of Representatives by the Committee on Foreign Relations of that body.

Without canvassing the reasoning of that report, he would simply remark, that he had examined the correspondence of our minister in Spain, at the time, to determine how far the conclusion was supported by the important fact upon which it rested, the neglect of the Spanish Government to furnish the proofs; and most unfortunately for this ground of claim, it turned out, from the declarations of our own minister, made to our own Government, that the Spanish authorities, from the moment the proofs were demanded, used all diligence, and manifested every disposition, to comply with the demands, but that, from the unsettled state of that country, the consequent confused and dispersed state of the public archives, and the late day at which the demand was made, it was impossible to furnish them within the time limited in the treaty. Here, then, would seem to be an end of all pretence of claim against Spain upon this ground.

He would spend a moment in examining the extent of the bill, as he viewed it, and would close his remarks, already too much protracted. He was aware that it purported merely to provide for the claim of Mr. Meade, but was that its just and fair limit? What said the committee of the House of Representatives, which reported the first bill in favor of this claim, and to whose report he had just referred for another purpose? He would read from the report itself:

"As it is known to the committee that there are several other claimants in the same situation as the petitioner, they present a bill embracing all cases of a similar kind. They deem it, however, proper to state to the House that, as the five million fund, provided by the treaty, has been distributed among the claimants, whose claims were allowed by the Commissioners, the amount now proposed to be paid will be in addition to that sum."

Here is the important fact. All the money which our Government was to pay under the treaty has been paid, and distributed among those who proved their claims before the commission, and in conformity with the treaty, and still there are "several other claimants in the same situation as this petitioner," men who did not prove their claims, and, therefore, did not share in the distribution of the "five million fund." How many of those claimants are there, and what is the amount of their claims? He knew of but one mode of answering this inquiry. He found, from an examination of the papers, that something more than forty millions of dollars of claims were presented to the Commissioners; that but about five and a half millions of this whole amount were proved; and that, therefore, a balance of about thirty-five millions remained to be proved, in case the subject was again opened, and a new opportunity given to substantiate these claims.

This consideration it was which had induced him to take this labor in opposition to the bill. The claim of the petitioner was, in itself, large, varying but a little from half a million; but when even that amount was compared with the importance of the bill as a precedent for all these other claims, this individual case sunk to a trifle.

He knew he should be told that the bill merely proposed to institute a commission to examine the claim of Mr. Meade, and did not assume to decide that it had merit; but gentlemen would remember that it appropriated the money from the Treasury of the people to pay the claim, in case the commissioners named should decide in its favor. He knew and esteemed the men named as commissioners. There were not three other individuals within his knowledge he would sooner select for any trust; and had the proposition been merely to refer the matter to them to report the facts and their opinions to Congress, his voice would not have been heard against the bill; but when it was proposed to delegate to any three men legislative power to he extent to which he thought the example of this bill might go, he must scrutinise closely the merits of the claims, and oppose so dangerous a delegation of power.

If it should be sought to distinguish this particular claim, in this mode of treatment, he must then go a step farther, and ask what it was, as disclosed by the papers? Mr. Meade had stated that the amount embraced in the award of the Spanish commission, as due to himself, was something more than $373,000. For what was this due to him? This was a question most natural to ask, but which it was in his power very imperfectly to answer. He had waded through the papers with an earnest desire to determine this point; but he could find but two items of this large claim any where specified. The first was, the sum of $75,000 for his two years' imprisonment, at the suit of McDermot; and how was it that an imprisonment, at the suit of a private individual, for a private claim, and upon process issued by a judicial tribunal of the country within which the cause of litigation arose, and within which it was confined, was made a national matter? If the imprisonment was wrongful, an action for false imprisonment might have been sustained against the plaintiff in the private action, but not against the Spanish Government, which was not a party to the suit. If the courts of Spain made an erroneous decision, who ever heard that the Government was responsible in damages for the consequences? He could not, however, omit here to remark, that $75,000 for two years' imprisonment in a civil suit, where the prison was only locked at night, and that for a few months, was rather ample damages for the personal injury, upon whomsoever the duress might have been exercised, and whoever might be responsible for the damages occasioned.

Here, then, rested so much of this claim, and what were the other items? He had found one other, specified in the statement of the claims, prepared by Mr. Meade himself, and transmitted by him to his wife, to be laid before the Secretary of State of the United States, in immediate contemplation of the treaty. That item was $100,000, as his damages upon a bill of $300,000, drawn in his favor by the Government of Spain, to be paid in one of the Spanish West India Islands. He does not state that the bill was refused and protested, but that it was not paid in specie as he expected; that $50,000 of the amount only was paid at all, and that the payment, to that amount, was made in the article of tobacco. He says he sent a vessel to the island for the purpose of receiving the avails of the draft, and that the disappointment to him, from not receiving its full payment, was more than $100,000; although the whole draft was $300,000 only, and of that sum he did receive $50,000 in the products which, it is to be presumed, were intended to load his vessel.

Beyond these two items, his examinations did not enable him to answer what were the claims. He would not pretend that he had read all the papers in relation to the subject, but his own action must be governed by the views he had thus formed, until other facts, and other views, should change the strong impressions thus created.

INDEPENDENT TREASURY BILL.

SPEECH OF MR. NILES,
OF CONNECTICUT,

In Senate, February 13, 1838—Upon the bill to "impose additional duties, as depositaries, upon certain public officers, to appoint Receivers General of public money, and to regulate the safe-keeping, transfer, and disbursement, of the public moneys of the United States."

Mr. NILES arose, and addressed the Senate as follows:

Mr. PRESIDENT: Being entitled to the floor, and presuming that no other Senator is prepared to occupy it to-day, I will commence my remarks, although considerably indisposed, and proceed as long as my strength will admit. The subject brought under consideration by the bill and amendment, is not only one of deep interest to the whole country, but of a very comprehensive nature; so that to discuss at length its several branches, would greatly exceed any reasonable limits that can belong to a speech. I shall, therefore, confine my observations principally to such parts of the general subject as seem to have received least attention from others, and shall endeavor not to occupy an unreasonable portion of the time of the Senate; yet, considering the comprehensiveness of the subjects drawn into the debate, and the time occupied by others, I am admonished to be cautious in giving any assurance of brevity, for fear I may be found in the predicament of a certain lawyer, who was in the habit of making long speeches, and, on a certain occasion, was requested by the court to condense his remarks. He replied that he would be as short as a subject so redundant in abuse would admit of, and then commenced his argument by saying that "before the foundation of the world there was a chaos," and proceeded to trace events down to his case. I will at least promise not to wander beyond chaos; but, as our currency is in somewhat of a chaotic state, I may have to go near "where the coast of darkness lies bordering on light."

Sir, I regard this bill as a financial measure, and a financial measure only, although it may have some incidental bearing on the currency and monetary interests of the country; much less, however, I believe, than is expected by its friends or feared by its opponents. I am aware, however, that there is a deep interest felt in it by the country, from its supposed bearing on the banking institutions and commercial interests, and am also sensible that efforts are being made to use it for getting up another panic; to which purpose, I fear, we must attribute the determination of some of the banks to delay the resumption of specie payments. I am sensible that there is a settled and violent hostility to this measure on the part of a portion of our citizens. How extensive that portion may be, I have no means of forming an opinion. I shall not go into an examination of the elections which have occurred during the close of the last year, as some gentlemen have done. I will only say that, from the time at which those elections took place, there is no one of them, except it be that in the State of New York, that could have been influenced by this question; and of that I have no wish to speak, lest I should be deemed to poach upon the manor of the honorable Senator from New York, (Mr. TALLMADGE.) I will only say that gentlemen of that State, equally well informed, differ very much as to the cause of the result of that election, and that there is no subject about which men are more liable to fall into error, that in assigning causes for real or apparent changes in public opinion. Most of us are very liable to be biased in our judgments by our own opinions and feelings on pending questions.

A petition and remonstrance against the adoption of this measure, has just been introduced by the Senator from Massachusetts, (Mr. WEBSTER,) signed, as is said, by about five hundred of the citizens of the town in which I reside. I have not examined it, and of course know not who they are, but presume they are intelligent and respectable citizens, comprising, probably, many of the merchants and business men of the city. This question, it is well known, is connected with the politics of the day, and the signers of this petition, I presume, are all of one political party. They have their peculiar opinions on the subjects of banking and currency, biased, I believe, in some degree, by political considerations, and in part by their particular pursuits. A large portion of the merchants in all our cities have their peculiar notions in relation to monetary affairs, which, in my opinion, are not only erroneous, but altogether adverse to their own permanent interests. They are entitled to their own sentiments, and I will respect them so far as they appear to have any just foundation in principle, or to be induced by a regard to the general interests of the country, and not by their own peculiar interests, or those of a comparatively small class.

There is, I am well aware, a very violent opposition to this measure on the part of certain classes: those connected with or largely interested in the banks, and merchants in our cities, who expect to be benefited by the use of the public revenues; and others, who may have a strong, yet certainly an erroneous, opinion that the measure might, in some way, diminish the capacity of the banks for afford ing them accommodations. Still, however, we are to look mainly for the opposition to this measure to a different source. It comes from a political party, or rather from that coalition of the concentrated moneyed power of the country with a great polttical party, which commenced in 1832 and was consummated in 1834. This union was more to be dreaded than that of the purse and the sword, as it united and brought into action, for a common object, two of the strongest passions known to the human heart—the love of money and the love of power. Since that period the country has had no repose. Its currency, bad enough before, has since been subjected to the most sudden and violent alternations of redundancy and scarcity, occasioned by the irregular action of the banks, led in every instance by the late Bank of the United States. Commercial and other business has been subjected to the same fluctuations, and employments that were once regarded as regular and stable have become little better than speculative gambling transactions. The public mind has been almost continually agitated and alarmed by a succession of panics, brought on by withholding from the trading portion of the community their accustomed accommodations at banks; and in some instances, in our commercial towns, has approached to a state bordering on frenzy. This blending of private interests with ihe politics of the day, has imparted to party spirit a tinge of bitterness and malignity wholly unexampled since the last war. The grasping, monopolizing spirit of trade, drawn in and united with the aspirations of political power, have shaken the very foundation of our social fabric. Broken merchants and broken-down politicians, exasperated by their misfortunes, occasioned, as some honestly believe, and others affect to believe, by the measures of the Government, (which, in truth, had no more influence upon them than the measures of the British Government,) have had the audacity to threaten the country with civil commotions, to openly avow a determination to resist the laws, and coolly to talk of shedding the blood of their fellow-citizens.

The great fountain from whence these bitter waters have flowed, which have swept over our country, spreading dismay and desolation far and wide, is the principal moneyed corporation, which concentrates, and in some measure, directs the whole moneyed power of this country, and no small share of that of Europe. With a capital of nearly forty millions, reinforced by twenty-six millions of the dead notes of the late Bank of the United States, and credit at home and abroad almost unlimited, its power is nearly irresistible. It is now using this power to prevent the resumption of specie payments by the banks, with the double object of prolonging the panic and public distress, and more successfully prosecuting its commercial speculations. The people are insultingly told that the day of reasoning has gone past, and that it is only from their "sufferings" that it is expected to obtain their consent to the restoration of the late National Bank, or the establishment of another similar institution.

Sir, how long is this state of things to continue? How long are these waters of bitterness to owfl from this exhaustless fountain? From whence are we to look for deliverance and repose to our agitated country from the harassments and panics of this concentrated moneyed power, which, impelled by the interest of selfishness and ambition, and free from all responsibility, is a greater scourge to the country than an invading army? How long can the free spirit of our people hold out? It is doubtless expected that it will finally yield; and that the moneyed power will triumph over both the people and the Government. It may be so; but when that evil day comes, if come it must, our boasted liberties will be but a name. In this, as in every other great crisis, I look with confidence to that vast multitude of honest and incorruptible hearts, the producing and laboring class. I invoke their aid at the present crisis; it is a resource which at the darkest period in our history has never yet failed, when the country needed its aid, and I trust it will not now.

I have alluded to the sources of the violent opposition to the measure before Congress and the country. These sources are the banks and other special interests, united with a powerful political party. Of the extent of this opposition, I will not pretend to determine, nor can any one decide that question; and whether the hostility to the measure will increase or diminish, time only can solve. I have confidence to believe that the country will sustain this measure; but if it shall prove otherwise; if a majority of the people shall be found against it, I shall readily acquiesce in their decision. But as long as no such decision has been made, I feel it my duty to act on the question according to my own convictions of its merits; and regarding it, as I do, as a measure in an eminent degree calculated to promote both the interests of the Government and the people, I shall give it my hearty support.

But the Senator from Massachusetts has informed us that this question has occasioned a revolt; the laboring men, he says, have taken it in hand. I know not to what particular facts the Senator alluded; but as he made no application of the remark, it may be reasonable to suppose that he referred to a handbill purporting to have been drawn up and signed by twenty-two laboring men in Nashua, New Hampshire. These laboring men profess to be deeply versed in the subject of the currency of the country; they probably obtained their notions about currency from the honorable Senator, as they discovered that the failure of the banks, and the derangement of the currency, have been occasioned by the "tampering" measures of the Administration, and that the same cause has stopped the factories and thrown all the laboring men out of employment. This profound investigation, of the laboring men of Nashua, was printed and circulated all over the State of New Hampshire, to enlighten the people on the subject of the currency. It was, however, deemed advisable to investigate the matter, and ascertain how it was that these twenty-two laboring men had obtained such deep insight into the abstruse and mystified subject of currency. The matter was inquired into, and the result was, that the handbill had been drawn up by a Whig lawyer, and that the laboring men whose names were attached to it, and who were represented to be friends of the Administration, were, with three exceptions, decided Opposition men; and the three declared that they signed this currency circular in consequence of threats, that if they refused they would be immediately turned out of employment, and their families exposed to starvation. Such is the only case of which I have heard, of a revolt among the laboring men on account of the currency. But this is not all. After these facts were made public, and this small, but base, attempt at imposition, exposed in New Hampshire, this same handbill has been extensively circulated in my own State, and particularly in manufacturing towns. Such are some of the honest efforts to enlighten the people on the subject of the currency.

Mr. President, whatever may have been the conduct of the opponents of this measure elsewhere, it must be admitted that the Senators opposed to it have exhibited great candor, impartiality, and fairness. The Senator from Kentucky (Mr. CLAY) seemed so desirous to signalize his zeal for the measure, that he volunteered to stand godfather to the child, and christened it before it was born. He called it the "execrable bill." The Senator from Massachusetts declared the measure to be a new thing under the sun; a new "experiment" on the currency; he also considered it as involving a total abandonment of the power and duty of this Government over the currency; it was abandoning our duty, and hiding ourselves in caverns and holes, with the bats and owls. He also regarded it as providing for a hard money currency. The Senator from Virginia (Mr. RIVES) discovered in this bill almost every thing except what it actually does contain. With his keen penetration he discovered a hard money currency in it, and a paper money currency; that instead of its being a new experiment it was taking us back to the dark ages, when kings had their strong box; but his most remarkable discovery was, the germ of a bank, concealed in the bill, which would soon be developed, with all its frightful proportions. I really wish the Senator had been a little more successful in proving that this bill contained the elements of a bank; for, in that case, he would have secured for it many friends among those most opposed to it.

Having, sir, disposed of these preliminary matters, I will proceed the consideration of the bill, and the substitute offered by the Senator from Virginia. I will begin with the substitute, which is the exploded deposite bank system, enlarged and extended, and embracing new and alarming principles. What are the objects of this scheme, and what are the means by which they are to be accomplished? There are three objects: first, to manage the finances of the United States; secondly, to form a National Bank currency; and thirdly, to regulate the issues of the State banks generally. How are these objects to be effected? Why, by taking into the service of the United States, and rechartering, twenty-five of the most "respectable" of the State banks. I do not understand the meaning of the word "respectable," as applied to banks. I had supposed all banks were respectable; but this scheme is to make a distinction, and create an aristocracy, among the banks; and as all banks are not only respectable, but honorable, it would seem that the wenty-five must be right honorable banks.

This league of respectable banks is to be under the supervision of the Secretary of the Treasury; they are to make returns to him, and he may examine into their affairs generally, as well as with the United States. They are to perform for the Treasury all the services performed by the late Bank of the United States, for which they are to be entitled to the use of all the public revenues, without any compensation, although the deposite act of 1836 allows two per cent. where the sum exceeds a certain amount. The revenues in the Treasury will average five or six millions, and at times will be vastly more; the use of which will be worth half a million a year; but these banks will have the monopoly of supplying nearly the entire currency received and paid out by the Government, which will be worth half a million more. It is true, the bills of such other banks as may decline to issue notes of a less denomination than ten dollars will be receivable for public dues; but, with the exception of the league, few, if any, other banks will conform to that condition, as it will not be for their interest to do it. The twenty-five Treasury banks, therefore, will have the entire monopoly of the public revenue, and the supplying the currency for the Government, which cannot be worth less than one million of dollars annually; and this enormous monopoly would become a vested right, and forfeited only by a breach of their contract with the Government.

This league of respectable banks is required to establish a sort of national currency, under the direction of the Secretary of the Treasury. They are to receive and pay out each other's notes, and thus give them a general circulation. That this might be done to some extent, is not denied; it is done now by a combination of banks. What is called the "Suffolk Alliance," at Boston, accomplishes this object, and gives a general circulation, throughout New England, to the notes of all the associated banks. But this is a dangerous power, and exposed to great abuse.

But the most extraordinary feature in this scheme is the novel and dangerous principle, which stands out on the face of the amendment, that this league of banks, acting in co-operation with the Secretary of the Treasury, is to "regulate" the entire banking system of the country. This is to be effected by frequent settlements with all banks dealing with them, or whose bills they receive, and by compelling them to pay balances in specie when it is found necessary to check their issues; and letting the balances remain, or adjusting them in some other way, when it is thought necessary to encourage them to increase their issues. All banks have, of course, the power to demand of each other specie for balances; and the only purpose of this provision in the amendment is to make it the duty of the Secretary of the Treasury to compel the Treasury banks to exercise this power, for the purpose of regulating the entire banking system of the country.

These banks have also the power of determining what money shall be received for the public dues, for they are not obliged to take even the bills of such other banks as may comply with the prescribed condition of issuing no notes of less denomination than ten dollars, and can refuse the bills of all banks but the Treasury league. Is this a safe power to entrust to few banks? Is it not a power which Congress ought itself to exercise? It is true, this power was entrusted to the late United States Bank; but it was abused, and ought never again to be confided to any bank or system of banks. Besides, it was not then considered, as it seems to be now, by many, and particularly by the author of this amendment, that the receivability of bank notes by the United States was an essential element of their credit. It is urged as the principal objection to the bill reported by the committee, that the refusal to receive the paper of the local banks is to discredit them; and yet it is proposed to confer on the twenty-five Treasury banks the power of discrediting any other bank, and all others, in the country.

That this system of banks might conduct the financial affairs of the Government well enough, as long as the banks remain in a sound and healthy condition, may be admitted. This the late deposite banks did for more than two years, and until they became deranged. But the difficulty is, that the connection of the Treasury with them, instead of tending to keep them in a sound state, and give steadiness and regularity to their action, will have a directly contrary influence, as experience has proved. The large amount of public moneys which are suddenly received and withdrawn give great irregularity to the action of the banks connected with the Treasury. This was the case of the late United States Bank, and with the State deposite banks, in 1814, '15, and '16, and during the recent employment of them since 1834.

The principle for regulating the currency of all the State banks, through the action of these deposite banks, is the same as that of a National Bank. It confers on the Treasury banks a power which is nearly useless for good, but omnipotent for evil. The transactions between banks are entirely different from those between them and the public. In their dealings with the public, they make use of their own credit; and as credit costs nothing, and is unlimited, the banks could extend their discounts without limit, (or until the public began to doubt their solvency, which would bring their bills back for redemption) were it not for their being received by other banks, who return them for payment in something else than the credit of the bank issuing them. The dealings of the banks with each other require that they pay their balances, if not in specie, at least in something of some value, and not in their own credit.

This is the only principle by which the banks can check and regulate each other, and its action is reciprocal; the small banks check the large ones as much as the latter check them, according to the extent of their business. But to give any salutary influence to this restraining and regulating principle, whether in a National Bank or a league of Treasury banks, it is important that such banks pursue a steady course themselves, and avoid all sudden expansions or contractions of their issues. Hence all attempts to regulate the general bank currency of the country by the agency of a National Bank connected with the Treasury, or State deposite banks, have signally failed, because the action of all such banks is as irregular and fluctuating as that of other banks; and, indeed, more so, from the very fact of their connection with the Treasury. This new scheme, therefore, for regulating the bank currency, would be impracticable and inefficient for any good purpose; because these very regulating banks would themselves, like the late United States Bank, cause the very irregularities they are designed to prevent. It is the instinct of all banks to act solely with reference to their profits, and consequently to use their credit to their utmost extent. When these Treasury banks, or a National Bank, are increasing their discounts, and consequently their circulation, how can they check the like increase by other banks? By returning their bills, and demanding specie for balances? Certainly not; because the balances will be against them. The large amount of their own notes put in circulation fall into other banks, which gives balances against these regulating banks. This proposition is so clear, that it can need no proof; but if it did, the experience of the late National Bank would afford abundant testimony.

When that institution commenced extending its discounts in November, 1830, and continued expanding until May, 1832, having enlarged them nearly thirty millions of dollars, the State banks did the same, because the check of that bank upon them, and of the State banks on each other, was relaxed; and when, in August, 1834, after the removal of the deposites from the United States Bank, it commenced a rapid curtailment, the State institutions were compelled to do the same, in order to meet the balances which the United States Bank obtained against them; and when the Bank of the United States, in November, 1834, began to expand, the State banks followed in the same course, and both went on expanding during the years 1835 and 1836, which is the primary cause of all the disorders in the currency, and derangement of business, that have since ensued. The same state of things, although not to the same extent, existed in England. The Bank of England expanded during the two first quarters of 1836, and increased its issues nearly two millions sterling; and during the same period, the joint stock banks multiplied rapidly in number, and increased their issues three or four millions, which occasioned the over-trading in that country.

Yet, with these indisputable facts before the world, it is contended that a national bank can "regulate" the State banks; and it is now proposed to do the same through the agency of a league of Treasury banks. The scheme is impracticable. Instead of regulating the currency, these Treasury banks would only increase its natural tendencies to disorder, as was the case from 1814 to 1817, and since 1834 to the final catastrophe in May last. But, sir, if this part of the plan was practicable, ought it to be established? Would it be safe to confide to the Secretary of the Treasury a power so tremendous as that of regulating and controlling the whole currency of the country? of determining when money should be plenty, and when scarce? Is it possible to conceive of any power more alarming, more corrupting, or more dangerous? Is it not evident, from this examination of this plan—is it not, indeed, apparent, upon the very face of it, that it would be a national bank connected with the Treasury? a national bank without a parent bank—the Secretary of the Treasury being the head? In point of fact, however, as the Pennsylvania Bank of the United States must be one, that institution, from its vast capital and credit, so entirely disproportioned to any other bank, would become the head of the system, and control the whole machinery as completely and absolutely as it did its own branches.

Most of the objections urged against the bill providing for an Independent Treasury, apply with a hundred times more force to this. The influence which it gives to the Executive, by uniting it with the entire banking system of the country, is truly alarming, and would hardly fail of gradually changing, and ultimately subverting, the whole system of the Government. It has been a standing objection to the bill of the committee, that it establishes two currencies, one for the Government, and one for the people; but this scheme establishes three distinct currencies. First, the currency to be supplied by the Treasury banks, which is to form a national paper currency, and have a general circulation; secondly, the currency receivable for the public dues, (other than that of the league of banks,) consisting of the notes of such banks as may restrict their issues to bills of a less denomination than ten dollars; and thirdly, the notes of banks not receivable for public dues. The Independent Treasury bill is said to provide two tables, one for the officers of the Government, and the other for the people. This provides three: one for the officers of the Government, and the oligarchy of banks; one, I suppose, for the trading community, and the third for the laboring classes, to be supplied with the coarse and homely fare, consisting of the bills or rags of those banks which are discredited by the Government, but are supposed to be good enough for the "mouth of labor."

But, sir, there is one objection to this system, of great weight, in my judgment, which I cannot pass over unnoticed. It creates an improper, if not unconstitutional, connection between the Federal Government and the institutions of the States; which, on the one hand, renders this Government dependent on State institutions, and on the other, withdraws those institutions from their proper sphere of action, and, in some measure, converts them into Federal corporations. Have we any power to do this? And does it not blend and confound the powers of the Union and those of the States, so as to go far to obliterate those distinct marks of separation, so essential in our system. This substitute for the bill changes and modifies the charters of the State banks, takes them into the service of the United States, and subjects them to its supervision and control. This, it is true, is to be done by contract, based on a law of Congress; but all charters are considered as contracts. It is to be done by the consent of the institutions; but these corporations are not independent sovereignties in law, if they are in fact; they are the creatures of the States, and subject to their will; and there is to be no consent of the States. If this Government can rightfully interfere with the banking institutions of the States, why can it not interfere with corporations for education or courts of justice?

I have passed over one objection to this plan, which I intended to notice. These banks are to be nominated by the Secretary of the Treasury, and confirmed by a joint resolution of Congress; and, when appointed, are to be discontinued by a joint resolution of Congress. This will expose Congress to that corrupt influence which attends all legislation concerning banks. Suppose the Pennsylvania Bank of the United States was appointed as one of these Treasury banks, and its conduct should be such, that it became necessary to withdraw the deposites from it; would not the influence of that bank be brought to bear directly on Congress? Of the nature and danger of that influence, I need but refer to the circumstance that a report of a committee of this body, friendly to that bank, disclosed the startling fact that more than fifty members of Congress, while the bank was struggling for a recharter, had been accommodated with loans, amounting, in all, to the enormous sum of nearly half a million of dollars. I leave this topic, as it is not one I delight to dwell upon.

But it is claimed, that this deposite bank scheme received the sanction of the late Administration. This is a mistake: all that the late President claimed or expected, was that the finances of the Government could be conducted without the agency of a National Bank; he believed they could be managed by State banks, and they were so managed, and satisfactorily, for two years. After this connection was established, he did attempt to make the Treasury auxiliary to the action of the States, in the suppression of bank notes of the lower denomination.

In his Message in December, 1835, he says:

"The management of the revenue can be made auxiliary to the reform which the Legislatures of the several States have already commenced in regard to the suppression of small bills, and which has only to be fortered by proper regulations on the part of Congress, to secure a pratical return, to the extent required for the security of the currency, to the constitutional medium."

In his Message in December, 1836, he says:

"But although various dangers to our Republican institutions have been obviated by the failure of that bank, [the Bank of the United States,] to extort from the Government a renewal of its charter, it is obvious that little has been accomplished except a salutary change in public opinion, towards restoring to the country the sound currency provided for in the Constitution. In the acts of the several States, prohibiting the circulation of small notes, and the auxiliary enactments of Congress, at the last session, forbidding their reception or payment on public account, the true policy of the country has been advanced, and a larger portion of precious metals infused into our circulating medium."

Hence it appears that President Jackson contemplated nothing more than to use that influence arising from the connection of the Treasury with the State banks, as merely "auxiliary" to that of the State Legislatures, for the suppression of small bills, and an increase of the metallic circulation. That he was mistaken in his expectations, the result has shown; but he aimed at nothing farther, and never designed to control or regulate the State banks through the revenues of the Federal Government, which is the object of this substitute. Such a principle has not the least countenance from any act or opinion of General Jackson.

The honorable mover of this amendment says he goes for his country, and not for a party. This is the measure of the country; the bill based on the principle of equal rights and common justice to all the people, is, I suppose, the measure of a party. If the twenty-five banks, and the private interests connected with them, constitute the country, then certainly the Senator is correct in saying that he goes for the country.

Mr. President, before entering on the consideration of the bill, I will notice some observations of the honorable Senator from Virginia. He informs us that the restoration of the currency depends on the fiat of this Government. Was this the case in England, during the suspension of the bank for nearly twenty-five years? Was it the case here in 1816? It would be much more true to say that it depended on the fiat of the president of the United States Bank of Pennsylvania. Is it not apparent that that bank is now almost the sole obstacle to resumption? But how is the Government to resuscitate the banks? Is it by reinforcing them with funds? We have none, if it would be proper to loan funds to the banks to help them to pay their debts. Are we to lend them our credit? This we have already done, to the banks and the merchants, to the amount of twelve millions of dollars.

But we are told that the banks depend on confidence. Does the Senator mean that this Government can create confidence in the banks? A tory minister, during the suspension in England, attempted this; he procured the passage of a resolution by Parliament, declaring that the notes of the Bank of England had been, and were, as sound a currency as the lawful coin of the realm. But this "fiat" of confidence did not make the bank notes equal to coin; for at that very moment they were depreciated more than ten per cent. But does the Senator mean that there has been a want of confidence in the banks on the part of the Government or the people, or both? Sir, it would be easy for me to show that there has been too much confidence in the banks, both by the people and the Government. When the banks exploded last May, the people had in their vaults the snug little sum of more than thirty-one millions. Does this show the want of confidence? The people also have had so much confidence in them, as to enable them to extend their loans to the amount of over five hundred millions of dollars, exceeding, by nearly one hundred millions, their capital and deposites united. This will appear from a statement I shall introduce in the course of my remarks. Is it an evidence of a want of confidence that the public have received their bills at the rate of ten, twenty, and, in some instances, forty to one of specie in their vaults? Sir, is it not apparent that it is an excess of confidence, both by the Government and the people, which has led to the explosion of the banks, and is it proposed to remedy an evil by the very cause which has produced it?

But if any act of the Government could inspire additional confidence in banks, without knowing that there was a solid foundation to support it, would it not be a fraud on the people? And if we are to have a paper currency, resting on no other foundation than "confidence," truth and justice require that this should be made apparent on the face of the bills; and all such notes should be drawn in the following terms: "On demand, this bank promises to pay the bearer five dollars, in confidence." If bank notes were thus drawn, there would be some more honesty, if not more soundness, in our currency than there is at present. The Commonwealth Bank, and others that have failed, can no doubt pay their notes in "confidence;" but the people have had enough of that sort of "better currency," and are beginning to be heartily sick of it. When we get to that state of refinement that people can live on confidence, it may then do very well for a currency.

Mr. President: I have now disposed of the substitute, and will proceed to consider the bill—the abused bill, which honorable Senators have greeted with denunciations, and in which they have discovered every bad principle and every pernicious tendency; they can see no good in it, but almost every evil—

> "All monstrous, all prodious things,
> Abominable, unutterable, and worse
> Than fables yet have feigned or fear conceived;
> Gorgons, hydras, and chimeras dire."

There seems to be but one more dangerous principle that can be discovered in it, and that is the pre-emption principle, which we may expect will be detected by the honorable Senator from Kentucky, (Mr. CLAY,) who professed to regard the occupation of the public lands as of the same character as plundering the public stores, or other property; and perhaps it may be contended, that the receivers general and depositaries may seize upon, and claim the public funds, by virtue of some pre-emption principle either now in the bill, or which may hereafter be incorporated into it. If this bill can be moulded into a bank, why not into a pre-emption act?

It is not my purpose, Mr. President, to go into a discussion either of the general principles of this bill, or its details. Its principles are not essentially changed from the act which passed the Senate at the called session, and which was then very elaborately and ably debated; and the present bill, has been explained in its details, and its principles illustrated and defended in a masterly manner, by the chairman of the committee, (Mr. WRIGHT,) so that I shall confine myself to some general remarks, and a brief notice of some of the objections which have been urged against it.

What is the leading principle of this measure and its object. The principle is, the right and the duty of the Government to take care of its own funds; and the object to separate the public revenue and its management entirely from the business and interests of individuals or corporations. This is one of those measures that, to a man of plain common sense, nothing more would seem to be necessary, than to state the principle and the object, to secure his assent to the justice and propriety of the measure. And how is the object to be accomplished, or what are the means to attain the end? They are simple, natural, and such, no doubt, as the framers of the Constitution designed. They consist in establishing a Treasury in fact, (instead of a treasury in law, as has heretofore been the case,) with six branches, of which officers, either now existing, or to be appointed, are to take the charge. These officers are to be subjected to the highest responsibilities; to be under oath; to give bonds; to be subjected to the vigilance and examination of other officers connected with the same branch of the public service. But the bill introduces a new and most important principle, by making it a crime to use or embezzle the public funds. This is a moral principle, which will throw around the public treasure those sacred safeguards which pertain to reputation, character, and honor; and to the dread of disgrace and infamy which attend crimes. In this country, public officers in all high and responsible trusts are, and I trust ever will continue to be, men of probity, character, and honor; men who have too much to lose by violating the laws, and especially by a criminal offence, to be likely to yield to any temptation, however strong. All revenues accruing where the Treasury and branch Treasurers are located, are to be deposited in those establishments, which, being provided with vaults and safes, will have all the physical security that belongs to banks; and the revenue accruing elsewhere, is to be paid over into these establishments, periodically, under the direction of the Secretary of the Treasury, so that large amounts will not remain in the hands of the other depositaries; and where this cannot conveniently be done, the depositaries may be ordered to make special deposites in banks.

But next to the legal and moral responsibility of the persons entrusted with the public moneys, in point of security is, the inviolability of the funds, by the inhibition against the use of them, and making it a conversion of them. This principle distinguishes this plan from those heretofore adopted, and alone affords the highest additional security. The right to use the public revenues has been the fruitful source of the losses and embarrassments which the Government has heretofore experienced.

Next to the security of the public funds, is the practicability of the plan. Can the finances be managed in this way? or is the agency of banks necessary? If this has ever been doubted, it cannot be now; the revenues were conducted essentially on the principles of this bill until 1816; and during eight months of the past year, have been so conducted with all the embarrassments attending the universal derangement of the monetary affairs of the country. Yet this system is said to be new, and an untried "experiment." During the administration of the Treasury by Alexander Hamilton, and down to 1816, the course pursued was similar to that now proposed, except that it had none of the securities and safeguards provided in the present plan. Deposites then made in banks by collectors and receivers of the revenue, were not placed to the credit of the Treasurer, but to that of the officer, who, of course, could control them. The collectors at New Haven, in my own State, conducted their official business on this principle until 1816, and in a single year received and paid over four hundred thousand dollars. In 1801, when there was a change in the office, the collector paid over to his successor sixty thousand dollars. Was not that officer a depositary, as much as the present collector would be, should this bill become a law? The only difference is that the law at that period, was loose and defective, providing none of the safeguards which this bill contains. The collector's bond was then but five thousand dollars; and yet such large sums of money passed though his hands without any loss to the Treasury. It had not then been discovered that public officers could not be trusted, and that the only security was in banks. Instead of this being a novel scheme, a new "experiment," as is claimed, it is a return to the original plan, springing directly out of the Constitution; with such improvements as time and experience have suggested, to give more complete security to the public revenues.

The finances of the post office, which amount to four millions annually, are conducted on the principle of this bill; and twelve thousand postmasters are all, by the law, depositaries of the public moneys, which are drawn out to pay the expenses of the transportation of the mail.

Sir, to contend that the public finances cannot be managed without the agency of banks is not to attack this bill; it is to assail the Government itself, by making it dependent on the machinery and agency of banks, which is not provided for in the Constitution; it is to deprive the system of that function and power, without which it cannot go on.

The principal arguments relied upon to prove that the banks are safer than public depositories, is, that you have the additional security of the capital of the bank. There is little force in this, because the same misconduct in the officers of a bank might waste your funds, and destroy the capital of the bank. The failure of banks is, in almost every instance, occasioned by the misconduct, and often the frauds, of a few of the directors who control them; they withdraw their whole capital into their private business or speculations, and if these turn out badly, the bank is ruined. This appears to have been the case with the banks which have recently exploded at Boston and elsewhere Whether you entrust your funds in banks, or the hands of your own officers, you must trust to the honesty and responsibility of those who have the custody of them. But, in one case you entrust it to the officers of a corporation, over whom you have no control, and whom you have authorized to loan it and use it as a part of their own capital, in the private business and speculations of individuals. In the other, you confide it to your own officers, responsible to your own laws, not only civilly but criminally, and who are prohibited from using the public funds of which they have the custody In point of security the advantages appear to be in favor of the proposed plan; and I will now proceed to show that experience fully confirms thisopinion, deduced from the principles of the two systems.

By a report of the Secretary of the Treasury, now on our files, made in pursuance of a resolution offered by the Senator from Massachusetts, and amended on my own motion, the following facts appear:

That the Treasury has sustained a direct loss from depositing its revenues in banks, from 1816 to 1836, principal and interest, of -	$1,892,642
By the depreciation on bills, which were received and paid out, from 1814 to 1817 inclusive, from five to six millions of dollars; say -	6,000,000
By bills of banks that have failed, and are now on hand - - -	178,470
By the withholding of dividends by the late Bank of the United States, under a pretext of a claim for damages for the protest of a bill on France, principal and interest -	233,422
Total - -	$8,304,534

On the first of May last, just before the bank explosion, there was in the deposite banks to the credit of the Treasurer and disbursing officers the sum of $31,212,058; of which twenty millions of dollars has been paid on the drafts of the Treasurer, and about one million and a half of that sum in specie, leaving eighteen and a half millions, which have been paid in the depreciated bills or credit of the deposite banks. The average discount on these bills cannot be less than six per cent. and is probably more: it has varied at different periods, and in different places; it was for some time not less than 8 or 10 per cent. at New York, and in Tennessee and Mississippi was from 12 to 15 per cent. Six per cent. on $18,500,000 is a loss of $1,110,000. There is now in the deposite banks nearly $10,000,000 to the credit of the Treasurer and public officers, the average discount on which cannot be less than 4 per cent. making $400,000; all of which sums form an aggregate of $9,814,534 as the loss which has accrued from the connection of the Treasury with the banks since 1814. The estimated loss during the past year has fallen mostly on the creditors of the United States, and the several States who have received the instalments they were entitled to under the deposite act of 1836, in the depreciated credit of the deposite banks.

In consequence of the failure of the deposite banks, almost every class of public creditors, since that period, have been, from necessity, paid in a depreciated currency; the soldiers, seamen, laborers on the public works, fishermen, (their bounties for the exportation of fish,) and the pensioners. As far as could be done, some of these meritorious creditors have been paid in specie, amounting in all, including Indian annuities, to between five and six millions of dollars.

But because the loss the past year has not fallen directly on the Treasury, but on individuals, it is not the less a loss to be charged upon the connection of the Treasury with the banks; it is, indeed, a loss much more to be deplored than though it had fallen on the Treasury.

No estimate has, or can be made, of the loss to the public creditors, and individuals having dealings with the Government, during the derangement of the finances and depreciation of bank paper, from 1814 to 1817; but, there can be little doubt that it exceeded the loss sustained directly by the Treasury, which has been estimated at six millions; and this, added to the former sums, makes an aggregate of $15,814,534 as the loss resulting from the connection of the Treasury with the banking system since 1814.

Now, sir, what have we to offset against this enormous loss? Why, the Senator from Virginia takes up the report of the Secretary of the Treasury containing a list of public defaulters, and says, with an air of triumph, that it contains testimony enough to blow the Independent Treasury scheme to the winds. Well, sir, what is this testimony? Why, it is a list of officers whose accounts have not been regularly balanced on the books of the Treasury from the foundation of the Government, but is no evidence of what is actually due from those officers. The report itself contains an explanation of many of the cases of apparent default. In a large portion of the cases there is nothing due the Treasury. The first President Adams still appears as a defaulter on the books of the Treasury for an amount exceeding twelve thousand dollars. The Senator says these defalcations amount to near three millions of dollars; but, from the best information I can obtain from the Treasury Department, it does not much exceed one million. How stands the account, then? One million lost by receiving officers, and more than fifteen millions by the banks!

Mr. President, having attempted to show the practicability of the Independent Treasury system, and to demonstrate its greater safety and security to the public revenues, I will notice, briefly, some of the objections which are urged against it.

We are told that it will be very expensive. The Senator from Virginia says that he is informed by a very intelligent gentleman, who is a friend of the measure, that it will cost six hundred thousand a year, and the Senator from Indiana (Mr. SMITH) says it will cost two millions the first year, and a half a million afterwards. The expense of putting the establishment in operation, cannot be estimated with much accuracy; but the expense afterwards of conducting the finances, every one can see, will be but a small sum. We are not in the dark on the subject; it consists of paying the salaries of four Receivers General, and a few clerks. It is a small affair, and not worth serious consideration. But cannot the Government afford the expense of taking care of its own funds, and to avoid the expense, must it loan them to the banks to take care of them for the Government? This would be an excellent doctrine for the banks, who claim the monopoly of keeping the public money.

The principle in this bill which requires that ultimately the public dues should be paid in specie, is perhaps with some, the most objectionable part of the measure. Mr. Dallas, when Secretary of the Treasury, in the very report to which the late Bank of the United States owed its origin, says the Government had received bank notes from necessity only, and that time would soon come when we ought to receive for the public dues nothing but specie or Treasury notes. He says "the Treasury yielding from necessity to the general impulse, has hitherto consented to receive bank paper in payment of duties and taxes; but the period approaches when it will probably become a duty to exact the payment, either in Treasury notes, or in gold and silver coin, the lawful money of the United States."

At that period there was not fifteen millions of specie in the United States, and now there is over eighty millions. It would, seem therefore, that the time has arrived, if it is ever to come, when the public dues should be collected in coin. The operation of this principle seems to be misapprehended. It is said that it will drain the specie from the banks, and greatly diminish their capacity for supporting their issues. This is a mistake. It will not drain specie from the banks; or if it does, its place will be immediately supplied; it will create a new demand in the country for specie, equal to the usual balance in the Treasury, and what is in use in the fiscal transactions of the Government, amounting to from five to seven millions of dollars, and this additional demand for specie will draw and retain so much more of the precious mettals into the country. If, at first, this demand is supplied in part from the banks, it must finally come from abroad. When the Bank of England resumed the payment of specie, in 1822, such was the demand for coin that no less than twenty-four millions of dollars annually was imported for four years to fill up the vacuum, which the long use of paper had occasioned. The additional demand of from five to seven millions in the United States, would be supplied from abroad in one year, and without being felt. The requirement of specie for the public dues, would reduce the circulation of the banks to the amount of the sum ordinarily in the Treasury, and in use in the transactions of the United States; about the amount I have named, and so far would diminish the profits of the banks; but would, in no degree, impair their capacity to make discounts to individuals, but would rather increase it; as the five or seven millions of their currency, which had been absorbed in the transactions of the Treasury, being replaced by coin, there would be, to that extent, an increased ability, on the part of the banks, to supply the demands of the community. This principle would not only draw an additional sum of specie into the country, but would keep it in active circulation; and what is taken from the banks will be returned to them again. This demand for specie and circulation of it to the extent of the fiscal transactions of the United States, will keep up a demand on the banks for specie that will render it necessary for them to keep a greater supply in their vaults, which will tend, in some degree, to check their excessive issues, and to diminish their profits arising from such excessive issues of their notes. But there is little reason to believe that this restraining principle could operate with sufficient force to keep down the bank issues to their proper level, or to give that degree of stability and soundness to the currency which is so desirable. Instead of its crippling the banks, it will not be a sufficient check upon them.

But it is said that this principle will tend to create an internal drain of specie, at the very time that there is an external drain from abroad, occasioned by the excess of importations. This may be the case to a certain extent, and its effect will be highly salutary, as it will tend promptly to check importations, and adjust the balance of trade before it goes on to an extent to become dangerous. The excess of importations commenced in 1831, and, being sustained by the use of the credit of the Bank of the United States and foreign credit, it was not checked as it ought to have been, but continued until 1837, which has involved the country in its present difficulties.

It is uged that demanding specie for public dues, will tend to hoard the money of the country. Instead of this, it will, as I have already said, draw into the country an additional amount of specie, and keep it in active circulation.

Mr. President, we have had a new version of the old objection, that this bill will create two currencies, one for the Government and one for the people. The Senator from Virginia says this is not an ad captandum argument. It is an ad captandum argument, as applied to this bill, because it introduces no new principle in this respect. Is it meant that, under this bill, we should have two currencies in law, or two in fact? The former cannot be contended, because the bill does not legalize any paper currency, either for the Government or the people. The objection then is nothing more than this: that, under this bill, there will be two currencies, one receivable for the public dues, and another not receivable, but which may circulate among the people, if they see fit to take it and pay it out; but there is nothing in the bill, or any law of Congress, that requires them to do so. But this distinction is not created by this bill: it has always existed since the foundation of the Government. It existed previous to the late Bank of the United States, and was inscribed on the face of the charter of that bank, which made the notes of that institution legally receivable for the public dues, whilst the notes of other banks were not so receivable. That charter, also, like the substitute of the Senator from Virginia, conferred on the bank the power of creating two currencies, by determining what bank notes should be receivable for the public dues, and what not. It would do for the bank to create two currencies, one for itself and the Government, and another for the people: this was very proper.

I have already incidentally alluded to the very extraordinary objection, that this bill contains the seeds of a Treasury bank. After having proposed a substitute for this bill which is on its face a Treasury bank, it is a little surprising that an objection like this should be urged with so much zeal and pertinacity by the author of that very substitute. But what foundation is there for this charge? What approximation has this bill to a bank, either a Treasury bank, or any other bank? What are the essential functions of a bank? There are three—to receive deposites, to make loans and discounts, and to issue bills of credit. Does the financial system provided for in the bill contain either of these essential functions of a bank? Not one of them, and no features that have any approximation to either of those principles. The principal argument to prove that this system is, or would become, a bank, is the provision authorizing the Secretary of the Treasury to draw on the receivers general and other depositaries for the payment of the public dues, in pursuance of legal appropriations, or for transfer of the public funds from one branch treasury to another. These drafts, it is said, will form a currency. But is this a new principle? Has it not always existed, and is it not inseparable from every financial plan? Take it away, and you have the strange anomaly of laws for collecting and placing money in the Treasury, but no means of drawing it out, even to pay the debts of the Government.

But this bill contains a section designed expressly to prevent these drafts being circulated even to the extent they now are, or heretofore have been. It makes it the duty of the Secretary of the Treasury to fix the time in which the drafts shall be presented for payment, having regard to the distance.

And what else is relied upon to prove that this system is a bank? Why, there are to be vaults and safes for the security of the funds, and this is the very machinery of a bank. What! shall the Government erect vaults, or provide safes! That will be encroaching on the prerogatives of the banks, and is conclusive evidence the Government is turning banker!

It is further said that President Jackson, in his second message, recommended a Treasury bank, founded on the revenues and credit of the Government; a plan which none of his friends approved, and which he afterwards abandoned himself; and yet that fact proves that this bill is a bank, although it has not one of the features contained in that plan. And we are also told that the Secretary of the Treasury, at the called session, suggested a scheme for issuing Treasury notes on the credit of the United States, and an assigned fund. But this suggestion met with no favor, and had no principle in common with this bill, and yet it is evidence that the system recommended by the committee is a bank, or will grow into one.

The old threadbare and bugbear story of Executive influence, is the last objection I will notice. After what I have said of the substitute on this point, I cannot spend my breath on this objection. The comparison of the two systems, as respects their bearing on the power and patronage of the Executive, is like comparing the scratch of the skin to a deadly and mortal wound. The increase of patronage and power by the bill, is the addition of four officers and a few clerks. Must not that be truly alarming? There is no control over the public funds given either to the President or Secretary, more than they now have; and as to the receivers general and other depositaries, the bill expressly takes from them the dangerous power of using and loaning the public revenues, which is now possessed by the existing depositaries. But the Senator from Virginia still insists that his prophecy is fulfilling, as this bill confers on the Executive greater patronage than that which passed the Senate at the late session. But what was the Senator's prediction? It was that a swarm of fifty thousand receivers general, and other officers, would spring from this measure, as he alleged was the case in France, which would consume the substance of the people. He compared it to a mustard seed, the smallest of all seeds; yet, when it grew, extended its roots through the soil, threw up a large trunk with branches which overshadowed the land, on which swarms of cormorants might light and devour all the fruits of the earth. How is this prophecy fulfilled? Why, the grain of mustard seed has germinated; it has thrown up a small stem, with four small branches, and a few leaves—four officers and a few clerks. This is the fulfilment of the prediction; this is the swarm of fifty thousand receivers who were to harrass the people and devour their substance. And yet the Senator says this is not soaring on the wings of imagination, but is the language of truth and soberness.

Mr. President, I have now examined the substitute and the bill, and endeavored to show that the first would produce a dangerous connection between the Government and the banking system injurious to both, and instead of benefitting, would increase the disorders of the currency. I have attempted to prove that the plan proposed by the bill is practicable, that bank agency is not necessary, and that the public revenues, under that system, would be safer than if deposited in banks.

I now propose to suggest some reasons why this Government ought not to connect itself with the banking system of the country in any form, either State or National. This connection has been dissolved by the act of the banks. Shall it be restored in any form? This is the true issue here, and before the country. To decide this important question it is necessary not only to look at the present condition of the banks, but we must go back and see what they once were, and trace their downward course. We must examine the principles of the system, and see if they have not rapidly deteriorated; and whether, if it is not radically reformed, it is not speedily approaching its final catastrophe.

Sir, I understand the object perfectly well. I know why it is that the bank party are so anxious to connect this Government with the banking system. It is to bring to its aid the revenues, the credit, the power, and the influence of this Government, to sustain and uphold this system as it is, with all its abuses, its corruptions, and fatal tendencies, and to prevent that reform in the system which the people desire and the best interests of the country demand.

My friend from New Hampshire (Mr. HUBBARD) said he was friendly to the State banks, that he had a large interest in them, and would be the last man to do any thing to their injury. I am also friendly to the banks now we have them, and have some interest in them; and I will endeavor to show my friendship for them in the way that has always been regarded as the highest evidence of a true friend—by calling attention to their abuses, by pointing out the defects in the principles of the system, its rapid degeneracy; and by warning the public that, unless it is speedily reformed and brought back to its original principles, it cannot go on much longer; that another and final explosion will soon be experienced, which will spread ruin and desolation over the country.

The present state of the banks is one of doubt and uncertainty; no one knows what their real condition is, or what change a single day may produce; and, of course, little confidence can be placed in them. Their statements of their affairs are entitled to no reliance; they are often false lights that only tend to allure us on to the breakers. All we see or know of the banks is an outside view. We see their marble walls, which are often like whitened sepulchres—a fair outside, but within are filled with dead men's bones. They are like the ox of Prometheus, "a sleek, well-stuffed hide, filled with all mannner of rubbish, goodly to look at, but containing nothing to eat." In many of the States they are now existing either without law or in opposition to law. They have virtually thrown off the authority of the Legislatures which created them, and now form a sort of commonwealth, and have assumed the power of governing themselves. They are holding conventions, and forming combinations, for their control and government. The "Suffolk Alliance" at Boston is one of these combinations, intended to control the whole of the banks in the Eastern States. This was originally a forced alliance by the Suffolk Bank, which compelled the members of the association to pay tribute to that bank, for which they are to be remunerated by giving greater circulation to their notes, and by some sort of guarantee, or additional security, against loss on the bills of any of the banks of the association which may fail or get embarrassed. The object is to give greater security to the associated banks; as their bills are required to be redeemed at the Suffolk Bank, that institution is enabled to know when any one of the associated banks is in a doubtful or ticklish situation, and can take measures for the security of the banks of the association.

These associations are designed and calculated to give to the banks the rights of privileged creditors in the case of the failure of any one of the number. On the first evidence of the unsoundness of a bank, its assets are to be pledged, in some form, for the security of the associated banks; this, of course, leaves the public exposed to greater hazard, and would place the United States, either as a depositor or bill-holder, in the same situation. By the operation of this system, the whole assets of a broken bank may be swept away for the security of other banks, and nothing be left for individuals or the Treasury of the United States.

During the recent failures of the banks at Boston, it has been stated that certain doubtful banks have been required to give security, at sight, for its bills belonging to the associated banks, which had been received during the day. They dared not sleep upon them. Ought the Treasury of the United States to be connected with a system like this?

But other bank leagues are formed in other parts of the Union. The most formidable is that at Philadelphia, headed by the Pennsylvania Bank of the United States. That institution, from its immense capital, its almost unlimited credit at home and abroad, and reinforced by twenty-six millions of the resurrection notes of the defunct Bank of the United States, possesses a power over the monetary concerns of the country that is nearly irresistible. It controls all the other banks in Philadelphia, and is now attempting, with the aid of its alliance with the Bank of England, and command of British capital and credit, to make itself the head and centre of the entire banking system in the United States, and to control the whole at its pleasure.

It is authorized by its charter to establish bank agencies, which is nearly equivalent to the power it formerly possessed of establishing branches. It has bought up the Merchants Bank in New Orleans and the Insurance Bank in Georgia, and the officers and directors of these institutions are the mere nominees of an alien corporation, which has become the purchaser of them; and are much more, under the control of Mr. Biddle's bank, or rather Mr. Biddle himself, than the branches of the parent bank were before the expiration of the charter of the late Bank of the United States. The Merchants Bank has a capital of two millions, all of which, except thirty-five thousand dollars, is owned by Mr. Biddle's bank. The Merchants Bank has in its vaults about three hundred and seventy thousand dollars in specie, and possesses the bills of the other banks in New Orleans to the amount of one million two hundred and twenty-two thousand two hundred and thirty-five dollars, of which one million seventy-eight thousand dollars are against six banks, which exceeds their entire amount of specie; and thus places them at the feet of this branch of Mr. Biddle's bank, which can stop them at any moment. It has only about seven or eight thousand dollars of its own notes in circulation, so that it is wholly protected from any demands that can come against it. These immense resources of the Merchants Bank, amounting to about one million six hundred thousand dollars, appear to have been accumulated by putting into circulation the dead notes of the late Bank of the United States, which neither the Merchants Bank nor the Pennsylvania Bank is bound to redeem. It appears by a report of a committee of the Senate, which has just been read, that the bank has now in circulation more than six millions of these dead notes, which it is not bound to redeem, and still has about twenty millions in its possession, to be used as it may have occasion. The putting off of these notes is a gross fraud on the laws of the United States and on the public; and I rejoice that the committee have reported a bill making it an indictable offence, punishable by fine and imprisonment.

This soulless corporation, in the war it is carrying on against the Government and the currency, acts on true military principles. It has its strong fortress and principal force at Philadelphia, but establishes posts at advantageous points, where it throws in a strong force to watch and overawe the State banks, and keep up a harassing fire upon them, if they presume to act in a way not in strict compliance with the wishes of this great bank autocrat. This institution, which declared "that it intended to take the lead in resumption," is now, it seems to be admitted on all hands, the principal, if not the sole, obstacle to that measure. It controls all the banks in Philadelphia, and through the Merchants Bank, intends to control the banks at New Orleans. This is securing two important points; and it is now attempting to overawe the banks in New York which are disposed to resume, and have, in the true spirit of bank vassals, beseeched the great autocrat to consent to it. He treated their ambassadors politely, and feasted them; but refused to give his consent that the New York banks might resume paying their debts, and doing business on honest principles. The object of this institution no one can doubt. It desires to prolong the present state of things to favor its mercantile and moneyed operations, and to bring the people of the United States, through their "sufferings," to consent to restore and recharter that institution as a National Bank, with the monopoly of the public revenues.

It remains to be known whether a single institution can control the entire banking system of all the States. Such is the condition of the banks with regard to the resumption of specie payments—controlled by a single institution. Under circumstances like these, would it be wise or safe to connect our financial interests with a banking system like this?

But, sir, the banks do not resume the payment of their notes, and many of them are breaking. If it is not owing to the opposition of the Pennsylvania Bank of the United States, why do they not resume? The causes of their suspension are past; exchange is below par; the demand for specie, for exportation, has entirely ceased; and yet the banks refuse to resume. How can the public, or this Government, place confidence in them whilst they remain in this situation?

Some few banks have already resumed, and others may follow; the banks may resume in one section of the Union and not in others; this was the case during the late war and in 1818 and '19. The condition of the banks, and the currency they supply, is, and probably will be, very different in the several sections of the country. For this Government, then, to connect its financial affairs with them, is not to do equal and exact justice to the debtors and creditors of the United States, in all parts of the country. I have before me a statement of the present depreciation of the notes of what are regarded as solvent banks of the different States, in the city of New York, as compared with the notes of the banks of that city, they being from 3 to 4 per cent. below specie. The bills of the banks in Maine, New Hampshire, Vermont, Massachusetts, and Rhode Island, are at a discount of 2½ per cent.; those of Connecticut from ½ to 2½, Philadelphia 2, other Pennsylvania banks 3 to 4, Baltimore 3, District of Columbia 3, Virginia 3 to 4, North Carolina 5 to 6, South Carolina 4 to 5, Georgia 5 to 6, Florida 12 to 15, Alabama 8 to 10, Louisiana 5 to 7, Mississippi 12 to 15, Tennessee 15, Kentucky 5 to 6, Illinois 7 to 8, Indiana 7 to 8, Ohio 6 per cent. This difference in the local bank currencies is owing, in part, to the suspension of specie payments by the banks; but is by no means wholly to be ascribed to that cause, as all have suspended. It is mainly attributable to the balance of trade, and the amount of the issues of the banks.

As the payment of specie has long been only nominal, this bank currency has been of different values at all times. This is the case in England, where the notes of the Bank of England have a monopoly of the circulation in London and sixty miles round it: if that bank does not increase its issues when the joint stock banks in the country towns do, the currency in Lancashire and other counties depreciates below that in London.

All this goes to prove, that for the United States to collect and pay out any thing but specie, or its own credit, is to have several standards in the collection of its revenues and the payments of its debts. It violates the spirit of that provision in the Constitution, which requires that all duties and imports shall be uniform throughout all the States.

But, sir, I have not done with the present condition of the banks; and must beg the indulgence of the Senate to go into some details. I have some facts on this subject, some "crumbs of comfort for the chickens of the bank covenant," if I may be allowed to use the quaint language of a former age.

I have already alluded to some of the banks at New Orleans, and now propose to notice them a little more in detail; not that I think the banks there are in a worse condition than many others; as we are told not to regard those on whom the tower of Saloam fell as sinners above all other men.

There are in New Orleans sixteen banks, with a capital, said to be paid in, of 37,000,000 of dollars. In June last their entire discounts on personal security amounted to 34,000,000 dollars, their specie to 2,000,000, being seventeen dollars in bills to one in specie. By an investigation lately made, by the authority of the Legislature, it appears that twenty-nine directors of eight of the banks, or houses, in which those directors were concerned, had received loans to the amount of nearly 7,000,000 dollars, being more than one-fifth of the entire loans in that great commercial city. This shows in what sense the banks constitute the people. If the few individuals who direct them, and monopolize themselves a large portion of their funds, constitute the people, then the banks are the people, and to separate the Government from the banks, will be to separate it from the people.

We have already noticed the condition of the Merchants Bank, and the power which it holds over six, and, in a less degree, over all the other banks in New Orleans. The New Orleans banks, at the time of their suspension, had 10,429,210 dollars in protested notes, of which there has since been paid 1,151,487 dollars. By their own statement of their affairs in June, there appeared to be a deficiency in their assets to the amount of 3,715,000 dollars.

The Legislature of the State of Indiana have lately attempted to investigate the affairs of the State Bank and its branches, in which the State is a large stockholder. This attempt appears to have been resisted at first, and the president of the bank declared that an investigation would not be beneficial either to the bank or the State, or words to that effect. However, an investigation appears to have been made, at least into three of its branches, Indianapolis, Lawrenceburgh, and Lafayette. It appeared from this examination that these banks have been little better than mere shaving-shops. All of them had adopted the practice of declining to discount notes payable at the bank, and confined their operations to the discount of kites, or bills drawn on individuals or banks, when it was well known that the drawer had no funds in the hands of the drawee, and that he expected to take up the draft himself, and at the bank where discounted. On these bills a discount was taken, under a pretence of exchange, of from eight to thirteen per cent. Some or all of those banks have been in the practice of purchasing the depreciated bills of other States, at a discount of from two to five per cent. and passing them off at their counter at par. Whilst these banks were refusing to discount to others, except by shaving bills, the directors helped themselves to a large share of the funds of the banks. At the Lawrenceburgh branch, the loans to the directors, individually, and as partners of firms, averaged fifty-five thousand dollars; and, at the other branches, directors had drawn out from forty to sixty thousand dollars. A rule was adopted giving to stockholders loans to the full amount of their stock, which was afterwards extended to fifty per cent. beyond their stock. Under this rule, the favorite of the directors offered his note, say for five hundred dollars, with which he purchased five hundred dollars of stock; and when this note fell due, he lodged another note for seven hundred and fifty dollars, with which he took up his first note, and had two hundred and fifty dollars left, except the discount. This was certainly a convenient way to raise the wind. Can any one doubt that these banks constitute the people, and that to separate the Government from them would be to separate it from the people?

The Lumberman's Bank, in Pennsylvania, which recently failed, is another proof that the banks are the people. The board of directors adopted a rule to make loans on real estate securities; and in an exposition of the affairs of this bank, it is stated that one individual, and I presume a director, "gave a mortgage, without a bond, for $200,000, on about forty thousand acres of land in Cattaraugus county, New York, and the cashier afterwards gave up the notes on which this indebtedness was founded, on receiving the debtor's check for the amount." The mortgage was subsequently rescinded, and the notes returned.

The rule referred to was afterwards changed, so as to authorize any agent of the bank to make loans on the security of real estate; and one of the directors executed a mortgage, without a bond, on the undivided half of certain building lots; and, on the strength of this security, he withdrew, with the consent of the teller, a large amount of his individual and joint liabilities to the bank, in notes and otherwise.

In December last, the president and cashier of the bank made a report to the Legislature, under oath, that the bank had cash funds to the amount of $270,000, which included the aforesaid mortgage of $200,000; and on the failure of the bank, it is found that it had specie in its vaults to the enormous amount of twenty-five dollars in silver, and one hundred dollars in cents.

The failure of this bank, which has contributed its mite to the disorders of the currency, has no doubt, in the opinion of our currency doctors, been occasioned by the "experiments" of the late Administration, in "tampering" with the currency.

Mr. President, I am aware that these details are tedious, yet I have a few more "crumbs of comfort" in relation to the banks of the good old Commonwealth of Massachusetts, a State justly distinguished for its wealth and the enterprise of its citizens; and surely its banking system ought to be sound to the core, as it has been entirely free from the "tampering" measures of the late Administration, as the bank party have had the undisputed direction of its councils, for a "time, whereof the memory of man runneth not to the contrary." But, strange as it may seem, the banks in this State are in a very bad way; several of them have recently gone the way of all the earth, and others appear to be in a quick consumption, which threatens soon to carry them off. Of the former are the Chelsea, Lafayette, Commonwealth, Middlesex, and Franklin. Two of these, I believe, were deposite banks. The bills of the Commonwealth Bank are said to be at a discount of thirty per cent. and some of the others to be but little better than continental money. The cold winds blowing from the pine lands in Maine, seems to have thrown these banks into the quick consumption which carried them off very rapidly; and some of them appear to have always had very feeble and slender constitutions, which could not stand the rude shock of the times. The following banks have been suspected of having the same fatal disease: the American, Kilby, Hancock,

Commercial, and Fulton. On a recent examination by a committee of the Legislature, a trunk in one of the banks in Boston, said to contain $70,000, was found to have but $41,550; and in another bank, a trunk containing $260,000 in securities appears to be in the "receptacle of lost things upon earth."

Indeed the cholera, or some other epidemic appears to be prevailing among the banks of Massachusetts, and I think it will be well for us to keep clear of them, until this disease has left them, and we can see how many survive its ravages. I really hope that the learned currency doctors in that State will be able to administer the proper remedies, and arrest the progress and spreading of that fatal disease.

Mr. President, having made some suggestions, as to the present condition of the banks, I now propose to notice some defects in the system, and to show the rapid degeneracy and deterioration of its principles. This is an extensive field, and I only propose to point out some of the prominent defects in the system, without goining into any discussion of the subject. And as a preliminary observation in this inquiry, I will quote the remark of the learned and able Governor of Massachusetts, contained in his recent message. He says: "it cannot be denied that the sound principles of banking have been WIDELY DEPARTED from, and that a mode of establishing and conducting banks has grown up, abusive and dangerous in the extreme."

This, sir, is precisely what I contend, that the original sound and safe principles of banking have been not only disregarded, but "widely departed from," and that a mode of establishing and conducting banks, has grown up abusive and dangerous in the extreme. And would it be wise or safe for this Government to connect itself with such a system?

I will endeavor to show that this opinion of Governor Everett is entirely correct. Our system of banking, it is well known, had its origin in the early banks of deposite, and particularly the Bank of Amsterdam. These banks originally loaned their deposites, which were real money. Afterwards, when the system was changed, and banks possessed a capital independent of their deposites, they loaned their capital and deposites; and some of them, particularly the Bank of Amsterdam, issued certificates of deposites, which passed from hand to hand as a substitute, or representation of the money actually in deposite in the bank. This was the origin of bank notes, which originally really represented the same amount of specie in the bank.

The first banks in the United States were based on this fundamental principle. The charter of the Bank of Massachusetts, the first incorporated in that State, contains the following provision:

"That the total amount of all the promissory notes (or bills) of the corporation shall at no time exceed double the amount of its capital stock in gold and silver actually deposited in the bank, and held to answer the demands of the same."

This was the original principle of banking in this country, which was, that the capital of the bank was not only to consist of gold and silver, but to be kept in the bank for the redemption of their bills. But this principle has been gradually departed from, and, for some years, entirely disregarded. The banks now loan their entire capital and their deposites; and within a few years have extended thair loans greatly beyond both capital and deposites.

To show how rapidly the system has degenerated into a mere open, naked system of credit, I beg to present a statement of the condition of the banks of the United States at two recent periods, taken from a report of the Secretary of the Treasury, made at the last regular session of Congress. In 1830, the capital of the banks in the United States was 145,192,268 dollars, and their deposites 55,559,928, making 201,752,196 dollars. Their loans were 200,451,214 dollars, nearly two millions less than their capital and deposites.

In 1836 the capital of the banks in the United States was $251,875,292, and their deposites $115,104,440, making an aggregate of $366,979,732; and their loans were $457,506,089, being an excess of loans over their capital and deposites both, of $90,526,247. This, sir, is what I suppose is called the "credit system." We here see, that in 1836, the banks loaned nearly one hundred millions of dollars, without any basis whatever to sustain it, unless it was "confidence." This may be called fog credit. Indeed, the deposites did not belong to the banks, as they were indebted for them to the depositors, so that the banks actually loaned, over and above their capital, $205,629,797. And because banks resting on a foundation as rotten as this have exploded, it is charged upon the measures of the Administration in "tampering" with the currency. The interest taken by banks is nearly seven per cent. so that the banks, during the year 1836, received from the people, for loans over and beyond their capital the sum of $14,398,450.

In January, 1837, the capital of the banks in the United States had increased to $286,225,990, and their loans to $522,891,461, being an excess over their capital of $236,565,471, the annual interest of which was $16,559,782, paid by the public for bank credit, resting on no other foundation than confidence.

I have said that the original and sound principle of banking, which required that banks should keep their capital, or a reasonable portion of it, in their vaults in specie, has, within the last few years, been "widely departed from," which has occasioned the present derangement of the currency and credit of the country. I will now submit some additional facts in support of this position. Mr. Gallatin, and other writers on finance, consider the deposites in banks as a part of their circulation, as much as their bills, because these deposites are placed in banks, instead of being retained in the hands of depositors, and are drawn out by checks, instead of being paid out of their own chests. The circulation of the banks in 1836, in bills, was $140,301,038, and their deposites $115,104,440, making a bank currency of $255,405,478, which, added to the metallic currency, estimated at $80,000,000, give a totality of $335,405,498, which is at least fifty per cent. more than the entire currency which the country requires, or can maintain in a sound state. The Secretary of the Treasury estimated the requisite currency for this country at only $110,000,000, which, perhaps, is rather too low. England, with a population one-third larger, and commerce exceeding that of the United States by three hundred per cent. has a paper currency of about thirty millions sterling, and a metallic currency of about the same amount, being in all about $260,000,000. This is without including bank deposites. In January, 1837, the circulation of the banks was $151,303,120, and their specie $38,703,995, according to their own returns; and in 1836 their specie was $40,019,594. These sums, however, are no doubt greatly beyond their actual amount of gold and silver, as the banks, many, if not all of them, designate specie funds, em racing checks, etc. as specie. This would make the bank circulation, in 1837, about seven and a half to one, of their specie.

But if we look at the condition of the banks in the different States, we shall find that the proportion of paper must be vastly greater. By a late report, it appears that the issues of the banks in Pennsylvania, were ten to one of their specie; in Connecticut last March, the circulation was ten to one, and circulation and deposites thirteen to one of specie; the circulation of the banks in New Orleans last June was seventeen to one. In July, forty-seven banks in New York, west and north of the Hudson, had a circulation of fourteen to one, and circulation and deposites of eighteen to one. In July, 1837, the deposite banks in Tennessee, Alabama, Mississippi, and Louisiana, as appears by their returns to the Secretary of the Treasury, had a circulation, including private deposites, of eighteen to one of specie.

The degeneracy of the banking system has been no where more rapid than in Massachusetts, considering the real wealth and solid capital of that State. In 1812, there were twenty-four banks in the State, which possessed specie to the amount of about three millions of dollars, and a circulation of only about the same amount. The fact that the banks of that State redeemed their bills in specie, when those in New York and south of them did not, accounts for the small amount of their circulation. Now there are in that State one hundred and twenty-nine banks, with a circulation of about 10,000,000, and 1,500,000 in specie. The proportion of bills in circulation by the banks of the different counties, to their specie, is as follows: In Suffolk county, (Boston) 4 to 1; Middlesex, 11 to 1; Worcester, 18 to 1; Franklin, 17 to 1; Hampden, 19 to 1; Berkshire, 15 to 1; Norfolk, 19 to 1; Bristol, 19 to 1; Plymouth, 16 to 1; Barnstable, 16 to 1; Nantucket, 11 to 1; and Hampshire, 41 to 1 of specie.

Mr. President, is it not apparent that from this view, and from the condition and management of the banks of the several States, that they have degenerated into an open, naked credit system, and that their whole operations are nothing more than an exchange of their own credit for that of individuals? Their own credit, which costs them nothing, they sell to the public for nearly seven per cent. interest. Can it be surprising that such a system should have led to a rapid expansion of the currency, and have stimulated private credit to a most dangerous point! These are facts, sir, and they prove the source and nature of that "tampering" with the currency, which has been so unjustly and absurdly charged upon the late Administration.

As long as bank notes represented specie, to some reasonable extent, it was supposed that their circulation would not be increased beyond the specie circulation which they displaced and withdrew from use.

A profound writer on currency says:

"The whole paper money of every kind, which can easily be circulated in any country, never can exceed the gold and silver of which it supplies the place, or which (the commerce being the same) would circulate there, if there was no paper money. Should the circulating paper at any time exceed that sum, as the excess could neither be sent abroad, nor be employed in the circulation of the country, it must immediately return upon the bank to be exchanged for gold and silver!"—Wealth of Nations, vol. i, page 204.

Such were the views of Adam Smith, the philosopher of merchants and bankers. His opinions were essentially just, as long as bank issues were actually based on specie; but since they have become mere bank credits, nothing can be more erroneous. Instead of its being true that bank notes will circulate only to the same extent that specie would, they operate on the community like a drug, exciting and stimulating it, and thus create a facutious demand for money, which goes on increasing in the same ratio that bank issues are increased, until a reaction ensues, as it must be, with a dreadful revulsion.

Sir, I will barely notice some other defects in the principles of the banking system as at present conducted, but cannot enlarge on them:

First, It confers on private corporations the power of emitting or coining paper money, and thus supplying a currency, without any responsibility, and with no other principle to regulate this important prerogative but their own judgment of what is for their own interest It is now the almost universal opinion in England, that this is too important a power to be entrusted to irresponsible corporations, interested to abuse it; and it is insisted, both by the partisans of the National Bank, and of the joint stock banks, that it should be taken away, even from the Bank of England, and confided to commissioners, responsible to the Government and the people.

The Edinburgh Review for April, 1837, in an able article on the state of the currency, says: "We had, and we may depend upon it shall continue to have, if the present system be maintained, a constant alternation of glut and deficiency. At one time, money is sure to be in excess, confidence blind and indiscriminating, and prices high; and at another time, money is sure to be deficient, distrust universal, and prices low. It is not easy to exaggerate the evils inseparable from such alternations; they go far to convert industrious undertakings into mere gambling speculations, and render it impossible, even for the most prudent individuals engaged in business, to form, at any time, any distinct notion of what may be their state twelve months hence. The history of the country, from 1790 down to the present day, teems with examples of what now has been stated. It is, however, very difficult for those not familiar with the circumstances, to form any adequate notion of the sudden and powerful operation of fluctuations, even in districts not peculiarly within the sphere of their operation.

So long as any individual, or set of individuals, how bankrupt soever in fortune or character, may usurp the royal prerogative, and issue money without let or hindrance, so long will it be issued in excess, in periods when prices are rising, and confidence high; and be suddenly and improperly withdrawn, when prices are falling, and confidence shaken. All the causes of fluctuation inherent in the nature of industry, are aggravated a thousand fold by this vicious system, at the same time that it brings many new ones into existence. There is not, in fact, any room for supposing that, had our currency been either metallic, or made to fluctuate exactly as it would had it been metallic, the difficulties in which we have been, and continue to be, involved, would never have been heard of.

"Now to accomplish this radical cure, that is, to make sure that the fluctuations shall not in future exceed those that would occur were it wholly metallic, it is indispensable that all local notes be suppressed, and the issue of paper be confined to one body. Nothing short of this can be of any essential service. The exacting of security previous to the issuing of notes, would not hinder that competition among issuers that is the bane of the present system, nor prevent their being at one time in excess, and at another time deficient. Mr. Lloyd, whose authority on all questions of this sort is so deservedly high, states distinctly that an adherence to sound principles would certainly lead to the conclusion that the issues of paper money should be confined to one body, entrusted with full power and control over the issues, and made exclusively responsible for the due regulation of their amount. He suggests that, for this purpose, the business of the issue of money, by the bank, should be entirely separated from its other business; that its superintendence should be committed to a committee of currency, chosen from among the directors, and that a representative of the Government should be present at all its deliberations. We see nothing in this that could be objected to; and if the Government commissioner had, as he ought to have, a veto on all the proposals for adding to the issues, the public would have every necessary security for the proper working of the system, and the avoidance of all manner of fluctuations."

The author of this extract is evidently friendly to the Bank of England, yet he charges all the ruinous fluctuations in the currency to the unregulated issue of notes by that institution, and the joint stock banks; and contends that this great evil can in no other way be cured than by confining the issue of notes to one body, and subjecting that to the control of a commissioner, who should be responsible to the public for the faithful discharge of the trust. This opinion is general with all parties in England, as will appear from other periodicals which I may have occasion to refer to. In that country they attribute the "tampering" with the currency to the proper source—the unregulated issues of the banks.

The second defect in the system, which I will notice, is the connection which it establishes between the currency and private credit. They both flow and return to the same fountain, and thus act and react upon each other. Private credit now springs from the banks, and when from any cause it receives an unusual stimulus, the effect is to expand the currency, and the expansion of the currency gives an additional impetus to private credit, and when, from any cause, private credit is curtailed, the bank currency is contracted. With a metallic currency the rule would be directly the reverse; an increased demand for private credit would make money scarce, and this would tend to check such demand.

Third: The convertibility of bank notes is said to be a test of their security, and to serve to regulate the issues of the banks. But since their issues have become mere bills of credit, it is neither. The convertibility of bank notes is merely nominal, and is no check on their issues, and no evidence of the solvency of banks. We see that the moment the boasted convertibility of bank issues becomes any thing more than nominal, the banks stop payment. What the banks regard as paying their bills in specie is nothing more than this: they will agree to pay specie, provided the public will agree not to demand it of them. This is the extent of this boasted principle of the convertibility of bank paper That it is no security, and no test as to the solvency of banks, is evident, as most of the banks which have failed in the United States have redeemed their bills in specie, nominally, the same that other institutions have done, down to the very day of their explosion, although many of them have been entirely rotten. The Commonwealth and other broken banks in Massachusetts were as rotten last May, before their suspension, as at any time since.

The fourth objection to the currency supplied by banks is its insecurity. In England two hundred and forty banks failed in 1815; and in 1825, seventy failed, with a circulation of ten millions of dollars, a large portion of which was entirely destroyed, and the loss thrown upon the community. In 1830, Mr. Gallatin gave a list of one hundred and sixty banks which had failed in the United States, having a capital of thirty millions of dollars, and a circulation probably of half that amount, which was either entirely lost, or subjected to a ruinous depreciation. Since then, there cannot have been less than forty banks which have failed, with a capital of from five to ten millions of dollars.

Sir, I cannot pursue this investigation. We have borrowed our banking system from England; and in support of the objections here stated, and to show the estimation in which the system is held there, where they have a National Bank as a "regulator" of the system, I will beg to read some further extracts from English publications, by which it will be seen that all parties in that country have come to the conclusion that the system has become intolerable—that it cannot go on as it is, or without a radical reform.

The London Courier, which is the ablest advocate of the Bank of England, says:

"We have now, including their branches, got above three hundred joint stock banks, most of which issue notes, in full operation; and so many paper mints, operating without any check or control, other than their own estimate of what is best for themselves, will not be long, after getting fairly under weigh, in gorging the circulation, and bringing on a recoil. At this moment, there are, including private banks, little short of one thousand paper mints established in England, over which neither the Government nor the public has any kind of control whatever. These mints are conducted on no uniform or consistent principle. Their management is a matter that belongs entirely to themselves, and may be either prudent or absurd, honest or knavish; so that whilst they are nearly useless for any good purpose, they are omnipotent for mischief.

"The state of our monetary system is at present the prime evil in our social condition: and till it undergoes a root and branch reform, industrious undertakings will be little else than gambling on a large scale, and national prosperity only the first step to national distress and ruin."

The London Morning Chronicle is on the opposite side of the question in that country, and charges the disorders in the currency to the misconduct of the Bank of England, yet agrees as to the principle that banks cannot be safely entrusted with the prerogative of issuing and regulating the currency.

"Having thus established the responsibility of the Bank of England, and having previously shown the causes of its total unfitness for the office with which it has been entrusted by the State, it would seem that the very statement of the nature of the disease, would suggest its remedy. This remedy can only consist in depriving the bank entirely of the powers which it exercises over the currency of the country, and placing these in other and responsible hands.

"The great bulk of the trading people, even of this country, are perfectly ignorant of the cause of the violent fluctuations to which their property is constantly subjected, and by which their business is interrupted, and rendered a gambling speculation, rather than a quiet trade. If the sufferers knew to WHAT CAUSES to attribute their misfortunes, this cause could not exist for six months longer: the attempt to perpetuate it would produce a REBELLION."

To these I add the opinions of the distinguished financier, Sampson Ricardo, and Horsely Palmer, president of the bank, and that profound statesman, the late Mr. Huskisson:

"As directors," says Mr. Ricardo, "of a joint stock company, they (the directors) have to obtain the greatest possible advantages for their proprietors. As regulators of the currency, they have to protect the interests of the community. The performance of these two duties may not always be compatible; and measures conducive to the benefit of the public may be impeded in their execution, by the necessity they involve of a sacrifice on the part of the bank shareholders."

During the past year, the Bank of England has been severely censured for the disorders in the currency, which many have charged upon that bank; others threw the blame on the joint stock banks. Mr. Lloyd published a pamphlet, maintaining that the Bank of England was mainly responsible; to which Horsely Palmer replied, and attempted to defend the bank. The following just remarks from his pamphlet are quite as applicable to this country as to England. Here, as well as there, "some remarkable errors have prevailed as to the mode of maintaining the value of paper money," which, if suffered to continue, cannot fail of perpetuating the evils we now experience. The president of the Bank of England says:

"Some remarkable errors have pervaded, and still continue to influence the public mind, as to the mode of maintaining the value of paper money, and that a system prevails, which, if persevered in, can hardly fail of multiplying all the evils resulting from those variations of the currency to which we have lately been exposed."

Mr. Huskinsson, it seems, had not so exalted an opinion of paper money, resting on 'confidence,' as some honorable Senators seem to entertain:

"If there ever was a proposition universally true, it is that a system of paper currency progressive in its nature, and resting either upon the authority of the State or the confidence o ne people, will, if unchecked, ultimately lead to the subversion of all property."

To this mass of testimony against the wretched paper currency of England, I will add the report adopted at a public meeting at Birmingham last October, composed of thirteen thousand persons, without distinction of parties:

"Your committee feel it their painful duty to state that the distress to this town and neighborhood is very great; that they see no reason to anticipate any speedy or effectual relief. The alternations of great apparent prosperity, and sudden deep distress, which have invariably attended the expansion or contraction of the currency, prove, beyond doubt, that to our monetary system is mainly to be attributed the present general and alarming distress. In the opinion of your committee, no permanent relief can be given while that system, which has been proved so liable to fluctuations, is suffered to continue. Your committee cannot but express its decided conviction that the effectual and permanent relief of the general distress, is a question paramount to all others; and that nothing can accomplish this great and important object but such a revision of our present laws as shall tend to the adoption of a monetary system adequate to the wants of this great commercial community."

This report, together with a petition to Parliament, embracing its principles, was adopted by the meeting without opposition.

These opinions of the political writers and enlightened statesmen in England, of all parties, show the condition of the banking and paper money system in that country. They prove that, by universal sentiment, it is regarded as the fruitful source of all those ruinous revulsions in trade and manufacturing. That there is no confidence in the fitness or safety of the Bank of England as a "regulator" of the paper currency. The very remedy for the disorder which they propose, is to deprive this regulator of all power over the currency—to take from it the prerogative of issuing notes. And by recent intelligence, it is said, that a proposition to that effect is soon to be brought before Parliament. Sir, let the people of the United States seriously reflect on these facts. We have borrowed our banking system from England; and at the very time that the people there are convinced that the system is so bad, that if it was generally known to be "the cause of the evils which flow from it, it would be impossible to perpetuate it six months longer without producing a rebellion," a powerful party are striving to establish a National Bank as a remedy for the evils here, which there are charged upon a similar institution. To remedy the evils of our system, it is proposed to establish a National Bank to "regulate" the currency; and, as a remedy for the evils of a similar system there, it is proposed to deprive their National Bank of all power over the currency. If the enlightened men in England are not entirely mistaken as to the workings of their own system, then surely there must be "some remarkable errors prevailing in this country as to the mode of maintaining the value of paper money," as well as in England.

Sir, from this hasty view of the present condition of our banking system, and brief examination of its principles, is it not apparent, that it would be neither wise nor prudent for this Government to renew its connection with it? The separation has been effected by the banks, and shall we seek for a reunion? Shall we again connect our finances with a system which has twice been tried and failed; which subjects them to all the embarrassments, fluctuations, and uncertainties that belong to, and are inseperable to it? Shall we connect the destinies of this youthful Republic, with a system, the recently failure of which, has deranged the concerns of the Government and the country—a system over which we have no control, which is now on a rapid downward course—which, from the deterioration of its principles, must in all human probability, unless speedily and radically reformed, soon experience its last, its final catastrophe?

Mr. President: I am aware that I have already occupied too much of the time of the Senate, yet I cannot close without making a few remarks on the present condition of the currency of the country. All admit that our currency is in a very disjointed and disordered state; but it must not be supposed that the derangement of it originated in May last, from the failure of the banks; that was only the last stage, (if indeed we have reached the last stage) of the disease. Its derangement has been going on for some years, and rapidly since November, 1834, when the banks of the United States commenced a rapid expansion, in which all the other banks followed; and this expansion went on unchecked, until some months previous to the explosion last May.

The disordered state of our currency, and the deplorable consequences of it upon all interests and all classes, are questions about which there is no controversy; the only difference of opinion is, as to the causes of this disorder, and the remedy for it. By one portion of our citizens, it is considered as the natural result of our unregulated banking and paper system; and by another, it is boldly and confidently charged upon the measures of the late Administration. This is a question of the highest importance: it is necessary to investigate the origin and cause of the difficulty, in order to prescribe a remedy. The skill of the physician, and the success of his prescriptions, depend on his investigating the true cause of the disease. A superficial examination will not answer. He must not be content with looking at the tongue, and feeling of the pulse; but he must go back to the first symptoms, and must inquire into the constitution and habits of the patient. This is equally necessary in investigating the causes of the disorders of our currency. And the first step in this inquiry is, to understand what our currency is. To talk about any subject without definite and precise ideas, as to what the subject is, is merely to bandy words.

The word "currency" sounds well to the ear. It is a very soft and sonorous term, but one to which very different ideas are attached. It is a term having no constitutional or legal meaning, for it is not in the Constitution, and I believe can hardly be found in any of our laws. The currency of the country has for several years been a most fruitful subject for declamation, here and elsewhere, by those who seem very careful not to inform us what they mean by currency. I have heard many eloquent and powerful speeches on the subject of the currency from the Senator from Massachusetts, (Mr. WEBSTER.) He has had much to say about the power and duty of this Government in regard to the currency, about the neglect to exercise that power and discharge that high and responsible duty; and, although no man uses language more clear, perspicuous, and forcible, to convey his ideas, still, after all I have heard from him, I do not know that I understand what his opinions are on this subject. I should not dare to undertake to state them, for fear I should be charged with misrepresenting them. I have reason to believe that he has some pecular notions on this subject, or as to the power and duty of this Government in relation to the currency. I have reason to believe that he is the author of those modern doctrines in regard to the currency, which, instead of tending to enlighten and settle the public mind, have only contributed to involve it in greater uncertainty and confusion. Now, sir, if the gentleman would only be so good as to inform us what he means by currency, we can judge much better in respect to the powers and duties of Congress in relation to it. We can then decide much better on the question as to the cause of the disorders he so forcibly describes, and the remedy for those disorders.

What are we to understand by the currency of the country? Gold and silver are the only constitutional currency. Something more than this is embraced in the term. And what more? It is not a legal currency that is spoken of. It must, then, be a currency in fact or an actual currency. And what are we to understand is the actual currency in the United States? Does it embrace bills of exchange, promissory notes, and other mercantile paper? Is it the duty of Congress to take care of these? or is it limited to the notes or bills issued by banks? I shall assume that this is what is intended. The currency, then, of the country consists of gold and silver and the issues of the State banks, as we have now no National Bank. This is the currency; and which portion of it is disordered, the coin or the paper? It is not, I believe, contended that the coin is depreciated or disordered, but it is, or has been, maintained that the increase of the coin has contributed to derange the paper currency; but it is the bank note currency which is in disorder and depreciated.

We have now something tangible, and can enter upon the inquiry into the causes which have tended to the disorder of the bank note currency. It has been, and is claimed, that this is chargeable upon the measures of the late Administration, which it is asserted, has been trying "experiments" and "tampering" with the currency. These charges, first coming from the great bank autocrat, have been repeated and enlarged upon by the bank orators in Congress; from whence they have spread over the country, and rung ten thousand changes through the bank presses. These charges have been made with such boldness and confidence, and have been so often repeated here, and elsewhere, that a large portion of the people no doubt honestly believe them.

But are they true? I do not hesitate to say, that they are not; they have not even the shadow of foundation on which to rest; that they are wholly unsupported, and absurd upon their very face; for this simple, yet conclusive reason, that this Government has no power over the State banks, or the currency which they supply.

But what were the measures or "experiments," if that language is preferred, of the late Administration in relation to the currency? The only measures designed to operate on the currency, were two; the one to increase the specie, and the other through the revenue to induce the deposite banks to diminish their papere issues, and discontinue the issue of small bills. And which of these, or was it the united influence of the two, that has deranged the bank note currency? To decide this question, we must inquire what has been, and is the difficulty with the banks? The difficulty is, that they have extended their loans and their issues too much. This is not, and cannot be denied. But the policy of the Administration was to diminish their issues, and increase the specie in the country, which might form a basis for their issues. How then can it be said, that this policy of the Administration conduced to the disorder of the bank paper currency? One of these measures, the increase of specie succeeded; the other, the diminution of paper, did not succeed. But the Administration had no power over that subject; it could not control the State banks; it did not attempt to control them; it only sought to reform them, or make it for their interest to diminish their issues. In that it failed; the banks went on to extend, and expanding their paper issues, until they finally exploded. And, therefore, it is contended, that because the Administration could not restrain the banks in their headlong carreer, it is responsible for all the disorders which have ensued. Is this sound reasoning? Is it honest? Let us take a parallel case to illustrate it. We have in most parts of the country, temperance societies, which, I believe, have done much good. Some of them aim at total abstinence from all strong drinks; others at abstinence in a more limited sense. Their efforts have succeeded to a certain extent; but to make the cases more parallel, let us suppose that their laudable exertions had entirely failed, and that intemperance had increased rather than decreased since these societies were formed. According to the reasoning applied to the currency, these societies are responsible for this increase of intemperance; they are the cause of it; they have been trying "experiments" with temperance, they have been "tampering" with it. If they had not interfered with it, if they had not attempted to restrain this beastly vice, it would have prevailed less. Their "experimeats" on sobriety have increased debauchery; and if a worthless sot is seen drunk in the streets, you must reproach the temperance societies, and say to them, behold the glorious results of your experiments, and tampering with temperance.

Such is the absurdity of that reasoning by which many of the people of this country have been deceived and deluded into the belief that it was the measures of the Administration which blew up the paper bubble so that it has burst.

There is no escape from this view of the subject, unless it be contended that the increase of specie has been the cause of the paper expansion. And such has been the infatuation, that some who have been the most rabid in relation to paper money, have maintained a proposition so preposterous. It would be trifling with the common sense of the country to discuss such a quesion. I will, however, give the opinions of two distinguished men on this point, who ought to be good authority with the bank party, as they were the advocates of a National Bank; and their opinions are taken from the very reports out of which the first and second National Bank originated. In his report recommending the first bank, in 1790, Alexander Hamilton says:

"But the last and heaviest charge is still to be examined: this is, that banks tend to banish the gold and silver of the country.

"The most common answer given to this is, that the thing supposed is of little or no consequence; that it is immaterial what serves the purpose of money, whether paper, or gold, or silver; that the effect of both on industry is the same.

"This answer is not destitute of solidity, although not entirely satisfactory. The positive and permanent increase of the precious metals in a country, can hardly ever be a matter of indifference. As the commodity taken in lieu of every other, is a species of the most effective wealth, as the money of the world, it is of great concern to the State that it possess a sufficiency of it to face any demands which the protection of its external interests may create."

In his currency report in December, 1815, Mr. Secretary Dallas says:

"But it is within the scope of a wise policy to create an additional demand for coin, and in that way to multiply the inducements to import and retain the metals of which it is composed. For instance: the excessive issue of bank paper has usurped the place of the national money; and under such circumstances, gold and silver will always continue to be treated as an article of merchandise; but it is hoped that the issue of bank paper will soon be reduced to its just share in the circulating medium of the country, and consequently that the coin of the United States will receive its legitimate capacity and character.

"And finally, such regulations may be imposed upon the exportation of gold and silver, as will serve in future to fix and retain the quantity required for domestic uses."

The measures for increasing the metallic currency consisted of the act of 1834, raising the standard of gold coin; in importing gold for French and Neapolitan indemnities; and the laws for increasing the operations of the Mint, and establishing branch Mints. These measures have been eminently successful, and increased the specie in the country from twenty-two millions to more than eighty millions of dollars.

We have noticed the only measures of the late Administration designed to operate on the currency, and to improve its soundness; or, to use the language of some, to give the country a "better currency." But there have been other measures, which are alleged to have had an injurious operation on the bank note currency. The principal of these are the refusal to recharter the United States Bank, and the removal of the revenues from that institution to the State banks. I will submit a few remarks on each of these measures. In regard to the first, it is a sufficient answer to say, that although the bank was not rechartered by Congress, it, unfortunately for the country, obtained a charter from Pennsylvania; and it was declared by its president that it was "safer and stronger" under its new charter than it had ever been. This was thought, at the time, to be a mere act of boasting on the part of the president; but experience has fully confirmed its truth. The present attitude of that bank, its agencies in this country and in Europe, show that it has probably at this moment more power over the monetary affairs of the country, than it ever had at any former period. How, then, has the refusal to recharter that bank tended to derange the paper and credit system? If the bank had wound up its affairs, as it ought to have done, and the present difficulties had occurred, there might have been some grounds for this charge; but as it is, there are none.

But it is alleged that the refusal to recharter this incorporation has been the principal cause of the rapid multiplication of State banks, and consequent expansion of the paper and credit system. It is a little extraordinary that this argument should be urged by the advocates of that system, and of its extension. But is there any soundness in the argument? It rests on two assumptions: one, that a National Bank will prevent the multiplication of State banks; and the other, that it will regulate and restrain their issues. These assumptions are unsupported either by principle or experience, but are in the face of both. If a National Bank will prevent the increase of State banks, why has it not done so? We have had a National Bank since 1791, with the exception of five or six years; yet there has been, during this whole period, a constant increase of State institutions. Facts are of some little importance in this matter; and what are they? When the first United States Bank was established in 1791, there were but four State banks, with a capital of a little over two millions; this appears from the report of Alexander Hamilton. In 1811, when the charter of that bank expired, there were eighty nine State banks, with a capital of 52,601,601 dollars, and a circulation of 28,000,000 dollars. In 1816, when the late Bank of the United States was incorporated, there were two hundred and forty-six banks, with a capital of 89,822,422 dollars, and a circulation of 68,000,000 dollars; and on the 1st of January, 1836, two months before the charter of that bank expired, there were five hundred and fifty-seven banks in the United States, with a capital of 251,875,292 dollars, and a circulation of 140,013,000 dollars. Such has been the restraining influence of a National Bank upon the growth of State banks.

But how has it been in England, where there is a National Bank of vastly more capital and power? In 1826, Parliament authorized the establishment of joint stock banks, and from that time to December, 1835, there had been established but sixty-four banks, during a period of nearly ten years; but from the first of December, 1835, to the last of November, 1836, only about eleven months, forty-two joint stock banks were established, with an average of from four to six branches each, making, in reality, two hundred banks in eleven months. What a restraining influence the Bank of England must have had! This was the period during which the Bank of England was rapidly expanding its circulation, which was the principal cause of the increase of the joint stock banks, by stimulating and creating a factitious demand for bank facilities, and by adding so greatly to the profits of banking. The same has been the case here. When the Bank of the United States has expanded the currency, and given great activity and great profits to banking operations, then the State banks have sprung up like mushrooms all over the country. This was the case during the years 1835 and 1836, and at some former periods. So totally inconsistent with facts is the pretension that the refusal to recharter the United States Bank is the cause of the increase of State banks.

As to the other assumption of the power of a National Bank, to restrain and regulate the State banks, I have, in another part of my remarks, considered that point. It is as unfounded as the other; it is a delusion, which has been given up in England, and must be here, or the evils of our wretched paper system will go on increasing until it results in a terrible catastrophe, similar to that which overwhelmed France, by the "well regulated" credit system of John Law.

A single word, sir, as to the removal of the revenues from the United States Bank, and placing them in the State institutions. That the connection of the Treasury with banks tends to increase the irregularity of the action, and to promote, rather than check, those expansions and contractions which are so ruinous to the Government and the country, I fully admit; that the deposites in the State banks since 1834 have contributed to the expansion which has taken place, I also admit. It is on these grounds that we defend the present bill; we wish to avoid such evils in future. But these concessions do not prove that the removal of the revenue from the United States Bank and its branches have caused the expansion and derangement in the banks, unless it can be made out that these revenues in the United States Bank and its branches would not have produced the same result. Would not the Bank of the United States have discounted upon the public deposites, in the same manner as the State banks did? Did they not do this as long as they received the public revenues? These questions must be answered in the affirmative. And is there any reason to believe that the United States Bank and its branches would have discounted less upon the deposites than the State banks did? Did not that bank, without the public funds, take the lead in the expansion during the years 1835 and 1836? That it did, cannot be denied. It increased its discounts from December, 1834, to July, 1835, nearly twenty millions of dollars, and so extended its credit, that it is now less able or less willing to resume than any of the solvent State banks. There are no grounds, therefore, for the assumption, that the public revenues being deposited in the State banks caused an expansion, more than would have taken place if they had been in the Bank of the United States. The only way to have prevented their influence in stimulating an expansion, was to have withdrawn them from all banks, both State and National.

Sir, the deposite act of 1836 has been regarded as one of the causes of the derangement of the currency. This, however, could not have caused the expansion, as that had occurred before. It no doubt increased the embarrassments of the banks; but whatever its influence may have been, it was not an Administration measure; it was a measure of the Opposition, proposed and voted for by every Opposition member of Congress.

The Treasury order has also been charged as one of the causes which has contributed to the disorders in our monetary affairs. So much has been said on this, I will not dwell upon it. Its influence must have been temporary and limited. If it drew two or three millions of specie from the Eastern States to the Western, it naturally and necessarily forced its way back in the regular course of trade. Specie, like water, will find its level, and go where it is wanted. If the Government brings specie into our seaports, as in the case of the French indemnity, it is alleged as a cause of deranging the currency; and if it collects its dues in specie, and draws it from those points, as is said to have been done by the Treasury order, that is a cause of disturbance to the currency. But the Bank of the United States can import or export specie, or purchase specie at the West to the amount of tons, and it has no disturbing influence on our monetary affairs. It is only the transactions of the Government that derange the currency.

I have now, sir, examined the alleged causes of the derangement of the paper currency, and proceed to submit a few remarks on what I consider the true causes. The main cause is our wretched banking and paper credit system, the irregular action of which, its expansions and contractions, are as much a part of the system, and as inseparable from it, as are the ebb and flood tides a part of the laws which act upon the ocean. Where the currency of a country has no other foundation than credit, and at the same time is inseparably connected with private credit, and both expand and contract together, to seek for causes independent of the system itself, would be not only as unphilosophical, but show as little common sense, as to attempt to explain the particular motions of a piece of machinery without reference to the construction and principles of it.

Currency, whether metallic or paper, is governed by general and fixed laws. A metallic currency has its principles, and is regulated by the great and universal law of demand and supply. Paper money, resting on the credit of the State, has its laws, and a currency supplied by banks has its primary law, which controls it, and that is, the action of the banks, or the working of the machine which supplies it, which throws it into circulation, and withdraws it from circulation. When this machine works irregularly, as is the case with our banking system, the currency must be subject to corresponding irregularities. But I have said all I intended to say on this branch of the subject in another part of my remarks.

The defects of the banking system are the primary and essential cause of all the disorders which have existed in our monetary affairs for the last two years. But there is a secondary cause, which has given greater irregularity to the system; and that is, the connection of the subject of banking and currency with the party politics of the day. This unholy and fatal alliance originated in the struggles of the Bank of the United States to secure the renewal of its charter. It connected its interests with those of a great political party, and their combined efforts—one aiming at political power, and the other at the monopoly and control of the moneyed power—have not only kept the country in a constant state of agitation and alarm, but have grossly perverted the public sentiment in every thing connected with banking and currency. If Horsley Palmer attributed the disorders in the paper currency of England to the "remarkable errors" which prevailed on the subject, the pernicious and fatal opinions which have been advanced and propagated here must have exerted a powerful and almost irresistible influence in blowing up the vast bubble of a credit currency. The Bank of the United States has not only been the chief temple to the paper divinity, but a sort of financial college, where the manufacture of rag money and absurd financial dogmas has been carried on with equal success. These dogmas have ordinarily been circulated through the official organ of the bank; but when it was deemed necessary to give to them a more imposing effect, they have been promulgated by letters missive to certain distinguished individuals, such as ex-Presidents of the United States. At one time we are told that the great evil of the paper system is its constant tendency to over-issues and to stimulate over-trading; then it is asserted that there is no such thing as over-trading; that it is language which has no meaning. One day it is the importation of specie which has disturbed the currency, then it is the withdrawing of specie by the Treasury circular. The precious metals have been held up to ridicule and called a "humbug;" the country, it has been declared, was better without specie than with it, and the banks stronger without it; the exportation of specie encouraged and treated as a blessing, and its importation as a curse; but the leading and fundamental dogma of the paper money party has been, that CREDIT was the only source of all wealth, of all industry; that the nation was indebted to it for its great public works; that all private enterprise depended upon it, and was sustained by it. Credit has been exalted and magnified; it has been regarded as being in itself property and capital, and the great and active element of public and private prosperity.

When the people are taught to believe that credit is capital, and the only element of wealth, can it be surprising that the credit bubble has been so blown up that it has burst?

And what has been the effect of such sentiments as these, not only on the action of the banks, but on the legislation of the States? Has it not been the principal cause of the unprecedented multiplication of banks in all parts of the country? In every State where the bank party have had the ascendency, and these opinions have had a controlling influence, banks have sprung up, until their rag money has become a perfect nuisance, and like the frogs of Egypt found its way into the kneading troughs of the people. And in States where the bank party were not a majority, they have often accomplished their object, by uniting with a small minority of the professed friends of the Administration, in obtaining bank charters. Since 1830, more than one hundred millions of bank capital has been created in eight States, all in opposition to the Administration during most of this time, except one. These States are, Massachusetts, which has increased its bank capital twenty millions; Vermont, over one million; Maryland, about two millions; South Carolina, over three millions; Louisiana, twenty-eight millions; Kentucky, over three millions; Tennessee, four or five millions; and Pennsylvania, about forty millions, consisting principally of the capital of the United States Bank, the recharter of which was effected by the opponents of the Administration, and a few pretended Democrats, whose votes were obtained, I will not undertake to say how, or by what means.

Whilst the Opposition have thus been blowing up the credit bubble, by their legislation in every State where they had the power, or could swell a minority into a majority by moneyed influence, they have been constantly charging the inflation of the currency upon the Administration and its friends. With what consistency and what honesty, let the world decide!

In ancient times, visionary philosophers attempted to discover the art of converting base metals into gold, and in more modern times the diviner's rod was believed to be capable of pointing, with unerring aim, to the treasures concealed in the bowels of the earth. But these discoveries, had they succeeded, would have been cast into the shade by the great invention of the present day of commuting credit into capital. By this wonderful discovery fortunes can be made in an hour, and the next, vanish "like the baseless fabric of a vision."

Mr. President, I have but a word to say as to the remedy for the disorders of our paper currency. To point out the cause is to suggest the remedy, which is a root and branch reform of the banking system—to take from it, or effectually restrain, the power it has usurped from the States of issuing or coining paper money, which has superseded the legal currency. This can be done, in part, by a restriction in the issue of small notes, but must be mainly effected by forcing the system back to its original principles, and requiring its capital, or at least one-third part of it, to be held in specie, as the basis of the currency the banks issue as a substitute for it. Nothing short of this can give soundness or stability to a paper currency. This connects it with specie, and imparts to it, in some degree, the character of specie. So far as it possesses the attributes of coin, it will be governed by the same laws.

The reform of the banking system is the only effectual remedy for evils springing from that system. Whether the Federal Government has power to regulate the paper currency is a question easily decided. Can Congress reform the State banks? If it can, it has the power, and it is its duty, to take care of the entire currency of the country. Does the Senator from Massachusetts contend for this? Does he believe this Government has the power to control corporations created by the States? If he does, then he is perfectly right in insisting that this Government has the power, and that it is its duty, to provide and secure to the whole country a sound paper currency. If he does not believe this, then all his eloquence and all his reasoning, goes for nothing; it is only as sounding brass and a tinkling cymbal.

But, believing that this Government has no power over the State banks, I believe that it has no power to regulate, in any effectual manner, the paper currency; and, in my opinion, nothing can have a more pernicious effect, or be more directly calculated to prolong the existing disorders, than to give to the public mind a false direction, and to keep up the unfortunate delusion which prevails, that this Government can, and ought to apply a remedy to the existing evils in our monetary affairs.

Sir, it is a delusion—a fatal delusion; the evil has not originated from our legislation, and it cannot be corrected here. We have not the power to do it; and if we had, I very much doubt whether we could exercise it. If split into twenty-six parts, the banks are too strong for the States, united, they would be too strong for Congress. It is our first and highest duty to leave this subject where the Constitution has left it—with the States and the people; and the only thing we can do is to separate this Government from the banking system, that our connection with it may not be an obstacle to a reformation by those who alone have the right and the power. The bill before us will accomplish this object, and that, in my judgment, is one strong recommendation of it.

But is said we want a general paper medium, which shall be of equal value in all parts of the Union. The advantages of this, if we had the power to supply it, are much less than is generally considered. As long as we have eighty millions of coin, and fifteen millions of it in gold, if the local banks were what they ought to be, if their bills actually represented specie, and were bona fide convertible into specie, as necessity required, there would be little occasion for a national paper circulation. Gold would be our national currency, and convenient for travelling and all ordinary purposes. As to exchange and all commercial transactions, those depend on trade, which always supplies its own facilities. A national paper medium never has been used, and never can be, to any extent, as a remittance in commercial transactions. The exchange between one place and another depends on the course of trade, and cannot be regulated by a national currency. If the balance of trade is against New Orleans, and in favor of New York, exchange will be against the former city, and this cannot be prevented or corrected by a national currency of any description, but must be adjusted by the course of trade; by bringing up the balance, and thus restoring the rate of exchange. This process is now going on, and exchange is regulating itself, by the natural laws of trade, much better than it could be done by any artificial agency of a National Bank.

Mr. President, I have now gone through with the several divisions of this subject, and have but a few words to say in conclusion.

It is said that this measure is unpopular; that the country is against it. This I am not prepared to believe. That there is a strong, a powerful, opposition to the measure, I am very sensible. I know the character of this opposition, and the sources of its power. It consists of a political party united with the moneyed power of the country. It combines the various special interests which are supposed to be injuriously affected by the measure: of these the banking interest is the principal, and the most subtle and active. There is arrayed against this measure the power and influence of eight hundred banks, with their eight thousand directors, and their hundred thousand stockholders, debtors, expectants and dependants. Those engaged in trade and manufacturing who are dependent on banks, and who expect that they can obtain greater facilities of credit, in consequence of the use of the public money by the banks, are also opposed to this bill. An impression prevails, founded in error, I think, that it would be injurious to the banks. But, sir, I do not think the time has yet arrived when the banks constitute the people. Whether these classes which are arrayed against this measure, are more numerous than its friends, time must determine; but one thing is certain, they are more vigilant, more active, and more noisy. The classes enjoying special privileges, are always united, always on the alert, and prepared, not only at the first approach of danger, but even at the suspicion of an attack, upon their monopoly interests, to rally in their defence, and to attempt to alarm the public mind about every measure, however just and equitable, that may interfere with their private interests, which they always represent as the most important and sacred interests of the community. But those who neither enjoy nor desire any rights but such as are guaranteed by general laws, and possessed in common with the whole people, are less jealous and less attentive to the acts of their Government. Enjoying nothing, and asking nothing, but equal privileges and common justice, they feel secure often when danger threatens them, and are slow to be aroused, either to resist encroachments upon their rights, or to sustain measures essential to their preservation, and conducive to the common good of all.

Far different is it with the monopoly class. They are not only at all times vigilant and active, but always raise a furious clamor about any measure which they suspect may affect their peculiar interests, and often resist it with a degree of violence and desperation which can only proceed from a consciousness that the measure is just and right in itself, but opposed to their interests.

Sir, do we not see these principles illustrated on the present occasion? Whence come the violent hostility and the fierce and noisy denunciations against the measure under consideration—a measure interfering with no private interests or pursuits, containing no tariff or anti-tariff principle, no restriction on commerce, no principle of taxation, throwing no obstacle in the path of individual enterprise, and no burden on any portion of the people? How is it, sir, that such a measure should be assailed with a spirit of violence and ferocity almost unexampled, and that it should be threatened with open resistance, should it become a law? And so bold and audacious is this spirit, that, at a recent public meeting in the great commercial emporium of the country, it was declared that the banks and the merchants wanted the moneys of the Government, and they would have them; and that, if Congress dared to carry out this measure, it would become necessary to drive the Goths from the Capitol. Such is the audacious spirit, sir, with which the interested classes assail a measure resting on the great principles of common justice.

Such are the selfish sources of the violent opposition to this bill, and such the evidences of its unpopularity, of which we hear so much. But let gentlemen not deceive themselves. This is not a question of a day, or a year, but one which will continue to interest the public attention until it is understood and its merits appreciated. The real people have not yet moved: they have not yet been aroused. Sir, I know the true character of the opposition to this measure, and its source and origin. It springs from that polluted fountain of private interest—from the union of the two strongest passions of the human heart, the love of money and the love of power: it comes, sir, from the fell spirit of monopoly—that spirit which, whether it springs from a monopoly interest or a monopoly class, is the same. It is that rapacious spirit described by the elder Adams; and no one understood the true character of a purse-proud, grasping oligarchy better than he did. He declared that the wealthy families, which are now united and bound together by the banking system, would either rule or ruin the country; that they would do this as certainly in a representative democracy as in a hereditary aristocracy; that if they could not obtain power in any other way, they would possess themselves of it by bribery and corruption; and if that failed, then by sedition or rebellion, and, if possible, would annihilate heaven and earth, rather than fail in carrying their point. Is this prediction, made half a century ago, about to be fulfilled? Are the bright prospects of this youthful Republic to be darkened, and its hitherto growing liberties to languish and die, from the pestilential breath of corruption? In all ages and in all countries this rapacious spirit has been the same. It was deprecated by Adam Smith, the friend and philosopher of merchants and bankers. He declared, that of all civil rule that of monopolizing traders and bankers was the most insolent and oppressive.

We all know the rapacity and tyranny of the monopolizing oligarchy of traders in Venice; and the history of ancient Rome affords a more remarkable example of the insolence and oppressions of that spirit which springs from the concentration of wealth and political privileges in the same hands. This was the groundwork of the aristocracy of Rome, and the fruitful source of those desperate struggles, those fierce contentions, that for centuries agitated that Republic, and which terminated in civil wars, and the overthrow of its liberties. Impelled by the determination to rule or ruin, the patricians, headed by the Pontifex Maximus, from the Forum, the very temple of liberty, rushed violently upon the tribunes of the people; and thus perished the last of the Gracchi, the descendants of the illustrious Scipio; and with them perished, also, three thousand of the common people of Rome. This was the first Roman blood, after the establishment of the Republic, shed by the hands of Roman citizens. But this slaughter of three thousand of the common people of Rome, did not go unavenged: from their blood sprang Marius, less distinguished for conquering the Cimbri, than for humbling the proud spirit of the aristocracy of Rome—Marius, the avenger of the people's wrongs; and terrible was that vengeance, which drenched the streets of Rome in patrician blood.

Shall we not be admonished by the lessons of history? Or shall we go on encouraging this monopolizing, rapacious spirit? Shall we yield to it on the present occasion, when it insolently demands the public money for private uses, or shall we resist it? Sir, it will be resisted, rebuked, humbled. I have full confidence in the great mass of the people, the producing and laboring classes. They are often slow to understand their rights, and to perceive approaching danger; they are patient under wrongs, and not easily aroused; but there is a point of forbearance, beyond which they will not go; and when we have reached that point, they will be aroused. They will come, whence the men of Bunker Hill came, from their farms, plantations and work-shops; throwing down their scythes and pruning hooks, and the implements of their trades; they will come to the rescue, not in tumult and disorder, nor like an army with banners, clothed with wrath and terror, but animated by a love of principle, and stimulated by a sense of danger and duty; they will speak, not in a voice of thunder, carrying terror to the hearts of their opponents, but in the small, still voice of justice; and that voice will be heard, and must be obeyed.

I apologise, Mr. President, for having detained the Senate so long, and thank them for their attention.

MISSISSIPPI ELECTION CASE.

SPEECH OF MR. BRONSON,

OF NEW YORK,

In the House of Representatives, January 29, 1838—Upon the Mississippi election.

Mr. BRONSON rose and said:

Mr. SPEAKER: If I was differently situated than I am in relation to this question, I might perhaps content myself with giving a silent vote, and permitting the discussion to be engrossed by abler heads than mine; but having been one of the Committee of Elections who made the report at the last session in favor of the sitting members, and who advocated the resolution reported by that committee, and being still one of the same committee, I feel it to be due to myself and the subject, that I should give some reasons for the opinions which I entertain, and which have, and will continue to influence my vote on this subject. Conscious of my own inability to do entire justice to a subject of such magnitude, I can only hope that I may not darken counsel, and that the little which I may say may perhaps shed at least one ray of light upon a subject where truth and justice are so desirable. The positions assumed by the claimants to the seats of the sitting members, and the views which they entertain, as expressed in the very able speech of one of them, seem to require at the hands of the committee some notice, and, if we are able to give it, some satisfactory answer.

With those who have been taken captive by the burning zeal, brilliant eloquence, and varied talent of the gentleman from Mississippi, (Mr. Prentiss) it will, I am aware, be a herculean labor to convince them that his arguments are not sound, or his positions tenable. I cheerfully pay the passing tribute of admiration to the talent and eloquence displayed by that gentleman, and which was only equalled by the gallant bearing and knightly manner in which he has thrown the glove, and done his devoirs on behalf of his "lady love, the State of Mississippi."

And here, Mr. Speaker, let me call the attention of the House to one position assumed by that gentleman; not, perhaps, of itself of much consequence, but which was much pressed at different stages of his argument, and therefore not unworthy of an answer. That position was, in substance, that this was not an ordinary case of contested election, where the question merely was whether A or B should represent a State or district, but that it was a case in which the right of representation was essentially involved; in which the honor and dignity of the State was at stake, and which, if decided in favor of the sitting members, must result in the disgrace and dishonor of the State.

Why, sir, I can see no propriety in such a view of the case. I can see nothing to distinguish it from many and most other cases of contested election. This House have not deprived Mississppi of her representation on this floor; on the contrary we have carefully guarded those rights. She now has, and has ever had, in this Congress, her full representation; and the question as in all other cases, at this moment, is, not whether she shall be represented, but which two of the four claimants which she has sent here shall have the honor of representing her.

Sir, was there ever a case of a person claiming a seat in this House, who did not base his claims upon the allegation that a majority of his constituency had sent him here, and that by the will of the people, he was justly entitled to his seat, and might not all claimants in such cases say? that if this House decided against them, that we thus set at nought the will of the people, and virtually elect their representatives for them.

Mississippi has sent us four members, she herself only claiming two seats, and we are now anxiously, and I trust honestly, endeavoring to ascertain which of the four, or whether either of them, are entitled to the two seats; and however that decision may be, I cannot conceive how it impeaches the honor or integrity of Mississippi, or in any way disgraces her. God forbid that one single spot or blemish, one iota of dishonor, should, by this House be cast upon that younger and hitherto unspotted sister of our Confederacy. No, sir, it is after all a question, not as to the right of representation, but as to the persons that shall exercise that right. If the sitting members are legally and constitutionally elected, and if this House should decide against their right to retain their seats, they may with the same propriety say that, by such a decision, the State of Mississippi is disgraced, and her honor tarnished.

I deny, therefore, that this question assumes any form so materially different from that of all other contested elections. In this, as in many or most others, grave and intricate constitutional questions are involved, which must be judicially decided by this House, and, in the decision of which, no imputation of dishonor attaches to the constituents who are affected by the decision.

A word more as to some of the gorgeous drapery that was thrown around the argument of the gentleman from Mississippi. He says that rumor has whispered that this question is to be decided on party grounds, and that Executive influence, like the sword of Brennus, is to be thrown into the scale in behalf of the sitting members. I regret that such suspicions should be entertained in advance, and I trust that the gentleman will find that, in this instance, as in many others, Madam Rumor will prove to be an arrant liar. To say, however, that party prejudice will have no influence in the vote to be given on this subject, or to hope that those secret and invisible influences which political associations and personal friendships throw around the hearts and minds of all men, will be entirely discarded in the decision of this question, would be asking or expecting from this House a degree of purity which no earthly tribunal ever yet possessed. I know our Saviour commanded us to "be perfect, even as your Father in heaven is perfect"—but I am not aware that any sane man has yet arrogated to himself that degree of perfection. I can only say that, so far as in me lies, I will endeavor to divest myself of all those influences, and to bring to the consideration of this subject an unbiassed judgment and truth-seeking mind.

I rest my decision in this case, and the vote which I shall give, upon two grounds. The one is, that the decision of this House at the last session was final and conclusive, and cannot or ought not now be reversed; and the other is, that the election of Messrs. Claiborne and Gholson, under the proclamation of the Governor in July last, was constitutional and legal; and that they are, by virtue of that election, members of the 25th Congress for the whole term.

In commenting upon these two points, I shall notice occasionally the arguments of the gentleman from Mississippi, and, for the better arrangement of the argument, I will, firstly, consider the point last mentioned; in other words, I will come out from "the castle of Res Judicata," of which the gentleman so much complains, and give battle to him upon the open plain, upon the main proposition; and though unused to intellectual tournaments with such gallant knights and able warriors, I will venture one passage at arms in behalf of the correctness of the original decision of this House and the constitutionality of the election of July; for if I doubted the propriety or correctness of that decision, I should feel very unwilling to shield it now under the plea of "res adjudicata."

In debating this question I will, as far as possible, avoid travelling over the ground which was occupied by the discussions of the last session, though I must necessarily repeat some things that were then advanced.

In the formation of the Constitution, the first great object was to provide a body or agents to whom, for the time being, the sovereignty of the people should be confided, and in whom the powers of the Government should rest:—to provide for the perpetual existence of the Government. The House of Representatives being the most immediate, and, in some respects, the most important, branch of the Government, care was taken in the outset not only to provide for its formation, but for its complete organization and existence at all times, and hence the clause in the second section, which provides that "when vacances happen in the representation from any State, the Executive authority thereof shall issue writs of election to fill such vacancies." Gentlemen seem to view this matter as though it was necessary to have a full representation from every State only during the actual sitting of Congress, as though there was no necessity of a House of Representatives at any other time than during the regular session, as fixed by the Constitution, while we well know that sudden emergencies, and extraordinary exigencies, may arise, and have arisen, requiring the action of Congress at times other than the general sessions; and our whole history shows that it is a body considered to be in perpetual existence, and ready to be called to act at any and all times, if the public service requires. Such it was meant to be by the framers of the Constitution, and hence their anxiety to preserve a full representation, and to provide for the filling of all vacancies in the representation from the States. The intent manifestly was to keep up the succession to keep the body full. But it is said that a vacancy in the representation cannot exist within the meaning of the above clause of the Constitution, except by death, resignation, etc. A complex and unheard of meaning is attempted to be given to the word "representation;" and it is said that a vacancy cannot exist in the representation until the office shall have been once filled—until some persons have been selected for the term in which the vacancy happened, and have died or resigned.

Representation, according to the best lexicographers, is defined as follows: Representatives of a collective body; those acting for others by deputation.

It is conceded that on the 4th of March last, the members of the Twenty-fourth Congress went out of office. Mississippi then had no members in the Twenty-fifth Congress. If she had no members, was there not a vacancy? The office existed; that is admitted on all hands; it was not filled. Was her representation full? Certainly not: she had none. Suppose the State of New York had only sent thirty-nine members here at the commencement of this Congress, instead of forty; suppose that one of the districts had entirely omitted or forgotten to send a member; would any man doubt that there was a vacancy in the representation from New York? But, say the gentlemen, there would be no vacancy, because there had been no person elected to fill that office, and the vacancy could not happen until there had been an incumbent who had died or resigned. Suppose again (for I will put extreme cases, to meet extreme cases put by the gentleman from Mississippi)—suppose a whole State had neglected or omitted to elect their members to the Twenty-fifth Congress, would there be no vacancy from that State, and is there no power granted by the Constitution to compel the filling of such vacancy? Most assuredly there is. "The Executive shall issue writs of election," &c. It is, as the gentleman says, imperative; the Executive must do it. As to the question, whether it must fall out by accident, whether a peculiar and technical meaning is to be given to the word HAPPEN, I shall only refer to the arguments of the last session, when that matter was fully debated, and, to my mind, it was satisfactorily shown that "to happen" is equally applicable to things which occur in the ordinary and regular course of things, and which are foreseen or foreknown, as to things which occur out of the ordinary course, and which are not foreseen or calculated upon.

But the gentleman says that there is another clause in the Constitution, which, although noticed by the committee in the report of the last session, yet seems afterwards to have been overlooked and lost sight of; and he complains that while we husbanded with much care the "Executive clause," as he terms it, and which I have quoted above, we forgot altogether the "legislative clause," i. e. the clause in the fourth section of the Constitution, which provides that "the times, places, and manner of holding elections for Senators and Representatives, shall be prescribed in each State by the Legislature thereof;" and that this clause was, in a manner, turned out upon the commons, left to go a begging; and one would almost suppose that the clause had suddenly been rescued from the rubbish of ages, after having, for a season, shared the fate of the lost tribes of Israel: certainly it seems to be hailed with as much pleasure by the gentleman as was the prodigal son, on his return. Now I believe, sir, that neither the committee or the House were unmindful of that clause of the Constitution, but that it was duly considered, in connection with the others, in the decision of that question at the last session. True it is, that not only the power is conferred on the State Legislatures of prescribing the time, place, and manner of holding elections, but it is made their duty. This clause, however, refers solely to general elections, and not to special elections.—(Vide Hoge's case, C. E. 153, 154.)

And here, by the way, I thank the gentleman from Mississippi for an admission of a point which I also consider settled by this case, and which, to my mind, is very important in the consideration of this question; and that is, that the powers conferred on the Governor and the Legislature of the States, are independent and distinct, and not concurrent; and, to my mind, this furnishes a strong argument to show the propriety of the exercise of this power by the Governor in this case, independently of legislative enactments.

The Constitution having conferred the power on the State Legislatures of choosing the time, place, and manner of holding elections, it became their duty so to exercise that power that the object in view should be accomplished; and not to exercise it by halves, or in so bungling a manner that their State should be only in part represented, or represented only a part of the time; and a vacancy may as well happen from the imperfect exercise of that power, as from death or resignation. Suppose the Legislature did not exercise the power at all, would their refusal or neglect to act deprive the State of a representation. It seems to me most obvious, that if the Legislature either neglected to act at all, or if they made such inefficient provision, as only half accomplished the object, so that the State was wholly or in part without a representation, or so that she would be represented only a part of the time, that then, ipso facto, a vacancy happens, and may be filled by the Governor's writ of election. Again, suppose by some mistake or Legislative enactment, the State law providing for the general elections, only related to one district of a State, and the other districts were not provided for—would there not be a vacancy? and how is to be filled, except by proclamation of the Governor? Vacancies thus occurring, appear to me to be such as are contemplated by the clause in the second section. In fact, if they are not the whole object of that clause, as I view, it may be completely frustrated, and the House of Representatives virtually annulled by the act of the Legislatures of the different States.

Let me put a case: suppose that all the States, like Mississippi, held their elections in November, and all had, by legislative enactment, fixed that time biennially for their general elections. The result would be, that, from the 4th of March to about the 1st of December—nearly nine months—there would be no House of Representatives; and if you deny to State Executives the right of issuing writs of election, there would be no means of forming one under the Constitution. Suppose, to carry out this case, that in April or May, a war should suddenly break out on both sides of the Union; to use the language of the honorable gentleman from Massachusetts, suppose "the candle should be lighted at both ends"—Mexico and Canada—with perhaps an insurrection in our own borders, the Florida war on hand, and an exhausted Treasury, and an army not sufficient to cope with 1500 Indians; yet, according to the construction attempted to be given to the clause in the 2d section of the Constitution, there would not only be no House of Representatives, but no means of procuring one. For six or eight months the country might be ravaged by fire and sword, and subjected to every evil incident to such a state of things, and yet we could have no Congress to act in such an emergency. The general elections would not be held till November; and according to the doctrine contended for by the claimants in this case, the Executives of the States would have no power of issuing writs of election; and we must remain six or eight months in such a state of things without relief. The clause conferring power on the State Legislatures, in the fourth section, would thus be made an instrument to defeat the very object in view, viz: the keeping up of a House of Representatives; and that which was intended to preserve, would be made an instrument to destroy. The doctrine is monstrous, and leads to absurdities too glaring to be tolerated.

I am aware, too, of the extreme cases which may be, and are, put on the other hand; that the Executive may, in this way, always supersede the general election, and that it makes him or his writ paramount to the legislative enactment. It is a power that may by possibility be abused in those States situated as Mississippi; but while the possibility is that such abuse may happen, the probability is strongly to the contrary, as no Governor would dare to be guilty of an act of such gross usurpation as has been supposed by the cases put by the gentleman from Mississippi; and moreover, the whole thing is easily and quickly remedied by a legislative enactment of the State fixing the time of holding elections, previous to the expiration of the current Congress.

This, in fact, should be done in all the States; and the propriety of that course is manifest, not only for the reasons above shown, but from the fact that most of the States have adopted that custom.

I cannot, from all this, resist the conclusion that the Governor had the power to issue his writ of election to fill the vacancy which existed in the representation of Mississippi in July last, and that if his writ was issued, and an election duly held under it, the vacancy is thereby filled legally and constitutionally; and this brings me to the consideration of a point which, to my mind, has created more difficulty than any other point in the case; and which is, whether this power was executed by the Executive—whether, in fact, a writ of election was issued to fill the vacancy, or whether, from the wording of it, the writ was in fact a nullity, and totally void from the beginning. I will, however, at this stage of the argument, digress a little while I notice another point, which I supposed had been conceded by almost all of this House, and which, if I understood the committee correctly, was unanimously conceded by them; and that is, that the members now sitting, if elected at all, were members of the entire Congress; that if the vacancy was filled at all, it must, of necessity, be filled for the whole unexpired term. The language of the Constitution is, that if a vacancy happens the Governor shall issue writs of election to fill such vacancies—not to fill a part of them, but to fill the vacancies; and he might as well issue a writ of election to fill the office for three days or three weeks as for three months. If he possesses the power to enlarge or abridge the vacancy at all, that power is unlimited.

I notice this point not to go into a discussion of it, because it was sufficiently discussed last session; is familiar to the minds of all, and, I believe, almost unanimously conceded. I assume it as a fact that if the Governor, by his writ, had a right to fill the vacancy at all, it must be for the whole unexpired term; and then the question recurs, did he do it? His proclamation or writ was in the following language:

"By Charles Lynch, Governor of the State of Mississippi, to the Sheriff of ——— county, greeting:

"Whereas, the President of the United States has convoked Congress to meet on the first Monday of September next; and whereas, a vacancy has occurred in the representation of the State of Mississippi in the House of Representatives of the Congress of the United States, by the expiration of the term of service for which Messrs. Claiborne and Gholson were elected:

"I do therefore issue this writ, authorizing and requiring you to hold an election in your county on the third Monday and day following in July next, for two Representatives to Congress, to fill said vacancy, until superseded by the members to be elected at the next regular election on the first Monday and day following in November next; and I do moreover enjoin you to conduct the same, in all respects, conformably to law, and make due return thereof to the Secretary of State. In testimony whereof, I have hereunto set my hand and caused to be affixed the great seal of the State, at the town of Jackson, this 13th day of June, 1837."

The Governor recites the vacancy—states how it occurred, and then orders an election "to fill said vacancy." Thus far he is correct—he is fulfilling the imperative duty which the Constitution imposes on him—but he goes farther, and adds a clause which he was not authorized to do, declaring how long the members elected "to fill said vacancy" should hold—"until superseded," &c. he says. Now the question is, whether that clause shall be considered as surplusage, or whether, by means of it, the whole proceeding is rendered null and void.

Surplusage is that which is inserted in an instrument over and above what is necessary to accomplish the purpose intended, which may be stricken out, and yet leave the instrument entire and perfect for the object in view. In law, something in the pleadings or proceedings, not necessary or relevant to the case, and which may be rejected.

The plain and obvious intent of the proclamation was to fill the vacancy, as appears by the preamble; and this in pursuance of an imperative constitutional duty resting upon the Governor. He accordingly so frames his writ as to completely accomplish that object; but he goes farther, and declares, as he had no earthly right to do, how long the persons elected shall hold. This is surplusage, because the law and constitution had fixed the term of service, and the "ipse dixit" of the Governor cannot alter or abridge it; his remark on that subject is totally irrelevant, and is surplusage, and may be rejected as not relevant to the case.

Let me put a familiar case. In many States, perhaps in all, the sheriffs of the different counties are bound to give public notice in some newspaper of the time and place of holding general elections, stating what officers are to be voted for, etc. The terms of service of all such officers are fixed by law or the constitution. Now suppose the sheriff should ignorantly or wilfully insert in the proclamation the length of time such officers are to serve, and in stating the time, should abridge or enlarge the constitutional term—will any man undertake to say that such matter inserted in the proclamation would not be surplusage; that the whole proclamation and election under it would be void? If I am right, therefore, in these premises, the conclusion is irresistible that the Governor of Mississippi was not only fully authorized to issue his writ or proclamation to fill the vacancy which existed in July, but that he did do it substantially and fully. Under that writ an election was duly held according to all the forms of law, at which the sitting members were fairly elected by large majorities. This latter fact is not disputed.

But, sir, passing by all these arguments, I insist that the decision of this matter at the last session was final and conclusive, and cannot, or ought not, to be now rescinded, unless for fraud or misrepresentation.

I will first notice some of the arguments of the gentleman from Mississippi on this point; and one was, that the adoption of the resolution of last session, was merely an expression of opinion on the part of the House, and not a judicial decision.

Expression of opinion!! A more solemn judicial decision was never made by this House. At the very commencement of the extra session, even before the members were sworn, an objection was made to the right of the sitting members to seats in this House. At the earliest practicable moment the matter was referred to the Committee of Elections, who were directed to inquire and report as to their credentials, and "whether they are members of the Twenty-fifth Congress or not." The committee examined into the matter, and reported on the 18th September, that they were duly elected members of the Twenty-fifth Congress, and, as such, were entitled to their seats. This resolution was fully debated for many days, on both sides of the question, and after mature deliberation, and full discussion, the House adopted the resolution on the 3d October, by a vote of 118 to 101.

This resolution declares the fact, that Messrs. Claiborne and Gholson are duly elected members of thh Twenty-fifth Congress; and its adoption is a judicial decision of this House, which is the highest and only tribunal for the settlement of such matters.

Suppose we adopt the resolution now under consideration, which declares that Messrs. Prentiss and Word are not members of the Twenty-fifth Congress, and are not entitled to seats in this House as such, and which is very similar in language to the one of last session, will the gentleman say that the adoption of this resolution is a mere expression of opinion, and not a judicial decision. If the resolution now under consideration should be adopted, when the gentleman goes back to Mississippi, and is asked how this question has been decided by this House, will he say, Oh! it has not been decided at all; the House have merely expressed an opinion that myself and Mr. Word are not members, &c.? No, sir; he would say no such thing. That decision was, and this when made will be, a judicial decision, expressed in all the strength and forms of law.

Again it is said, that by taking cognizance of this matter, the House have virtually yielded this point, and opened the matter for a re-adjudication.

Let us see how this question now comes before the House. Messrs. Prentiss and Word present their claim and demand seats. Would the gentleman have us turn them out of doors without a hearing? We cannot tell but they may show some good ground for reversing the decision of last session—fraud or misrepresentation, or perhaps they could show that the proclamation was a forgery; a great many facts might exist, which would prevent the House from interposing the principle of "res judicata." It is only after the House has entertained the matter, and become possessed of the whole facts, that they are competent to determine whether the question has before been judicially determined—whether the principle of res adjudicata can be applied; and it would be strange indeed, if, in ascertaining the facts to see whether they should apply that principle, they should, by that action, deprive themselves of the right to apply it.

But, sir, it is contended that the decision of the last session was ex parte; that it was not between the same parties; and therefore, not binding upon them, and that neither Mississippi nor the claimants had any notice. Now this is putting it upon the ground of a former recovery or judgment in bar, and applying to it all those nice and technical relations which are necessary to support a plea, of former recovery, or judgment in bar.

There is much difference between such cases and the present. Res adjudicata is when a legal principle is settled, or when an interpretation is given as to some particular clause of the laws or the Constitution by a competent tribunal, after due deliberation. It then becomes a thing adjudicated upon; a principle settled, by which all like cases thereafter raised shall be governed, and much more, especially if the same right is involved; and no well-regulated body, acting as a tribunal in a judicial capacity, will overturn principles and decisions thus solemnly settled.

Let us, then, see what has been adjudicated and settled in relation to this matter. Sir, it is this: that when the regular election for members of Congress is, by the law of a particular State, fixed at a time long subsequent to the fourth of March in the year in which a new Congress begins, that the vacancy thus created in the representation from that State may be filled by a writ of special election, to be issued by the Governor under the clause in the second section of the Constitution; and that the person or persons thus chosen are members for the remainder of that Congress.

Such was the principle decided at the last session, and, as a necessary consequence thereof, the sitting members were declared duly elected as members of this Congress.

Does it make any difference that the present claimants to the seats are new parties, that their election has since taken place, or that the State or themselves were not notified at the former discussion of this matter. To illustrate this, suppose the like decision had been made years ago, in relation to a vacancy thus filled by the Governor of Connecticut. If the principle settled in the case from Connecticut was precisely the same as one arising now from Mississippi, the decision in this case must of course be the same, even though all of the parties to this case were entire strangers to the first.

But I do not, by any means, admit that even the parties are not the same now as at the last session. It was perfectly understood at the moment that the question was debated and settled at the last session, that a canvass was then going on in the State of Mississippi for the November election; that other members might and probably would be returned at that election; (because, if decided in favor of the sitting members, they here declared, openly on this floor, their determination to withdraw from the canvass, and not suffer their names to be used,) and although we could not know that the identical gentlemen now claiming the seats would be the ones, yet it was urged and supposed that some two gentlemen would submit this very claim. Mississippi was not forgotten in that contest, neither were the rights of the present claimants overlooked. We were in this dilemma: we must either refuse to that State her representation altogether at the extra session, which might be the most important of the whole, or we must declare the members which she then sent to us, were duly elected for the whole term. There was no alternative, and after careful review of the whole case, the latter decision was made, after full debate and solemn arguments.

But it is alleged that the House acted under a mistake of the facts, and this mistake consists simply in the fact, that Messrs. Claiborne and Gholson did not submit to the committee the certificate of the Governor or Secretary of State, which declared them to be elected for the called session only, or until superseded by others, to be elected at the regular election in November. Now, if, from the omission to produce that identical paper, there had arisen any mistake as to the true facts of the case; if the House had been led to believe that the election in July was different than what it purported to be by the writ of election; or that on the face of the papers it was not intended by the Governor to be an election for the extra session only, then complaints might be made that we acted under a mistake; but how was the fact. By recurring to the events of the last session, it will be well remembered, that on the very first day of the session this objection was raised. It was publicly stated here on this floor by Mr. Claiborne, that the credentials of himself and colleague were on their face, only for the "called session." It was then referred to the Committee of Elections, who reported a copy of the writ of election, which I have before adverted to, and which, on its face, declares that the members to be elected under that writ, were to hold until others should be duly elected in their place at the regular election in November. And this writ was the foundation upon which their whole case rested, upon which all their rights depended.

That showed clearly the whole case; and as the committee well remark, the certificate of the Governor could make no earthly difference, and would have made none in their decision. It could do no more than certify the fact of election under that writ, and in pursuance of it. Of that fact there was no question; it was proved aliunde. Suppose the Governor had certified generally that the sitting members were elected, without saying for what time, or in any wise limiting their term; it could not have helped them; they must go back to the writ of election as the basis of their right to seats, and as the foundation of their title to membership in this House. And on the other hand, if the Governor had certified that they were elected only for one month, or three months, that would not have altered the case; they still must go back to the writ as the basis of all their rights. This writ was before the committee and before the House; and there was no sort of misapprehension as to the fact. It was on all hands perfectly understood that the Governor had done all that in him lay, to abridge their term of service; and the question was fully and distinctly presented to the House whether he had any right to do so.

The production of the Governor's certificate would only have been cumulative evidence of a fact which was conceded and not at all disputed; which was perfectly proved, and which was well understood, viz: that the Governor had intended, so far as he was able, to limit their term of service.

Am I not right, then, in saying that the principle was settled at the last session, under a full knowledge of all the facts; under no mistake, and without any misapprehension on the part of this House in relation to this particular point; and that the decision is, and ought to be, binding upon all parties? And this position is entitled to additional weight, when we bear in mind that it was in favor of the same parties now here, who insist upon retaining their seats, and in full view or anticipation of all the facts now existing, and with the full knowledge that just such claims as are now urged, might, and probably would be, urged against the sitting members.

But let us look for a moment at the gross injustice of the reversal of our decision of last session, not only towards the sitting members themselves, but towards the State of Mississippi. They came here under a doubtful claim to seats. Their right was challenged. They at once appeal to this House as the highest and only tribunal to decide their rights. They urge a decision, and finally on the 3d October, the House, by solemn vote, declare and decide them to be duly elected for the whole Twenty-fifth Congress, and entitled to seats. They are virtually told that they need not go back to their constituents; nay, more—they were compelled by the decision of the House to remain here during the session. I say compelled, because, being declared duly elected, their duty required them to stay until Congress adjourned, which was not till the 16th October, leaving them barely time to return to the State of Mississippi to stand the canvass for the November election, if they had felt so disposed. In the meantime the decision of this House is promulgated to the people of Mississippi. They are informed that Messrs. Claiborne and Gholson are declared to be duly elected for the Twenty-fifth Congress, and that any election of other candidates in November will be nugatory and void; and some, at least, of the people of Mississippi, did rely upon that decision, and did not cast their votes for members of Congress at the November election. How far this idea influenced the election in November, it is impossible to tell; but, by referring to the documentary evidence in this case, as reported by the committee at this session, it will be seen that in at least seven of the counties where, at the July election, large majorities were given to Messrs. Claiborne and Gholson, not a single vote was cast for them at the November election, and only a very small vote for Messrs. Prentiss and Word, and many other counties a great decrease of votes in favor of Claiborne and Gholson, without any corresponding increase in favor of Prentiss and Word and it further appears that the entire vote for Governor at the November election was 27,702, while the entire Congressional vote for Prentiss and for Claiborne, being the two highest candidates for Congress on each side, was only 19,909, thus showing clearly that nearly 8000 of the voters of Mississippi,who actually attended the polls in November, and cast their votes for some officers, did not vote for members of Congress; and to my mind the conclusion is irresistible that the votes withheld were thus withheld in consequence of our decision at the last session; and this inference is strengthened, if it needed any confirmation, by the fact which has been stated here by the sitting members, that they addressed circulars to their friends in Mississippi, in all parts of the State, immediately after the decision of the last session, apprizing them of the same, and at the same time informing their friends that they (Claiborne and Gholson) considered the question as settled, and that they should not be candidates at the November election. The decision of the last session became the law of the land and the law of the case. Believing in the validity of that decision, some eight thousand of the voters of Mississippi have stood by and taken no part in the Congressional election in November. They have suffered it to go by default: and now, sir, it is proposed to reverse that decision, and adopt the November election and the candidates then elected as the true expression of the popular will. I will not dwell upon the gross and outrageous injustice of such a reversal towards the sitting members—of the paltering with their rights and interests which this House would be guilty of by such a course. If the last spark of justice is not extinct in the breasts of the members of this House—if they yet retain one chord of feeling, which vibrates to the touch of conscience, they will pause long before they perpetrate an act so unjust and so palpably oppressive to the sitting members. But, without reference to their individual rights, how and in what situation would you leave the State of Mississippi by such a reversal—can you put her back in the situation which she was on the 3d of Obtober, when you decided that the sitting members were duly elected—can you place all parties in "statu quo?" If this could be done there might be some shadow of plausibility (though none in fact) in reversing the decision of last session. But this is not proposed. The proposition is to reverse that decision, with the view and for the purpose of adopting, as members of this Congress, those gentlemen who were elected at the one-sided election of November—of forcing that election upon the people of Mississippi as the true expression of their will: thus virtually saying to the people of Mississippi, in the first place, by our decision of last session, that their representation was full, and that they need not elect; and, after some of them have seen fit to disregard that decision, and have proceeded to elect other members, then adopting their acts as the fair expression of the people of that State; and this too, when it appears from the returns which I have before alluded to, that the claimants (Prentiss and Word) did not get a majority of the whole vote given at the November election, though they did get a majority of the Congressional vote.

But I will not dwell upon this point; the statement of the facts, to a mind not enveloped in prejudice and impervious to conviction, is amply sufficient to exhibit the glaring and manifest injustice of reversing our former decision. But whatever may be the opinion of this House as to the correctness of the decision of the last session, either upon constitutional grounds or otherwise, and if this House should see fit to reverse it, I cannot see how, upon any principle, or in any just view of the case, the election of November can be adopted and the claimants recognised as duly elected. To call that an expression of the will of the people of Mississippi, and to say that Messrs. Prentiss and Word are fairly elected, would be a greater outrage than even the reversal of the decision of last session.

One remark further, and I will close this argument, which, perhaps, has already borne hard upon the patience of the House.

It was contended by the gentleman from Mississippi, (Mr. Prentiss,) that the sitting members should not and ought not, in fairness, to insist upon the decision of the last session, or to entrench themselves behind it; that they ought not to raise the point of "res adjudicata," but that, waiving all advantage which might be had, and all rights which may have been acquired under it, they should open the argument on the main ground, as though the question had not been once decided. They were challenged to this course, and their chivalry and honor appealed to, to abandon a point which they, and more particularly their friends in Mississippi, and I think a large majority of the voters of Mississippi, will consider as conclusive and impregnable.

The entreaty or challenge reminded me of that given by Richard Cœur de Lion to the famous Saladin, at the last interview which we read of in romance between those renowned warriors in the days of the Crusades, when it had become apparent that the league between the Princes of Christendom was at an end, and that their power was broken. When Richard proposed to enter the lists with Saladin, and by single combat decide the long vexed question between the Christian and Paynim as to the possession of Palestine, and even in language of entreaty besought the Saladin to consent to run at least three courses with grinded lances. Saladin admitted that nothing could give him greater pleasure than to enter the tournament with a warrior so renowned; that he could desire no greater earthly honor, and that should he be vanquished, it would insure him not only a speedy, but glorious passage to Paradise; but he well knew too that the Christian army was about to be dispersed, that the possession of Palestine would be undisputedly with the followers of the Prophet, and he wisely and prudently replied, "Allah has given the possession of Jerusalem to the true believers, and it were but a tempting of God and the Prophet to peril so mighty a stake upon the issue of such an encounter, and upon the prowess of my single arm. I have no right to give up those advantages which have been fairly acquired by the faithful, and belong to all the followers of the Prophet."

MISSISSIPPI ELECTION.

REMARKS OF MR. PARKER,
OF NEW YORK,

In the House of Representatives, February 5, 1838—On the amendment proposed by Mr HOWARD, declaring that Messrs. Prentiss and Word were not entitled to seats as members of the 25th Congress.

Mr. PARKER addressed the House as follows:

I have hitherto, Mr. Speaker, abstained from taking any part in this debate, both at the called session when I gave a silent vote in favor of the right of Messrs. Claiborne and Gholson to hold their seats as members of this Congress, and at the present session when the same question was again agitated; but the vote of this House, rescinding the resolution of the last session, has necessarily brought before us new questions for consideration and we are now called on to determine whether Messrs. Prentiss and Word shall be received as members, or whether we shall send back all the claimants to Mississippi to abide the result of a new election. Under these circumstances, it becomes my duty to lay before the members of this House and the country the reasons that influence me in the course I am about to pursue, that my votes may not be misunderstood.

The representation from the State of Mississippi became vacant by the expiration of the term of the Twenty-fourth Congress on the fourth day of March last. The term of the Twenty-fifth Congress then commenced. Circumstances rendered it necessary for the President to call an extra session of the Twenty-fifth Congress, to meet on the first Monday of September and the election of members would not take place, under the law of the State of Mississippi, until November. That State would, therefore, have been deprived of the inestimable right of representation at the called session, if no provision had been otherwise made for filling the vacancy. But it was provided by the second article of the Constitution of the United States, that "When vacancies happen in the representation from any State, the Executive authority thereof shall issue writs of election to fill such vacancies."

Deeming this provision applicable to the existing case, the Governor of the State of Mississippi issued his writ in pursuance of which an election was held in that State in July last, when Messrs. Claiborne and Gholson received a majority of the votes, and were declared duly elected. They were qualified and took their seats at the called session. It had also been declared by the Constitution that representatives in Congress should be chosen every second year.

This House having the exclusive power, under the fifth section of the Constitution, to "judge of the elections, returns and qualifications of its own members," the questions were submitted to the House, whether Messrs. Claiborne and Gholson were legally elected; and if so, for what length of time they were entitled under that election to hold their seats. These questions were patiently investigated by the Committee on Elections, and fully and ably discussed in the House, and resulted in the decision that they were duly elected for the entire term of the 25th Congress, and a resolution was adopted to that effect. Trusting to the legality of this decision and the good faith of the House and supposing the question finally settled, Messrs Claiborne and Gholson did not return and present themselves before the electors of Mississippi for re-election in November. Messrs. Prentiss and Word, though perfectly aware of the decision of this House, announced themselves as candidates in November last, and running without opposition, easily obtained a majority of the votes given for representatives in Congress, appeared here as contestants for the seats, and after a long and animated controversy, this House, by a trifling majority, has been led to the extraordinary result of rescinding the resolution solemnly and deliberately adopted at the last session.

Mr. Speaker, I will not now stop to inquire into the power of this House to reverse a decision previously made, under which individual rights had accrued, nor will I now discuss the expediency and propriety of so dangerous a precedent as annulling the deliberate adjudication of a previous session, which involved the rights and interests of a sovereign State. The assumed power has been exercised. The House has vacated its former decision; and whether it has acted justly or tyrannically in this matter, I cheerfully submit to the people to determine. My own vote is on record, as my protest against this proceeding.

It has been conceded by almost every member who has addressed you on this subject, that if Messrs. Claiborne and Gholson were constitutionally elected in July last, they were entitled to hold their seats for the entire Congress, there being no authority to abridge the constitutional term.

The question whether the election in July was valid is therefore still before the House; for if that election was constitutional, the State of Mississippi was fully represented and Messrs. Prentiss and Word could not have been legally elected in November. This question has already been argued at great length, and with distinguished ability, on both sides; and I do not purpose to enter fully into the discussion of that point. To my mind, the construction put upon the word "happen" in the Constitution was perfectly plain, and in accordance with its common acceptation. Vacancies happen when vacancies exist. The same signification has been given to this word where it occurs in other parts of the Constitution. In the second section of the second article of that instrument, it is provided that "the President shall have power to fill up all vacancies that may happen during the recess of the Senate, by granting commissions, which shall expire at the end of the next session." Under this section, it was repeatedly held under the administrations of Mr. Monroe, Mr. Adams and General Jackson, that the word "happen" did not confine this power to cases occurring by death or resignation, but that it extended to all cases where a vacancy existed, whether it occurred by the expiration of a previous term or otherwise. This construction was sanctioned by the practice of those Administrations, and supported by the written opinions of Attorney Generals Wirt and Taney. It was clearly the desire of the framers of the Constitution to guard against all cases of vacancy, and to provide that no State of this great Confederacy should be without representation in the councils of the nation; and no other construction than that I contend for, could carry that intention into effect.

But, sir, if any doubt existed as to the legality of the election held in July, it was the constitutional prerogative of this House to decide upon its validity. The Constitution had selected it as the tribunal to judge—had clothed it with full powers and given it exclusive jurisdiction; and the State of Mississippi, in assenting to the Constitution, had itself expressly confirmed the grant. The House exercised this power at the called session. It declared the election of Messrs. Claiborne and Gholson to be constitutional and valid. Was not the State of Mississippi bound by that decision? That resolution was binding and conclusive—at least until rescinded; and was unrescinded and in full force when the election was held in November last. At that time, therefore, the representation from Mississippi was full, and the sitting members were in the complete enjoyment of all the privileges, and discharging all the duties of Representatives from that State. It is true the forms of an election in November were complied with, but it was the mere form—the shadow without the substance—an automaton movement, devoid of life, spirit, and animation. If, therefore, the first resolution of this House was erroneous, it being constitutionally made, and the State of Mississippi a party to that decision, she was bound by it until reversed. The seats were filled not only de facto, as contended for by my honorable friend from Maine, (Mr. CILLEY,) but de jure, by a legal adjudication; and no election could be legally held in November to supply a representation already filled.

If a disinterested spectator could have listened in the gallery to all that has been said on this question by the members who advocate the claims of Messrs. Prentiss and Word, he could not fail to have been much amused by the inconsistency of their arguments, and the opposite character of the positions they have assumed. One rests the whole case upon the meaning of the word "happen," and contends that it applies only to events that are unforeseen; another admits the true signification of the word in its broadest sense and bases his argument on other grounds. The honorable member from Maine (Mr. EVANS) deprecates the propriety of referring to an English law book as authority, and claims that no decisions of the courts, however analogous, ought to have any weight in deciding a grave constitutional question; while the gentleman from Rhode Island, (Mr. TILLINGHAST) who followed him on the same side, resorts to the laws and practice of his own State as the copious fountain from which he imbibes his constitutional learning. In answer to the argument that the first resolution covers the period of the second election, the latter gentleman insists that when that resolution was rescinded, it became void "ab initio," and placed the parties in the same position they would have occupied if no resolution had been adopted. He compares it to a judgment of an inferior court reversed by a tribunal of appellate jurisdiction. This reasoning is fallacious, and, if carried out, would lead to a most absurd conclusion; for it would prove that all the votes given in this House by Messrs. Claiborne and Gholson, after the date of that resolution, were absolutely void. It would unsettle past legislation, and involve us in the most serious consequences.

The honorable member from Pennsylvania (Mr. BIDDLE) has warned the House against the danger of forming opinions not based on fixed principles, and stated several supposed cases by way of illustration, resting, as he informs us, upon the principles of the English common law. Let us examine one of these cases. He says, "A sues B, in an action of ejectment for a piece of land and recovers and takes possession, and builds upon it a three story brick house, and makes other valuable improvements. Ten years afterwards a shrewd yankee comes along, and on examining the papers on which B's defeated title rested, discovers that the judgment against B is erroneous, purchases B's title, institutes an ejectment suit against A before the same judge, (a judgment in ejectment not being conclusive,) convinces the judge of the error of his first decision and obtains judgment." He says the house and other improvements made by A belong to the purchaser of B's defeated title, and the hardship of the case could not be legally urged against the second recovery. I do not know, Mr. Speaker, but transactions of that kind may be practised without violating the laws of Pennsylvania, but I have too high an opinion of the moral sense of community to suppose they would be tolerated in any State. If the "shrewd yankee" should stray into some portions of the Union and attempt to engage in such a speculation, he would, at least, render himself obnoxious to the code of Judge Lynch, even if he should escape the reach of a better regulated tribunal. No honest people would tolerate such practices. In New York, sir, the purchaser of such a title would not only be subjected to criminal punishment for a misdemeanor, but his conveyance would be absolutely void, and he could not sustain the suit brought to recover back the land.

I am surprised, sir, that the gentleman should state, as analogous, a case where the rigid requirements of the law lead to such inequitable results. Much as we admire the beautiful proportions and symmetry of the English common law, it cannot be denied but it has some features, the growth of feudal times, by no means adapted to the liberal and equitable views of the people of this country; and in the twenty-five States of this Confederacy in which the common law has been adopted, its severity has been tempered by statutory enactments, rendering it more conformable to the spirit of our institutions.

It is true, sir, that at common law the judgment in ejectment was not a conclusive bar to a subsequent suit. But the gentleman from Pennsylvania should recollect that it was merely a possessory action; that it did not try the title to land, and therefore the analogy fails; for it was the title of Messrs. Claiborne and Gholson to seats in this House that was settled by the first resolution; the title to land by the common law could only be settled by a writ of right, and in that action the judgment was final and conclusive; at all events, so far as the same tribunal was concerned. The only resemblance I can discover between the case supposed by the honorable gentleman, and the case before us, is in the manifest injustice of both cases.

The same honorable gentleman, Mr. Speaker, in alluding to the course pursued on the question under discussion, has spoken of what he thinks proper to call "the efforts to sustain a sinking party." He has not informed us, sir, whether he intended this reflection as a censure upon his own party or upon the friends of the Administration. If upon the former, I will not certainly interfere in their family quarrels; but if this uncharitable charge is made against the political party with which I am associated, though I am disposed to concede to every member on this floor the same honesty of purpose I claim for myself, yet in this case I am bound to cast back the imputation.

We were told, sir, by one of the claimants of a seat here, (Mr. Prentiss) when he first addressed you at the bar of the House, that he advanced no personal claim—that he advocated the claim of the sovereign State of Mississippi—and he presented himself as the knight of that young and beautiful member of the political sisterhood—the lady-love, whose gage he professed to wear, ready to break a lance or shiver a spear with his rival. Judging, from these repeated protestations of devotion to his fair mistress, I supposed the gentleman would willingly consent to refer the matter to the choice of the lady herself, and like a gallant knight, submit to her decision; but when the proposition came before this House to send back this matter to the people, his affection seemed to have cooled; his confidence in his lady-love appeared shaken; and, in addressing you the third time, to my surprise he protested against submitting this question to the people, and in preference to that course, urged this House to permit Messrs. Claiborne and Gholson to retain their seats here.

We should recollect, sir, that the laurels of the gentleman were not won on a contested field, but that they were borne off by him at the November election, gallantly it may be, but with no opposing knight, and without competition.

There is another reason, sir, why I deem it my duty to vote against the claims of the contestants, and in favor of requiring a new election in Mississippi. It is because the course pursued by the House of Representatives has operated as a fraud, not only upon the rights of Messrs. Claiborne and Gholson, but of the people of the State of Mississippi. I admired the candor which induced the honorable member from Indiana (Mr. WHITE,) to say, that having voted for the first resolution, and afterwards in favor of rescinding it, he had contributed to the committing of a fraud upon the people of that State, and felt bound to vote to send back all the claimants, for the decision of the people; and I should be much pleased to see other gentlemen of that party pursue a similar course. However pure the intention of members may have been in voting to rescind that resolution, we cannot deny that it has wrought the grossest injustice toward the sitting members, and the people whom they represent. Relying upon the first decision, Messrs. Claiborne and Gholson were not candidates at the election in November. The people of Mississippi were apprised of the proceedings of Congress, and confiding in its character, dignity and good faith, neglected to go the polls. An ex parte election was held, at which Messrs. Prentiss and Word received less than half the number of votes cast for Governor at the same election. What the result would have been if the election had been fairly contested, it is impossible to know; but if candidates running without opposition cannot obtain half the votes cast at an election, we can hardly suppose they would have received a majority, if the election had been contested.

Ought we, then, to hesitate in exercising the power conferred on us by the Constitution, in such a manner as to do justice to all parties? Let us, then, refer back this question to the people, the legitimate source of all political power. The fact that the members of this House are nearly equally divided in opinion on this subject, furnishes an additional argument in favor of this course. When the will of the people of Mississippi shall have been legally and fairly expressed, I have no doubt all parties will cheerfully acquiesce in its decision.

PRE-EMPTION TO ACTUAL SETTLERS.

DEBATE IN THE SENATE,

SATURDAY, Jan. 27, 1838.

The Senate took up, as the unfinished business, the bill to grant the right of pre-emption to settlers on the public lands: the question pending being on the amendment submitted yesterday by Mr. BAYARD, requiring that this act shall be construed in accordance with such rules as have been prescribed by the Commissioner of the General Land Office, under the former pre-emption laws, and are now in force.

After some debate, the question was taken on Mr. BAYARD's amendment, and it was lost—yeas 13, nays 27, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Bayard, Calhoun, Clay of Kentucky, Clayton, Knight, Merrick, Prentiss, Rives, Robbins, Ruggles, Southard, Swift, and Williams —13.

NAYS—Messrs. Allen, Benton, Brown, Clay of Alabama, Cuthbert, Fulton, Grundy, Hubbard, King, Linn, Lumpkin, Lyon, Morris, Mouton, Nicholas, Niles, Norvell, Pierce, Robinson, Sevier, Smith of Indiana, Tallmadge, Tipton, Walker, White, Wright, and Young—27.

Mr. LINN offered an amendment requiring that this act should not be so construed as to deprive those of the benefit of pre-emption who were in the possession of certain fractions of land reserved from sales, in consequence of certain French and Spanish grants then unsettled.

In offering this amendment, Mr. L. went into a full explanation of the settlements made by persons in a certain district in Missouri, who, he contended, were entitled to all the privileges of the pre-emption laws, which, as the bill stood, might be excluded.

Mr. CLAY of Alabama suggested that it would probably be better to limit the amendment to Palmyra District, which Mr. LINN assented to.

Mr. NICHOLAS made some few remarks, which were understood to be, that there were a number of like cases in Louisiana, which hung like a mill stone around the State.

After some further debate, the amendment was adopted.

Mr. LYON moved an amendment, requiring that no pre-emption claim, resting on certificates heretofore issued, but contested, should be affected by this act till the certificate should be surrendered by the owner thereof.

Mr. CLAY of Kentucky thought this amendment wrong, as it would cover and protect cases of settlement by agent and attorney—a deceptive mode of obtaining pre-emption titles, which had been alleged to prevail to a great extent.

After a few remarks by Mr. CLAY of Alabama against the amendment as nugatory, and by Mr. LYON in favor, the amendment was rejected.

Mr. HUBBARD offered an amendment, exempting from the operation of this act all lands which had been offered at public sale.

This amendment, after being debated for some time by Messrs. ROBINSON, WALKER, MORRIS and BAYARD, was finally withdrawn by Mr. HUBBARD.

Mr. MERRICK then offered the following amendment:

Insert after the word years, in the tenth line, "Provided, that the right of pre-emption granted by this act, or the act hereby revived, shall not accrue to any other persons than those who were, on the 1st day of December, 1837, citizens of the United States; and such citizenship shall, in all cases, be established by legal and competent testimony, to the satisfaction of the Register and Receiver of the land district in which the lands may lie, prior to any entry thereof, by virtue of the provisions of this act."

Mr. WALKER was entirely opposed to the adoption of any such amendment. It not only excluded aliens that had been driven by oppression to seek a shelter among us, but would also prevent those who voluntarily sought homes in the country of their adoption. It savored too much of the old alien and sedition law to meet his encouragement. He pointed to cases where the bounty of the Government had been extended to foreigners; and cited the case of the exiled Poles. He alluded, also, to the number of foreigners that had so warmly espoused the American cause at the time of the Revolution, and had so freely shed their blood in defence of her rights during the late war with Great Britain.

Mr. NORVELL said the Senator from Maryland seemed to suppose that this bill proposed to give a bounty to the pre-emption settlers upon the public lands. This was a mistake. The bill gave only a preference to actual settlers upon these lands. They were obliged to pay the Government price for them. They were the pioneers of the new States—the cultivators of the soil—the defenders of the country against Indian aggression. It was to them, in a great degree, that the West was indebted for its early advances in settlement, cultivation, and civilized comfort. They had made the wilderness blossom as the rose—the desert smile with gladness and joy. Was it proper to denounce such men as heartless trespassers, fraudulent speculators, robbers of the public lands, as they had been denounced by the Senator from Kentucky? (Mr. CLAY.) It was these people that gave value to the public domain, and brought into action the early impulses for adventure and emigration to the Western wilds, which, but for them, would have made but slow progress towards the subduing results of industry and enterprise. The Senator from Maryland had asked, whether we were to be called on to bestow this bounty upon foreigners—upon the foreign paupers from Europe? Sir, if foreign emigrants will come among us, clear our lands, drain our marshes, and plant the soil with wheat and corn, what possible objection could be made to allowing them thus to contribute to the population and wealth of the country? Paying the Government price for the lands, it was impossible that either foreign or domestic paupers could come in for the benefit of these pre-emption laws. The fears of the honorable Senator from foreign paupers were imaginary. They were never able to purchase lands; they were never pre-emption claimants. The past pre-emption laws had never made the distinction now proposed by the Senator from Maryland. They had not restricted settlements and purchases of this kind to citizens of the United States. Congress had, in his judgment, no authority to prescribe the class of persons who should become proprietors of lands in the States. It was for the States themselves to regulate this matter. He considered the proposition an attack upon the new States. If the honorable Senator from Maryland did not choose to allow these foreigners to come and settle on the soil of Maryland, he begged him at least to suffer the people of Michigan to receive them. They were among her best and most useful inhabitants. They would not take the trouble to come from Europe to purchase and pay for lands, unless they meant to become permanent settlers and citizens, the parents of future native Americans, identified with the soil, the advantages, the perils, and the glories of the country.

Mr. CLAY of Alabama expressed his astonishment at the motion of the Senator from Maryland, (Mr. MERRICK) to exclude foreigners settled on the public lands from the right of pre-emption. That honorable Senator, Mr. C. said, could not be aware that his amendment, if adopted, would go to change the whole policy of the Government heretofore toward that unfortunate class of individuals. That policy, Mr. C. said, had commenced more than twenty years ago. In the year 1817, Congress passed a law setting apart four contiguous townships of land for the French emigrants, who had followed the fortunes of Napoleon, and been driven from their own country by the last disastrous battle of that great chieftain. Carrying out in practice the theory that our own free country is the asylum of the oppressed of all others, Congress, by the law alluded to, had authorized the grant of those four townships to these unfortunate exiles, on better terms than land was sold to our own citizens; that is, not only at the then minimum price, but on a credit of fourteen years.

Again, on a more recent occasion, when the liberties of unhappy Poland had been cloven down by the power of despotism, and many of her unfortunate sons had sought a refuge in this only "land of the free," Congress had granted thirty-six entire sections of land to two hundred and thirty-five of her exiles, on the payment of the minimum price in ten years. Indeed, Mr. C. remarked, the Senate had gone so far in this case, as well as he recollected, as to pass the bill last alluded to in such form as to make the grant a pure donation; but the House had very properly modified the bill, so as to require the payment of the minimum within ten years. Mr. C. said he was not disposed to put foreigners on a better footing than native citizens, but he was far from a disposition to exclude such as were cultivators of the public lands, and had thus given evidence of their intention to reside permanently amongst us, from the benefits common to others, especially when the laws of most of the States allowed them to become landholders. He was, he said, in favor of making our own country emphatically what it professed to be—a refuge and a home for the oppressed of all other countries—an asylum for every foreigner who might be driven into exile by the hand of tyranny.

Mr. C. made other remarks against the adoption of the amendment offered by the Senator from Maryland, urging its rejection, and expressing the earnest hope that Congress would not now depart from the liberal and humane policy which had heretofore characterized its legislation.

Mr. BENTON was entirely opposed to the amendment of the Senator from Maryland (Mr. MERRICK.) It proposed something new in our legislation. It proposed to make a distinction between aliens and citizens in the acquisition of property. Pre-emption rights had been granted since the formation of the Government; and no distinction, until now, had been proposed, between the persons, or classes of persons, to whom they were granted. No law had yet excluded aliens from the acquisition of a pre-emption right, and he was entirely opposed to commencing a system of legislation which was to affect the property rights of the aliens who came to our country to make it their home. Political rights rested on a different basis. They involved the management of the Government, and it was right that foreigners should undergo the process of naturalization before they acquired the right of sharing in the Government. But the acquisition of property was another affair. It was a private and personal affair. It involved no question but that of the subsistence, the support, and the comfortable living of the alien and his family. Mr. B. would be against the principle of the proposed amendment in any case, but he was particularly opposed to this case. Who were the aliens whom it proposed to affect? Not those who are described as paupers and criminals, infesting the purlieus of the cities, but those who had gone to the remote new States, and to the remote parts of those States, and into the depths of the wilderness, and there commenced the cultivation of the earth. These were the description of aliens to be affected; and if the amendment was adopted, they would be excluded from a pre-emption right in the soil they were cultivating, and made to wait until they were naturalized.

The Senator from Maryland (Mr. MERRICK) treats this as a case of bounty. He treats the pre-emption right as a bounty from the Government, and says that aliens have no right to this bounty. But, is this correct? Is the pre-emption a bounty? Far from it. In point of money, the pre-emptioner pays about as much as any other purchaser. He pays the Government price, one dollar and twenty-five cents; and the table of land sales proves that nobody pays any more, or so little more that it is nothing in a national point of view. One dollar twenty-seven and a half cents per acre is the average of all the sales for fifteen years. The twenty millions of acres sold to speculators in the year 1836, all went at one dollar and twenty-five cents per acre. The pre-emption then is not a bounty, but a sale, and a sale for full price, and, what is more, for solid money; for pre-emptioners pay with gold and silver, and not with bank credits. Numerous were the emigrants from Germany, France, Ireland, and other countries now in the West, and especially in Missouri, and he (Mr. B.)

had no idea of imposing any legal disability upon them in the acquisition of property. He wished them all well. If any of them had settled upon the public lands, so much the better. It was an evidence of their intention to become citizens, and their labor upon the soil would add to its product and to the national wealth. In reply to some remarks from Mr. CLAY of Kentucky, in which that Senator supported the amendment proposed against foreigners, and thanked the Senator from Maryland for offering it, Mr. B. said there was one class of politicians who had no right to object to foreigners for any purpose, and that class was those who were in favor of a national bank with foreign stockholders. Those who could go that, he should suppose could have no objection to foreigners for any thing, much less for the innocent occupation of cultivating the earth. We have had two national banks, both largely owned and controlled by foreigners, and a third bank of the same kind was still wanted. Now what was a national bank, that it should be a place into which foreigners were admitted without danger, in the opinion of this class of politicians, while they could not be admitted to the privileges of a pre-emption? What was this national bank, of which we have had two, and for another of which a certain political party were so anxious? A national bank was the furnisher of a national currency, the regulator of all local banks, the regulator of exchanges foreign and domestic, the regulator of the price of all stocks, of all property, and of all produce; and it was, according to the theory of the same party, the Treasury of the United States. A national bank was a "political machine," in the language of Gen. Hamilton, "of the greatest importance to the State." As a political machine, as well as a pecuniary insitution, the two national banks of the United States had openly and publicly acted. Yet there were persons, and a party, who could see no objection to placing such an institution in the hands of foreigners! who could see no objection to vesting aliens with a power over the currency, the property, the treasury, politics, and the elections of the country, and yet saw the greatest danger in a hundred dollars' worth of land being sold to an alien! According to this logic, a solitary alien cultivating the ground on the frontiers of a remote State, is too dangerous a character to be trusted with the privilege of a pre-emption right in a quarter section of land; bu ta band of foreign capitalists, wielding tens of millions of money, making money out of rags, putting up and putting down the price of all property, interfering in all elections, and bringing money to bear upon all political questions; these, truly, were innocent aliens, from whom no harm was to be apprehended. and whose chartered privileges having been enjoyed for forty years, must be enjoyed for twenty years more; and, after that, for ever! Such is the logic with which we are to be entertained! Such the contradictions which are given to us to swallow! But what is the secret of this inconsistency—what the cause of this contradiction—what the reason of this dread of a solitary cultivator, and this love for a band of foreign capitalists? What is the reason why the solitary cultivator is to be denied the privilege of a pre-emption right in an hundred dollars' worth of land, and the foreign capitalists are to be allowed to wield the pecuniary and the political power of the country? What is the reason of all this? Sir, the reason is one of inference and deduction. Is it not political? Is it not because the cultivator is a Republican, and because the foreign capitalists are Monarchists? Is it not a political reason, which follows the law of affinities, adhering to what it loves, and repelling what it dislikes? The Senator from Kentucky (Mr. CLAY) has thanked the Senator from Maryland for bringing forward this amendment; and I will thank him for it also. He shall have what rarely occurs in this chamber, thanks from both sides of the House! Certainly I should never have stimulated any gentleman to propose such a motion; but since it was done, I must be permitted to express thanks for the opportunity which it had afforded of contrasting the fears of a certain political party for a few solitary foreigners cultivating the soil, with their love and confidence in a band of alien lords and ladies, wielding the powers of a national bank.

Mr. MERRICK said he had not anticipated opposition from any quarter to a proposition which appeared to him so obviously right in itself, and which, he could not but add, he believed to be so loudly called for by a just regard to the rights and interests of the citizens of this Union. He had listened attentively to the arguments of honorable Senators who had risen in opposition, but had heard nothing which did not tend to confirm the views and opinions which had prompted him to offer the amendment. Indeed he had hoped, till the contrary appeared, that the principle and objects of the amendment would have found a ready response in the breast of every American. Disappointed in this hope, he felt obliged very briefly to notice some of the remarks which had fallen from gentlemen on the other side. One honorable gentleman, the Senator from Mississippi, (Mr. WALKER,) had said the amendment reminded him of the alien and sedition laws. The Senator must have forgotten the nature and tendency of those laws, or he could not have made a remark so entirely inapplicable. There was nothing in the amendment which bore the slightest resemblance to the nature or object of these laws; and he would add, there was no man, in or out of that body, who had at all times been, and still was, more disposed to resist, to the last extremity, the principles and spirit of those laws, than himself. Any argument about them, however, would be foreign to the question before the Senate, and he would therefore pass them by. The bill and amendment before the Senate involved questions relating solely to the mode of disposing of the public domain, and the persons to whom special favors should or ought to be shown in making that disposition: he should confine himself to remarks applicable to those questions.

The bill proposes to grant the right of pre-emption to the actual settlers upon the public lands; that is, to allow to all persons who may have entered upon the vast tracts of valuable lands in the West, (acquired by this Government with the common means, and held as the common property, of all the people of the United States) and hunted out and selected the most valuable and choice portions of that property, to keep and hold those selected spots to the exclusion of every one else, paying only therefor, whenever it may suit the convenience or pleasure of the Government to survey and bring the circumjacent lands into market, the minimum price of one dollar and a quarter per acre. In other words, it holds out the tempting lure of great gain to all who will intrude, contrary to law, upon the property of the people of the country. It proposes a large bounty to all who will lawlessly seize upon that which belongs indisputably to all the citizens of the country, and appropriate it to their individual use; for, sir, I maintain it is a bounty, it is a large and valuable gratuity, you give, when you allow the privilege of selecting your best and most valuable tracts of land, and paying for them at some distant day the paltry sum of one dollar and twenty-five cents per acre, when, in fact, the lands so selected and culled out are worth, and would command were they fairly brought into the open market, ten or twenty times the sum.

The amendment I have offered proposes so to modify the bill as to limit the grant of this bounty to our own citizens; to exclude from the immense advantages of this law and this policy (for remember, it is avowed on the other side that this is to be the settled policy of the Government, and all other similar laws are to be passed continually hereafter) all aliens, all who are neither native nor naturalized citizens of the Union. Between the native and naturalized citizen I propose to make no distinction in this respect; but I desire, while you are about to deal out the property of the American citizens in bounties and gratuities, that you should confine your liberality in disposing of their means to your own people.

What, sir, has been the chief argument urgument urged in favor of the passage of this bill? Was it and is it not, that you thereby give to the industrious and honest and enterprising poor man, who owns no land, and has not the means of purchasing in the old settled portions of the country, an opportunity of acquiring a home, and comfort and independence for himself and family? And will you, can you, while you use this argument, exclude our own citizens from the advantages thus speciously held out, by letting loose, as competitors with them, the hordes of European and other foreign vagrants, knaves, and paupers; and will not the poor man, the honest and virtuous and industrious poor man, of this country be effectually excluded from all the vast benefits and advantages of this and similar laws, if you reject the amendment I have offered? Yes, sir, they will be excluded by the preoccupancy of the knaves and paupers of the old world. Already this description of persons are flocking in most pernicious herds to this country: let it once be known that they are admitted to the free and full enjoyment of the advantages of these pre-emption laws; that they are authorized by Congress to come in any numbers, and seize upon the inheritance of the American people, and the character of our frontier population will be sadly changed. No longer shall we find our frontier, as it extends farther and farther west, peopled by brave and hardy and patriotic yeomanry. That which has hitherto been the bulwark, may become the scourge of the country. You will have there a vicious, corrupt, and debased swarm of outcasts from Europe; and the poor, but honest and proud-hearted, American freeman, will rather die in poverty and want, than dwell among such people. No, sir, he will never go among them; and you exclude him as effectually, by refusing to shut the door against such alien intruders, as if you were to proscribe him by name in your statute. Make the professions I have heard good; so frame this bill as in fact to enable the meritorious poor men of our own country who have them not, to acquire homes and comfort and independence for themselves and families, and my heart will be with you; at all events, bestow not the property of the citizens of this Union in bounties upon aliens, who owe you no allegiance, who have no sympathies for, no ties to bind them to you, but who are, from habit and education hostile to all those institutions so dear to this Republican people. Sir, so to bestow this property, to pass this bill as it now stands, without the amendment, will be an outrage upon the rights as well as upon the feelings of the American people.

The Senator from Michigan (Mr. NORVELL) has said, the adoption of the amendment will amount to an interference with the laws and institutions of his State; because, in that State, foreigners not naturalized are allowed to acquire and hold real property. How does it interfere with the domestic policy of his State? The amendment proposes not to repeal the laws of Michigan regulating titles to property within her borders; it proposes not to interfere in any manner with the right of any one to purchase land of the Government, or of individuals any where; every one will still be free as they now are to make purchases at private or public sale; unnaturalized foreigners may still acquire Government lands or any other lands by purchase in Michigan or any other State, the laws of which allow aliens to hold real estate. Such is not, however, and I trust will not become the policy of many of the States. The amendment touches not that question, but leaves it where it ought to remain, with each State respectively. The amendment proposes only to confine the bounty of this Government, about to be extended largely and liberally, to our own fellow citizens; and to cut off those to whom we owe nothing, those who are alien to us in every sense from unjust and pernicious participation in advantages which ought certainly to be granted, if granted at all, to none but citizens of the Republic. The distinguished Senator from Missouri (Mr. BENTON) has said that it is a question of only a few cents upon the acre of land; and has directed my attention to a document containing a statement of the average price obtained by Government from sales of public land, showing that those sales exceed, in their average, the minimum price (one dollar and twenty-five cents) fixed by Congress only a few cents per acre; and hence he concludes, as the pre-emptions will, in the end, pay that minimum price, the amount of bounty granted by this bill will be but some two, or three, or four cents per acre. We differ very widely, sir, in our estimate of these advantages. Nothing could be more erroneous than any conclusions to be drawn, or estimate which can be made, of these advantages, from the document or average of sales to which the honorable Senator has referred. Sir, you have no data, you can have no data, from the very nature of the transaction, by which to form a correct estimate of the pecuniary value of the advantages granted by this bill. Much of your public land is of very great value. Mention has been made, over and over again, in the course of this debate, of a single tract, of some two hundred and ten thousand acres, in the State of Indiana, to which the Indian title has been but very recently extinguished, and which is not yet even surveyed, the present value of which is admitted on all sides to be not less than twenty, and by many said to range as high as fifty dollars per acre; and this immensely valuable tract we know is already covered with these squatters, these actual settlers, as they are called. How much will be the bounty granted by this bill to these persons, by giving them the right of pre-emption in this land at one dollar and a quarter per acre? By allowing them thus to seize upon property purchased by the common treasure of the whole people, and appropriate it to their individual use at a merely nominal price, here is a difference of something more than a few cents per acre; an excess above the estimate of the honorable Senator quite large enough to tempt an European felon, when authorized by law to do so, to endeavor to snatch it from the hands of the poor American citizen. This is now already occupied by the squatters; but other similar tracts, holding out lures no less tempting, will from time to time be found, and instances of no less flagrant injustice will from time to time occur, if this policy is to go on. And why should the alien and the stranger, people who know us not and care not for us, be allowed the privilege of seizing such prizes, and wresting them from our own meritorious and enterprising, and, if you please, poor citizens? Sir, the average of sales does not show, cannot show, the value of the lands granted away by this bill. Pre-emption laws would seem to be the cause, and should not, therefore, be urged as a consequence, of the low average of sales. The most valuable lands, the choice tracts—those which would command the highest price if brought fairly and equally into the market, and thus swell the general average—are all culled out, pre-occupied by these squatters, aliens, and others, and accounted for in the sales only at the very minimum. The refuse land, after these people have picked and culled it all over, is alone left to be disposed of at public sale. No wonder, then, your average should be low.

To suppose the average of sales which has been referred to, is sufficient data upon which to estimate the amount of bounty granted by this bill, would be to suppose there was no difference in value between the most fertile, the best wooded, best watered, and most advantageously located tracts of country, such as squatters will always seize upon, and those most destitute of these qualities; would be to suppose that all the public domain, fertile and sterile, prairie and forest, mountain and valley, was of equal value. Sir, the idea is erroneous, manifestly erroneous. The benefits which will accrue by this bill to those who come within its provisions, are immense, and I desire to confine these benefits to our own citizens. I make no special or particular opposition to foreigners by the amendment offered; that amendment only goes to exclude persons not naturalized from the bounty, large bounty, of the Government, which, I repeat it, sir, if granted at all, can be granted, with color of justice and right, only to such citizens as may be settlers on these lands. Foreigners who may come here, are left to the enjoyment of all rights under pre-existing laws, and according to the pre-existing policy of the country. They will have the same right that I myself have, or the people whom I in part represent on this floor, to attend the sales of Government land, and there purchase at open auction, or acquire by private entry, lands liable to be taken in that way, in such States as please to allow those who owe them no allegiance by nature or otherwise, to become the owners of the soil. The wisdom of that policy I leave to the consideration of the States which has adopted it; but I can never consent to bestow the the property of the people of Maryland, and of the Union, as a bounty upon aliens.

The honorable Senator from Alabama, (Mr. CLAY,) has stated that the settled policy of the Government heretofore has been in accordance with the provisions of this bill, in relation to aliens, and to prove this, has referred to some special grants of public lands, to particular descriptions of foreigners, made by Congress for special and peculiar reasons; and does this prove such to be the general policy of the Government? To my mind, sir, it proves the very reverse; special enactments are only necessary to take a case out of a general rule, and such special enactment, such exception proves the rule, does not reverse it, sir!

This policy originated with the act, now attempted to be revived, of 1830; and so obvious was the propriety and justice of excluding aliens from the benefit of the provisions of that law, that even the gentleman's own friends, the very officer to whom was confided the administration of the law, doubted and questioned, as well he might, whether these people were embraced within its spirit; whether Congress could possibly have intended to extend its provisions to aliens. He, sir, questioned, and well questioned, whether such could be the true intention of Congress; and so strong were his doubts, that they could not be quieted without consulting the law officer of the Government, the Attorney General. The opinion of this last-mentioned official personage I now hold in my hand, sir. It is unnecessary to read it; but the conclusion to which he comes is, that aliens, not being excluded in terms, and the words of the law being general, all persons, aliens as well as citizens, must be admitted to all the advantages granted by it. It is plain, then, it has not been heretofore considered the settled policy of the Government to grant the public domain as a gratuity to intruders from foreign countries. Strange, indeed, in the present condition of this country, would be such a policy; and still more strange would it be if the Senate now reject the amendment made, under consideration. It is time to check this evil; it is pregnant with danger; it is pregnant with wrong and injustice. I trust, sir, the Senate will not refuse to adopt the amendment; but that by ingrafting it upon the bill, which it is easy to foresee will pass this body in some shape, they will prove to the country that our own citizens, whose property we are disposing of, are still deemed worthy of a preference, in the distribution, over strangers and aliens.

Mr. BUCHANAN of Pennsylvania, and Mr. BENTON of Missouri, having each made some further remarks in opposition to Mr. MERRICK's amendment, he again rose and said:

I desire, Mr. President, to make a single remark in reply to the honorable Senator from Pennsylvania, (Mr. BUCHANAN.) That Senator, in announcing briefly his opposition to the amendment before the Senate, remarked that there seemed to be an extraordinary spirit of opposition to foreigners, manifesting itself in the country. I think, on the contrary, there is a morbid affection manifested here and elsewhere for foreigners and aliens. The Senator observed, Mr. President, he might be allowed to be somewhat sensitive upon such a subject, as he was himself the son of a foreigner, who was afterwards naturalized. Sir, allow me to tell the Senator in this respect we are alike; I too, sir, am the son of a foreigner, who became a naturalized citizen; and yet, sir, I love my own native country, and my own fellow-citizens, better than foreigners. I have been thanked too, sir, by the honorable Senator over the way (Mr. BENTON) for introducing the amendment; and the intimation was that I, and those who act with me, were to be held to account some where for the course we are now pursuing. On my soul, sir, the Senator is heartily welcome to all the advantages he can gain by the amendment I have had the honor to submit. I have discharged my duty, sir, to the people of Maryland, who sent me here, and the people of the Union, all of whom have a common interest with us in this question, by presenting the amendment, and I am ready and willing at any, and all times, to meet all the consequences, and all the responsibility, of going for my own country, and my own fellow-citizens, native and naturalized, against all aliens.

Mr. YOUNG said, I hope, Mr. President, that the honorable Senator from Maryland, (Mr. Merrick,) does not intend to engraft upon this bill the "Native American System." If so, I must enter my protest against any such amendment. I very much regret, sir, that the remarks of the honorable Senator had not been made sometime ago, when a certain bill was passed through this and the other body, granting a "bounty" of one township of land to the "refugee Poles," on the waters of Rock river, in Illinois, with the privilege of locating upon the improvements of our settlers, and ten years' credit in which to make payment, at the minimum price of the Government. Sir, much injustice and oppression has grown out of this grant, as the documents now in the hands of the land committee, with other evidences in my possession, entitled to the highest credit, will amply show. My information is, Mr. President, that the Baron Klopiski, agent for the "Polish exiles," went upon the lands bordering on Rock river, one of the fairest portions of our State, for the purpose of selecting and locating his two townships of land, that he found many people already settled there upon the public lands, with the view of making that section of country the permanent abiding place for themselves and their families. Many had already erected houses, and enclosed and improved handsome little farms, with the intention of purchasing the land from the Government whenever it should be brought into market. He finds them thus situated. They extend to him the rights of hospitality, never withheld by this meritorious class of people from the poorest wayfaring man who may happen to find his way into their country. But for this "distinguished foreigner," and his companions in exile, all their sympathies were enlisted, and from him nothing in the way of the most generous and liberal hospitality was withheld. They feast him upon the best their humble cabins afford; they go with him, and show him the country; and manifest, in advance, their willingness to receive his countrymen on the most intimate footing of friends and neighbors. He thanks them for their hospitality, and to quiet the most remote apprehension of any intention on his part to encroach upon their settlements, he assures them, again and again, that he will respect their improvements, and that he will not interfere with their homes. They believe him, and are satisfied.

Well, sir, the next thing our honest, confiding citizens hear from this "distinguished foreigner," he has made his locations, and in violation of all his pledges and assurances, made under the most solemn garb of friendship, he takes every improvement in that section of the country; and the people, sir, have applied to Congress for relief. And yet sir, the honorable Senator from Maryland (Mr. MERRICK) says he would vote again and again for such donations, bounties, or whatever gentlemen are pleased to call them. Thus is it, Mr. President, and I am sorry it is so, that whenever an appeal is made in behalf of "poor foreigners," or the "poor Indians," all the sympathies of certain gentlemen are excited to the utmost, and they are willing to vote again and again for donations, bounties, or any thing else, to relieve their unfortunate condition; but when the claims of our "own poor citizens" upon your borders are presented, all their sympathy is gone, and they are denounced as a "lawless set of heartless, reckless speculators." Yes, sir, it has been emphatically said by an honorable Senator, (Mr. CLAY of Ky.) that they might as well "seize upon your forts and arsenals, your ships upon the ocean, or plunder the money in your Treasury, as thus to seize upon the public lands, and appropriate them to their use, in violation of law and against the just rights of the nation." Sir, the honorable Senator much mistakes the character of this people. There is not, Mr. President, a more peaceable, orderly, industrious, hospitable people to be found in any country. But, sir, the object of this amendment of the honorable Senator from Maryland (Mr. MERRICK) is to exclude foreigners not naturalized from the advantages held out by this bill to native citizens, and to such as have been naturalized. I, sir, can never consent to this distinction. By the constitution and laws of Illinois, the State of my adoption, foreigners may vote, they may be elected to offices of the most important character, and are made capable of purchasing, holding, enjoying, and again transferring, real estate, by will or otherwise. Yes, Mr. President, I have seen a foreigner, not naturalized, a member of our State Legislature, enjoying all the privileges of a native citizen. Many of them are my acquaintances and friends, and I cannot vote against them. I hope, therefore, Mr. President, that the amendment may not be adopted.

Mr. CLAY of Kentucky wished the Senate would go for the interests of the whole Union, as a people, and not so exclusively for the new States. This domain was the public property—the property of the whole people of the United States; and he thanked the Senator from Maryland for introducing a proposition for conferring the bounty of the Government to our own race, instead of holding out a general invitation to all the paupers of all the European Governments to come here, and compete with our own honest poor.

Mr. BUCHANAN said that it was not his intention to go into any detailed argument upon the question before the Senate. He would merely state, in general terms, the reasons why he should vote for the bill. This he would do, not for the purpose of convincing others, but of placing himself in the position which he desired to occupy.

It had been repeated over and over again in the course of this debate, that the bill before the Senate would confer a bounty upon the actual settlers on the public lands, at the expense of the people of the United States. He denied that it would produce any such effect. These settlers would be compelled to pay the minimum price of one dollar and twenty-five cents per acre for their land. Could the Government now obtain more for it at public auction had it remained unsettled? Let the history of the past answer this question. From the first of January, 1823, until the present day, averaging all the land sales which had been made, the result was that we had received two, three, four, five, or at the most, six cents per acre more than what the settlers would be obliged to pay under this bill. Senators had differed in their statements upon this subject; but none of them had contended that the average price upon the whole sales exceeded one dollar and thirty-one cents per acre. The Commissioner of the Land Office states it to have been one dollar and twenty-seven cents and nine-twentieths. The question then was, whether for the prospect, and a hopeless one it was, of obtaining six cents per acre more at public auction, we should attempt to expel the settlers from their lands, and thus, by depriving them of a home, inflict the greatest misery and distress npon themselves and their families?

Mr. B. said that our past experience ought to have taught us, that this was a question in which the Government had but little, if any, pecuniary interest. It was a question between the actual settlers on the one side, and the organized bands of speculators which attended the land sales on the other. It was notorious—it had often been established on this floor—that these speculators, acting in concert, had prevented bidding above the minimum price, and had purchased our most valuable lands at a dollar and a quarter per acre. If the settlers should not obtain these lands at this price, the speculators would. This was the alternative. Turn this question and argue it in whatever mode you might, still we come to the same result. It was a matter of indifference, so far as the Treasury was concerned, whether you granted these pre-emptions or not. In either event, the Government would neither be benefited nor injured. Then he was called upon to decide between the actual settler, who had spent his time and his labor in cutting down the forest and preparing himself a home in the wilderness, and the heartless speculator who might be anxious to deprive these hardy pioneers of the benefit of their toil, and to purchase the land which they had improved. He could not hesitate upon this subject. Past experience had rendered it certain that the United States will never receive more for their land than a cent or two per acre above the minimum price; and for this inconsiderable difference, he would not turn off the men who have settled upon our public lands, in order that they might be monopolized at the public sales by speculators. Let the actual settler have "the first cut," and sufficient will remain for the companies of speculators who attend the public auctions. He had no doubt that in both these modes of sale there had been frauds; but he should always lean to that side which would protect the poor man in the possession of the land which he had rendered valuable by the sweat of his brow, rather than in favor of those who had come from a distance to purchase him out of house and home.

Mr. B. probably should not have said a word upon the subject, had it not been for the amendment which had been offered by the Senator from Maryland, (Mr. MERRICK.) This amendment proposed to make an invidious distinction, which had never been made heretofore in our legislation, against foreigners who had settled upon the public lands, and had not been naturalized prior to the first day of December last. Whilst it granted pre-emptions in such cases to our own citizens, it excluded these foreigners. Why had this change been proposed in our settled policy? He had observed with regret, that attempts were now extensively making throughout the country, to excite what was called a native American feeling against those who had come from a foreign land to participate in the blessings of our free Constitution. Such a feeling was unjust—it was ungrateful. In the darkest days of the Revolution, who had assisted us in fighting our battles, and achieving our independence? Foreigners, yes, sir, foreigners. He would not say, for he did not believe, that our independence could not have been established without their aid; but he would say the struggle would have been longer and more doubtful. After the Revolution, emigration had been encouraged by our policy. Throughout the long and bloody wars in Europe which had followed the French revolution, this country had ever been an asylum for the oppressed of all nations. He trusted that at this late day, the Congress of the United States were not about to establish for the first time, such an odious distinction as that proposed between one of our citizens, who had settled upon the public lands, and his neighbor who had pursued the same course under the faith of your previous policy, merely because that neighbor had not resided long enough within the United States to have become a naturalized citizen. He was himself the son of a naturalized foreigner, and perhaps might feel this distinction the more sensibly on that account. He was glad the yeas and nays had been demanded, that he might record his vote against the principle proposed by the amendment.

Mr. CLAY of Ky. replied to Mr. BUCHANAN denying that the actual settlers were in a majority of cases found residing permanently on the lands, which they had been hired to claim, and to hold, by speculators, for the purpose of getting these best portions of the public domains into their hands. He maintained that there was a loss to the Government by the pre-emption system,—and argued that the system was a flagrant violation of that equality which is justice, and that it would produce, and was producing lawlessness and disorder in those domains.

But the honorable Senator from Pennsylvania has alluded eulogistically to foreigners. Does he mean to compare the De Kalbs, the Steubens, the Lafayettes, the Pulaskis, with the hordes of foreign paupers that are constantly flooding our shores? There were other foreigners who mingled in our Revolutionary struggle, but on the other side; the Hessians,—and can they be compared with those gallant men who came here to aid in the cause of struggling liberty? He thought this Government had been quite as liberal in its policy towards foreigners, as was proper or desirable: and no Senator would vote against the proposition of the Senator from Maryland with more pleasure than that with which he would vote for it.

Mr. BUCHANAN remarked, that after all which had been said, or could be said, by the Senator from Kentucky, one thing was clear, and that was, that whether we granted the public lands to actual settlers, or exposed them to sale at auction, the price which we received was about the same. After all the violent denunciations of this measure which he had heard, and the extravagant statements which had been made, he was astonished to find, from the official document read by the Senator from Mississippi, (Mr. WALKER,) that comparatively so small a portion of the public lands had been sold to pre-emptioners. He had not investigated the subject minutely; and therefore asked Mr. WALKER to state the number of acres. [Mr. W. said that the whole number since July, 1820, was 2,387,650 acres.]

Then, said Mr. B. the result of the whole matter is, that since that time not one twentieth of all the public lands which had been sold was purchased by actual settlers at the minimum price; and we may have possibly lost, according to the official returns some two or three cents per acre. And this is the mighty matter in dispute. In the hope that we may realize this paltry difference, we are asked to drive the actual settlers from their homes, in order that the organised bands of speculators, of which we have heard so much, may obtain this land at the very same price. This was the question and the only question.

Wise and practical statesmen would study the actual condition of the country, and never attempt that which was, from its nature, morally impossible. We ought to yield with a good grace to circumstances which we could not control. In what situation were we now placed? A very great number of persons had settled upon the public land since the date of the last pre-emption law. They had gone there on the presumption that you would place them upon the same footing with those who had gone there before them. You had for years pursued this system, and you had passed no law which indicated any intention of abandoning it. You had thus, to a certain extent, pledged your faith that you would respect the rights which might be acquired in this manner. You were now placed in a condition that you could not draw back, even if you would. In that part of Wisconsin west of the Mississippi called Iowa, there were now more than thirty thousand settlers on the public lands. They had formed themselves into counties and erected court-houses, and this Government had sent them judges. They were now a flourishing and prosperous community, under the protection of your laws. They had cleared away the forests, had erected farm houses and barns, planted orchards, cultivated the land, and were surrounded by all the necessaries and many of the conveniencies of life. Could you now expel such an entire community from their homes? The attempt would be vain. It would cast disgrace upon the Government. After an unavailing effort, it would be abandoned. It might be persisted in until civil commotion would be excited, and blood would be shed. At that point it must end. The moral sense of the people of this country would be roused against proceeding further.

It is true that if the whole power of the United States were exerted for such a purpose, we might destroy this happy community, and drive them from their homes; but it would never thus be exerted. It is wise, therefore, to submit at once to a moral necessity which has been imposed upon you in consequence of your own conduct. It is true that you may lose a cent or two per acre on the price of the land; but is such a loss worth mentioning when compared either with the calamities and injustice you would inflict by a rigid adherence to the letter of the law, or with the expense which you would incur by sending an armed force into that country, in a vain attempt to enforce its provisions?

Mr. B. had been asked by the Senator from Kentucky if he would compare the hordes of foreign paupers that are constantly flooding our shores with the DeKalbs, the Steubens, the Lafayettes, and the Pulaskis of the Revolution? It was easy to ask such a question. He felt a deep and grateful veneration for the memory of these illustrious men. They were leaders of our armies; but what could they have accomplished without soldiers? Was it not a fact known to the world, that the emigrants from the Emerald Isle—that land of brave hearts and strong arms—had shed their blood freely in the cause of our liberty and independence. It was now both ungrateful and unjust to speak of these people, in the days of our prosperity, as hordes of foreign paupers. Such was not the language applied to them during the Revolutionary war, when they constituted a large and effective proportion of our armies.

The Senator had asked if he (Mr. B.) would grant pre-emptions to the Hessians? It was true they had fought upon the wrong side, and were not much entitled to our sympathies. Still some apology might be made, even for them. They were the slaves of despotic power; and they were sold by their masters, like cattle, to the British Government. They had no will of their own, but were under the most abject subjection to petty princes, who considered themselves, by the grace of God, born to command them. But the condition even of the poor Hessian has since been greatly improved. The principles of liberty, which were sanctified by the American Revolution, are winning their way among every civilized people. In no country have they made greater progress than among the people of Germany. The Hessian of the present day is far different from what his fathers were; and let me tell Senators from the West that the best settlers they can have amongst them are the Germans. Industrious, honest and persevering, they make the best farmers of our country; whilst their firmness of character qualifies them for defending it against any hostile attacks which may be made by the Indians along our western frontier. As to the hordes of foreigners of which we had heard, they did not alarm him. Any foreigner from any country under the sun, who, after landing with his family on our Atlantic coast, will make his long and weary way into the forests or prairies west of the Mississippi, and there, by patient toil, establish a settlement upon the public lands, whilst he thus manifests his attachment to our institutions, shows that he is worthy of becoming an American citizen. He furnishes us, by his conduct, the surest pledge that he will become a citizen the moment the laws of the country permit. In the mean time, so far as my vote is concerned, he shall continue to stand upon the same footing with citizens, and have his quarter section of land at the minimum price.

Some further debate ensued, in which Messrs. WALKER, CLAY of Alabama, LINN, and others, took part.

Mr. CALHOUN expressed himself friendly to the amendment, and opposed to the bill.

The question on the amendment was then taken by yeas and nays, and decided in the negative—for the amendment 15, against it 28, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Bayard, Clay of Kentucky, Clayton, Crittenden, Knight, Merrick, Prentiss, Preston, Rives, Robbins, Smith of Indiana, Southard, Spence, Tallmadge, and Tipton—15.

NAYS—Messrs. Allen, Benton, Brown, Buchanan, Calhoun, Clay of Alabama, Cuthbert, Fulton, Grundy, Hubbard, King, Linn, Lumpkin, Lyon, Mouton, Nicholas, Niles, Norvell, Pierce, Roane, Robinson, Sevier, Walker, Webster, White, Williams, Wright, and Young—28.

Mr. CLAY of Kentucky then offered the following amendment:

"Be it further enacted, That all settlements upon the public lands subsequent to the first day of December, eighteen hundred and thirty-seven, shall be, and hereby are, strictly prohibited; and the President shall be, and hereby is, authorized and required to cause all persons who may settle on the public lands subsequent to the day aforesaid to be removed therefrom."

Mr. C. said this amendment was strictly in accordance with the views presented in the President's Message; and he should call for the yeas and nays, to see how many might, for the first time, run counter to any recommendation from that quarter. In this instance he would be an Administration man for once, and vote for the adoption of the measure. Mr. C. read extracts from the message of the President, in relation to the land system, which he eulogized as wise, and in accordance with the old land system, before these iniquitous pre-emption claims were pressed upon the consideration of the Senate.

Mr. BUCHANAN said if it were not so late in the evening, and if he felt a disposition to make a speech against Executive influence, what an occasion had just been presented for it by the Senator from Kentucky! That he, of all men, should be found eulogising the late message of President Van Buren, and reading extracts from it for the avowed purpose of influencing the votes of Senators in favor of his amendment! Wonders would never cease. On another occasion, to which he (Mr. B.) had often alluded, he had followed the leading of the Senator from Kentucky, and a former Senator from New Hampshire; but he would now withhold his allegiance from this new coalition between the President and the Senator from Kentucky. He would vote against them both.

If time permitted, although he could not equal, he might at least emulate the eloquence of the Senator who had formerly denounced Executive influence in such glowing and patriotic strains upon this floor. He might say that the Executive power was expanding its vast jaws, and was ready to swallow up all the other powers of the Government. That Congress was about to be annihilated, and the President, under the forms of the Constitution, about to become the real despot of the country, when an Executive message was openly read in the Senate of the United States for the purpose of influencing its members. But he would forbear. He had only risen to express his astonishment.

Mr. CLAY was glad that the attention of the Senator from Pennsylvania was at length awakened to the dangers of Executive influence. He presumed that Senator's opposition to the recommendations of the President would last about as long as his own (Mr. CLAY's) advocacy of them; that is to say, for about three minutes, or until the next Executive measure should be introduced, when he (Mr. B.) would doubtless take the opportunity of returning to his allegiance.

Mr. BUCHANAN said that he should probably be inclined to do so, unless that measure should be endorsed by the honorable Senator from Kentucky.

Mr. CLAY good humoredly said, "Very fair, sir, very fair!"

The question was then taken on the amendment, and lost—ayes 17, noes 27.

YEAS—Messrs. Bayard, Calhoun, Clay of Kentucky, Clayton, Crittenden, Davis, Knight, Merrick, Morris, Prentiss, Preston, Roane, Robbins, Southard, Spence, Webster, and Williams—17.

NAYS—Messrs. Allen, Benton, Brown, Buchanan, Clay of Alabama, Cuthbert, Fulton, Grundy, Hubbard, King, Linn, Lumpkin, Lyon, Mouton, Nicholas, Niles, Norvell, Pierce, Rives, Robinson, Sevier, Smith of Indiana, Tipton, Walker, White, Wright, and Young—27.

Mr. SMITH of Indiana then moved an adjournment, on which Mr. WALKER asked the yeas and nays; the motion was lost—yeas 21, nays 23.

YEAS—Messrs. Bayard, Calhoun, Clay of Kentucky, Clayton, Crittenden, Davis, Knight, Merrick, Prentiss, Preston, Rives, Roane, Robbins, Ruggles, Smith of Indiana, Southard, Spence, Tallmadge, Tipton, Webster, and White—21.

NAYS—Messrs. Allen, Benton, Brown, Buchanan, Clay of Alabama, Cuthbert, Fulton, Grundy, Hubbard, Linn, Lumpkin, Lyon, Mouton, Nicholas, Niles, Norvell, Pierce, Robinson, Sevier, Walker, Williams, Wright, and Young—23.

Mr. SMITH of Indiana said, since he had last addressed the Senate on the amendment he had originally offered, to confine the pre-emption to lands, the Indian title to which had been extinguished six months prior to the first day of December last, the Senate had rejected his amendment; and the Senator from Tennessee (Mr. WHITE) had proposed an amendment which had been adopted, having received the vote of himself and colleague. By this amendment, all claims for pre-emptions are excluded, to which the Indian title had not been extinguished at the time of the settlement. This amendment, his colleague thought, would exclude the Miami lands, owing to the fact that the treaty ceding them was not approved by the President until the 22d of December last, and the bill, with the amendment, provides for settlements after the Indian title was extinguished, and by or before the first of December. He (Mr. S.) found, by an examination of the treaty, that it was not approved till that time. He had no doubt but that his colleague honestly believed that such would be the construction of the bill; and there may be great doubt about it. He, (Mr. S.) however, believed that the whole proceedings would relate back to the date of the contract, the date of the treaty. He believed this to be the universal construction. He wished to have the whole matter between the State and the settlers entirely excluded from the operations of this bill. His colleague thought such was the situation of the case as the bill now stands: he thought otherwise. He did not, however, rise at this time to complain of any vote, nor to repeat the arguments he had offered in favor of his amendment, but merely to say, that since that vote was taken, he had received an Indianapolis paper, by which it appears that the subject had been introduced into the Senate of the State of Indiana, by a resolution instructing the Committee of Ways and Means to inquire into the expediency of reporting a joint resolution instructing her Senators and requesting her Representatives in Congress to use their influence in obtaining for the State of Indiana the right of pre-emption, at the minimum price, the lands lately acquired of the Miami Indians, to aid and assist in the progress of her works of internal improvement. Pending the question on this proposition, a motion was made by the Senator representing the district including the reserve, to amend by striking out the word "State," and inserting "all individuals who have settled on said lands in anticipation of a renewal of the pre-emption law." This motion was decided by the Senate in the negative, by a vote of 37 to 6. The question recurred on the original proposition, and after a full argument, it was decided in the affirmative, by a vote of 39 to 5. The Senators who voted in the affirmative, were Messrs. Baird, Beard, Bowen, Bradbury, Brady, Casey, Chambers, Clark, Cole, Colerick, Crawford, Daily, Dobson, Dunn, Dunning, Elliott, Finch, Hacket, Hoagland, Kennedy, Little, Mitchell, Morgan of D., Morgan of R., Mount, Seigler, Stafford, Stewart, Tenman, Thompson of J., Thompson of L., Thompson of P., Trask, Tuley, Walker, Watt, and Wawter. Those Senators who voted against the resolution, were Messrs. Cathcart, Ewing, Green, Smith, and Watts of D.

The Senate of that State well apprised of the merits of the claims of the settlers on these lands, rejected a motion to insert them in the resolution, even of inquiry, by a vote of 37 to 6, and passed the resolution assuming the very grounds that he Mr. S. had occupied before Senate a few days ago on his proposed amendment, by a vote of 39 to 5. Thus sustained in his opinion of the merits of the question, he felt it to be his duty to move to amend the bill, by striking out the word "December," and inserting the word "September;" if this amendment prevails, it will exclude these lands, and leave the question open for further consideration in relation to them.

This amendment was afterwards so modified, as to read:

Provided, That the lands ceded to the United States by the treaty of 1837, with the Miami Indians in Indiana, shall be excluded from the operations of this act.

Mr. TIPTON said that he would make no apology to the Senate for trespassing on their attention even at this late hour, as those acquainted with his course here well knew that he seldom occupied much of their time in making speeches; but he felt called upon to reply to the remarks made by his honorable colleague in support of his motion to amend the bill now under consideration; and before he sat down, he hoped to satisfy his colleague and a majority of the Senate that his amendment was uncalled for. If doubts had existed in the mind of any one as to the impossibility of pre-emption claim resting on the lands lately ceded by the Miami Indians in Indiana, it was put beyond a doubt by the amendment of the Senator from Tennessee, adopted two days ago, for which he voted.

I had hoped, (said Mr. T.) when my colleague rose to address the Senate, that he would have defended our constituents, who are settlers upon the public lands, from the unjustifiable assaults made upon them on this floor; but as he did not see proper to do so, I feel it to be my duty to defend their reputation. I could wish that the task had fallen into abler hands. There are those more able, but none more willing, than myself, to do justice to the people of that noble young State, whose servant I am. I have an account to settle with the honorable Senator from Kentucky, (Mr. CLAY,) in doing which I shall in part reply to the remarks of my colleague. I will not attempt to prolong the debate by entering into a discussion of the merits of the bill now before the Senate. I only desire to correct the errors into which that honorable Senator has fallen in relation to a very respectable portion of the State which I have the honor, in part, to represent here. I was called out of the Senate chamber yesterday for a few moments, on business, whilst the pre-emption bill was under discussion. When I returned to the chamber, the honorable Senator to whom I have alluded was closing his remarks, in opposition to the bill, by reading extracts from a newspaper, published in Indiana. I had not, consequently, an opportunity of hearing all his remarks, nor do I find them reported in the morning papers, but I am informed that he indulged in harsh expressions against the citizens of my State, whom he was pleased to denominate as "squatters on the public lands." I hope he was misunderstood. If that honorable Senator had only alluded to settlers on the public lands in Indiana, in speaking of them in connection with the people of other States, I would not have felt constrained to reply; but he has more than once or twice, on different days, during this debate dwelt it would seem with peculiar emphasis on the squatters on those valuable public lands in Indiana, applying to those who occupied them remarks that shall not go unanswered or uncontradicted. I will repeat as nearly as I can what was told yesterday, and if I go wrong he can correct me. I understood that he denounced the settlers on the lands as a lawless banditti of land robbers, unjustly grasping at the public treasure.

[Here Mr. CLAY rose, and said that he would repeat what he did say on the occasion referred to by the honorable Senator from Indiana. He did say that the squatters on the public lands were a lawless rabble; that they might as well seize upon our forts, our arsenals, or on the public treasure, as to rush out and seize on the public lands.]

Mr. TIPTON resumed. The Senator admits that the expressions used by him amounted to what I have repeated. Does he not know that the laws to prevent trespass on the public lands have never, in a single instance, been put in force for many years, but have stood as a dead letter on our statute books for a quarter of a century? That the emigrants from the old to the new States are in the constant habit of entering upon the best public land they could find, building cabins to shield their families from the pelting of the storm, and cultivating the soil, regardless whether the land had been surveyed or not, with the expectation and intention of paying the Government for the lands whenever they should be brought into market. Has it not been the constant practice of Congress to pass laws to protect the actual settler from the iron grasp of the speculator? And is it just to call those industrious and enterprising citizens, who settle on the public lands with intention to purchase as soon as they come into market, a lawless rabble? I think not. Does the honorable Senator know that the people of four entire counties in Indiana—Porter, Lake, Newton, and Pulaski, with a portion of Miami and other counties—are settlers on the public lands? They are emigrants from the older States, seeking a home in the West.

It is true, sir, most of them are poor, but I trust and believe they are honest. I know them to be honorable, peaceable, law-abiding citizens, who would scorn a dishonorable action as much as the Senator himself. I am personally acquainted with many of them: they are educated, moral, and highly respectable. Many of them would lose nothing by a comparison with members on this floor; and if the honorable Senator holds a different opinion, it is because he has been misinformed. Those who communicated with the honorable Senator on this subject, should have given him another piece of information that might possibly be of service to him in a coming day. They should have informed him that the Indiana State Senate, who adopted the resolution read by him, is composed of men of great respectability—none more so; but like other bodies, its decisions are not unfrequently influenced by considerations which do not appear on the surface, and which in this case I fear were not communicated to him by his informant. It may not be uninteresting to that gentleman to know that a majority of the Senate of Indiana which adopted the resolution, are opposed to the late and present Administration of the General Government. They, of course, follow their great leader, the Senator from Kentucky, and support his land bill. The Administration advocates graduation and pre-emption to actual settlers, whilst the Senator and his friends oppose both. My principal object in rising, was to disabuse the public mind, with regard to the action of the Senate of Indiana. Every question has two sides, and the Senator from Kentucky and my colleague have presented only one of those sides.

While they have shown most conclusively that a certain resolution was adopted by a very large majority in that body, they have carefully concealed the complexion which that question assumed there, and have read and told us just enough to give us to understand that the resolution was passed by an overwhelming majority; and they have endeavored to show that this decision should have influence upon the action of this body.

I will now present to the Senate a brief view of the other side of the question. It is true a resolution was passed in the Senate of the State from which I came, to instruct the Committee of Ways and Means of that body "to inquire into the expediency of reporting a joint resolution instructing their Senators and requesting their Representatives in Congress, to use their influence in obtaining for the State of Indiana the right of pre-emption, at the minimum price, to the lands lately acquired of the Miami Indians, to aid the State in the progress of her works of internal improvements." And is it to be supposed that a majority could be found in that Senate to go against such a resolution? Surely not. And can the Senator suppose that no other motive than opposition to granting the poor settler a pre-emption right to a quarter section of land, improved by the labor of his own hands, influenced the members of the State Senate who voted for the resolution in question? He surely cannot suppose so; but if he does, he is greatly mistaken. It should be borne in mind that the State is embarked in an extensive system of internal improvement. It has created a large debt, with interest accruing. There is a strong party in the State Legislature opposing the system of internal improvement, and exerting themselves to classify the public works, or to suspend a part of them, and put off their completion for many years. The resolution is asking a boon from the General Government, which, if granted, would lighten the burdens of the people, and be of great benefit to the State. It is only to be wondered at that a single vote was recorded against it. Should the resolution be adopted, instructing my colleague and myself to ask a pre-emption to the State, may we hope that the Senator from Kentucky will vote with us? We shall see. I will go as far as my colleague to serve the State. It would afford me great pleasure to aid her in raising means to carry on her public works; but in doing this, as public men we should have an eye as well to individual justice as to public benefit. I do not think that the amendment of my colleague, if adopted, will effect any beneficial object to the State which we represent here. It looks well on paper, but is calculated, in my opinion, to present a false issue. Let us examine it. He tells us that his object is to prohibit individual pre-emptions on the lands lately purchased from the Miamies. If his amendment be adopted, it will make an invidious distinction between our own constituents and the citizens of other new States of the West; and he calls on me to give a vote which would appear to deprive them of a privilege which this bill secures to others. I do not wish to be understood as expressing an opinion that a pre-emption right, under the provisions of this bill, can vest in the lands lately acquired from the Miami Indians. The amendment offered by the Senator from Tennessee, (Mr. WHITE) for which I most cheerfully voted, prohibits the granting of pre-emptions to any person who settled upon the lands before the Indian title had been extinguished. When all the facts about this Miami treaty are properly understood, it seems to me they should quiet the fears of every one who opposes the granting of individual pre-emption rights to any portion of that valuable tract of land. Although this treaty was entered into in 1834, it was not ratified by the Senate until October last. By the resolution of ratification, it was directed to be submitted to the Indians for their assent to certain alterations made on the part of the United States. It was accordingly submitted, and the assent of the Indians obtained in November; but will my colleague say that the cession was complete, and the title of the United States to the land perfect, before the promulgation of the treaty by Executive proclamation? This publication was not made until the 22d of December. I ask, then, how can a pre-emption right be established to lands ceded by this Miami treaty, when the bill under which they are to be claimed provides that the settler shall have been in actual occupation of the land on the 1st of December last, near a month before the promulgation of the treaty which completed the title of the United States to the land in question? On the 1st of December last the land was Indian land, and the amendment of the Senator from Tennessee (Mr. WHITE) expressly prohibits the extension of this right to individuals settled upon such land before the Indian title had been extinguished. I hope the joint resolution will pass our Legislature, and be sent on here instructing us to make an appeal to the liberality of the Senate, to grant to the State a pre-emption right to these lands at the minimum price. We will then have an opportunity of testing the sincerity of those who oppose individual pre-emptions, and have told us that they would greatly prefer granting it to the State in aid of her public words, to granting it to squatters on the public lands. It will afford me great pleasure to exert my feeble abilities in forwarding the wishes of our State, but I greatly fear we will be left in a lean minority. My colleage tells us he would vote against an individual pre-emption right, as an original proposition; that if he votes for it now, it will be because it has become the settled policy of the country. I view the matter in a different light. Nothing can afford me more satisfaction than to vote the most valuable public land owned by the Government to a poor, but honest pioneer, who seeks a home in the western woods. Those who, at this day, emigrate from the old to the new States, are generally from the farms, workshops, schools, or colleges, in the East, who make citizens of great moral worth, and who would grace any society; and I ask, how can a man whose bosom glows with patriotic devotion to his country, deny to the present settlers on the public lands the privileges enjoyed by others for more than a quarter of a century? I cannot: I will not.

The Senator from Kentucky (Mr. CLAY) says there is no equality in the pre-emption system; that it produces dissatisfaction, by going before the survey and seizing upon the choice spots. I admit that it produces dissatisfaction in two classes of individuals—one, the politician in the old States, who is loth to give up the poor but industrious portion of their population; and the other the capitalists, who are anxious to get possession of these choice spots, and who, by attending the public sales and overbidding the poor man, compel him to retire, and content himself with land of an inferior quality. They are dissatisfied, but not wronged.

My colleague complains that politics have been dragged into this debate. He admits that there are those who will be influenced by political considerations. I hope it will be recollected that it was not I who first introduced politics into this discussion. I did not bring forward newspapers here and read what had been said on one side in the Indiana Legislature. I admit, however, that political considerations do sometimes influence the actions of public bodies in Indiana, as well as in other States. I have carefully examined the votes on the resolutions heretofore referred to, and find that every Whig Senator, with perhaps one exception, went for it; while the little band that opposed it urged the claims of the poor pioneer, and the policy of the late and present Administrations. Both the Senator from Kentucky and my colleague referred with great satisfaction to what was said by Whig Senators, but avoided alluding to what was said by Senators on the other side. I think it would have been an act of justice to present both sides of the question. I confess I recur with satisfaction to what was said in favor of the actual settler; and if advocating the measures of the Administration in relation to the public lands be dragging in politics, then I am content to plead guilty to the charge.

Although it has been shown that the resolution was adopted by a large majority of the Senate of Indiana, I do not wish to be understood as admitting that the vote on that resolution is a fair index of the opinions of the people at large as to the policy of granting individual pre-emptions. It only goes to show how many members of the State Senate were willing to ask another grant from this Government to aid her in completing her public works; and I advise the honorable Senator from Kentucky not to be too hasty in believing that a majority of the people of Indiana are opposed to seeing Congress grant a pre-emption right to a quarter section of land to an actual settler, after he has improved it by the labor of his own hands.

A word to the honorable Senator from Ohio, (Mr. MORRIS,) and I have done. He tells us that enormous speculations are about to be made, should we pass this bill, without the amendment now under consideration; and he calls on the Senate to give a vote that shall prevent it. I have stated that the pre-emption right cannot rest on the Miami lands. Upon the subject of speculations, he may be better informed than I am, but I assure him that I am not, and never expect to be, personally interested, directly or indirectly, to the value of one cent, in any pre-emption that may be, granted or obtained by the bill before us, or the Miami lands, or any other lands.

He tells us that a very large majority of the Indiana Legislature is opposed to pre-emptions. How does he know it? I will thank him for any information he may see fit to give us that comes from Indiana; but I hope he will permit me to inform him that he is greatly mistaken if he thinks that a majority of the yeomanry of that State oppose pre-emption laws. The large money holders there, as elsewhere, oppose them; but the bone and sinew of the country, who make their living by the sweat of their brow, each, and every one of them, would be willing to accept a pre-emption right to one quarter section of land at a dollar and a quarter an acre, if they could get it.

Mr. SMITH of Indiana said he did not rise to protract this debate at this late hour, but to reply to one or two positions assumed by his colleague, (Mr. TIPTON.) He (Mr. S.) regretted exceedingly to hear his colleague attempt to place this matter on party grounds. The paper from which both himself and his colleague derived their knowledge of the vote in the Senate of their State, contained the yeas and nays on the question, the same he (Mr. S.) had read to the Senate. Were Senators Brady, Casey, Crawford, Daily, Dobson, Dunning, Finch, Hacket, Stewart, Trask, Tuley and Watt, Opposition men. Were they opposed to this Administration? And yet these Senators all voted against the pre-emption to these settlers on the Miami reserve, and in favor of a pre-emption to the State. He (Mr. S.) knew these Senators personally; he knew them to stand in the first ranks of the friends of the Administration in the State. They were, like the other Senators, gentlemen of talents and integrity, possessing an intimate knowledge of this question, and the interest of the parties. They were, as were the other Senators, gentlemen, he was proud to say, who were governed by the interest of their constituents, and who would scorn to test their devotion to that interest by party considerations. No, sir: it was no party measure, or in any way affected by general politics. In the nature of things, it could not be. It was not there so considered, where the merits of the question were known; and he hoped it would not be so here, where many of the Senators are unacquainted with its merits.

His colleague had said that owing to the value of these lands to the State, and her situation, involved as she is in debt, with her internal improvements in progress, he only wondered that even five Senators could be found to vote for these settlers, in opposition to a pre-emption to the State. In this he (Mr. S.) fully concurred with his colleague; and he would add that he felt disposed to vote in favor of what he believed to be the interest of the State. He (Mr. S.) concurred entirely with his colleague as to the respectability of many of the settlers on the public lands in Indiana, who would be benefited by this bill; and for them he had the kindest feelings. But his public duties to the whole State were paramount to any personal feelings for a part of her citizens. He represented the whole, and not a part only; and he could not consent to give any vote that might greatly prejudice the whole of the citizens of the State, although it might confer a benefit on the few. He had now fully discharged what he believed to be his duty to the State he had the honor in part to represent; and he would close by repeating that he could not vote for this bill, if the interest of his State was to be compromitted by it; and he feared it would be, if the bill passes without the amendment.

The question was then taken on the amendment, and lost—yeas 17, nays 19, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Allen, Buchanan, Calhoun, Clay of Kentucky, Clayton, Merrick, Morris, Niles, Pierce, Prentiss, Preston, Roane, Smith of Indiana, Spence, Webster, White, and Williams—17.

NAYS—Messrs. Benton, Brown, Clay of Alabama, Cuthbert, Fulton, Hubbard, King, Linn, Lumpkin, Lyon, Mouton, Nicholas, Norvell, Robinson, Sevier, Tipton, Walker, Wright, and Young—19.

Mr. CRITTENDEN then moved an adjournment, on which motion the ayes and noes were called for, and were—yeas 21, nays 21. The VICE PRESIDENT voting in the negative, the motion was lost.

YEAS—Messrs. Brown, Calhoun, Clay of Kentucky, Davis, Knight, Merrick, Morriss, Prentiss Preston, Roane, Robbins, Smith of Indiana, Southard, Spence, Tallmadge, Webster, White, Williams, and Young—21.

NAYS—Messrs. Allen, Benton, Clay of Alabama, Cuthbert, Fulton, Hubbard, King, Linn, Lumpkin, Lyon, Mouton, Nicholas, Niles, Norvell, Pierce, Robinson, Sevier, Tipton, Walker, and Wright—21.

Mr. MORRIS immediately renewed the motion to adjourn. Negatived—ayes 18, noes 19.

Mr. PRENTISS then offered the following amendment:

"Nor shall any person have any right, or be entitled to a patent, under or by virtue of this act, without paying, in addition to the statute minimum price, at least one-half of the real value of the land above that price, not including improvements, to be ascertained by three judicious and disinterested appraisers under oath, to be appointed by the register of the land office in the district where the land is situated."

This amendment was also negatived by a vote of 27 to 10, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Clay of Kentucky, Clayton, Crittenden, Davis, Merrick, Prentiss, Preston, Roane, Southard, and Spence—10.

YEAS—Messrs. Allen, Benton, Brown, Buchanan, Clay of Alabama, Cuthbert, Fulton, Hubbard, King, Linn, Lumpkin, Lyon, Mouton, Nicholas, Niles, Norvell, Pierce, Robinson, Sevier, Smith of Indiana, Tipton, Walker, Webster, White, Williams, Wright, and Young—27.

Mr. CLAY of Kentucky moved an adjournment: negatived—ayes 16, noes 21.

On motion of Mr. YOUNG, the bill was amended by striking out the part relating to the cultivation of one acre in corn, small grain, cotton, potatoes, or the sugar cane, and a substitute inserted requiring that the settler should be a householder of twenty-one or more years of age, and (on the suggestion of Mr. WEBSTER) should be an actual resident on the land for which pre-emption should be claimed.

The bill having been reported to the Senate as amended, it was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading by a vote of 26 to 12, as follows:

NAYS—Messrs. Calhoun, Clay of Kentucky, Clayton, Crittenden, Davis, Merrick, Prentiss, Preston, Roane, Smith of Indiana, Southard, and Spence—12.

The Senate adjourned.

MONDAY, January 29, 1838.

The bill to grant pre-emption rights to actual settlers on the public lands being read a third time, and the question being, Shall the bill pass?

Mr. WEBSTER rose and said, that whatever opposition might be made to this bill, in his opinion, some provision of this nature was necessary and proper, and therefore he had supported it, and he should now vote for its final passage.

Although entirely indisposed (said Mr. W.) to adopt any measure which may prejudice the public interest, or trifle with this great subject, and opposed at all times to all new schemes and projects, I still think the time has come when we must, from necessity, propriety, and justice, make some provision for the existing case. We are not now at the moment when pre-emption rights are first to be granted; nor can we recall the past. The state of things now actually existing must be regarded. To this our serious attention is summoned. There are now known to be many thousands of settlers on public lands, either not yet surveyed, or the surveys not yet returned, or, if surveyed, not yet brought into market for sale.

The first question naturally is, how came they there? How did this great number of persons get on to the public lands? And to this question it may be truly answered, that they have gone on to the lands under the encouragement of previous acts of Congress. They have settled and built houses, and made improvements, in the persuasion that Congress would deal with them in the same manner as it has, in repeated instances, dealt with others. This has been the universal sentiment and expectation. Others have settled on the public lands certainly with less encouragement from acts of Congress than these settlers have had, and have yet been allowed a pre-emption right. These settlers, therefore, have confidently looked for the same privilege.

Another circumstance is fit to be mentioned. Very large purchases of the public land are known to have been made in in 1835 and 1836. These purchases exceeded the quantity necessary for actual settlement; and they were made, in many cases, in large tracts, by companies or by large single proprietors, who purchased for purposes of investment, and with a view to retain the lands until their value should be enhanced by the general settlement and improvement of the country. These purchases would be, of course, of the best and freshest lands in the market; that is, they would be in the most recent surveys, or, in other words, in the surveyed districts most advanced into the interior. Now I have understood from good authority, that it has often happened in the Northwest, (and of the Southwest I know little,) that persons disposed to perchase and settle on the frontier have, in many instances, found themselves unable to buy to their satisfaction, either of Government or individulals. Government had sold the best lands to companies or to individual proprietors, and these last were disposed to keep, and not to sell. Or they or their agents were either unknown, or were living in distant parts of the country, so that application to purchase could not readily be made to them.

These circumstances, there can be no doubt, created a new incentive to pass beyond the surveys set down on the public domain, and trust to Congress for a pre-emption right, such as had been granted in previous instances. The result of these causes is, that settlements have become quite extensive, and the number of people very large. In that part of Wisconsin which lies west of the Mississippi there are supposed to be from thirty to fifty thousand inhabitants. Over this region Congress has extended civil government, established courts of law, and encouraged the building of villages and towns, and yet the country has not been brought into the market for sale, except it may be small quantities for the sites of villages and towns. In other parts of Wisconsin a similar state of things exists, especially on and near the border of Lake Michigan, where numerous settlements have been made and commercial towns erected, some of them already of considerable importance, but where the title to the land still remains in the Government. Similar cases exist in Indiana, Illinois, and Michigan, and probably, also, in the Southwestern States.

Now, said Mr. W. the practical question is, what is to be done in these cases? What are we to do with those settlers, their improvements, and the lands on which they live? Is there any one who would propose or desire that these lands should be put up at open auction, improvements and all, and sold to the highest bidder, without any regard whatever to the interest or protection of the settlers? For my part, I could propose no such thing, nor by any means consent to any such thing.

Nor do I suppose that there could be such an auction, and that other persons could attend and bid at it freely, and over-bid the actual settlers for their own settlements and improvements, without disturbance and violation of the public peace. Nor would a dollar of money, in my judgment, be realized by the Treasury by such a course of proceeding, beyond what would be received for the same lands under this law. As to the general justice of the bill, its policy, or the degree of indulgence which it holds out to those who have become settlers, it ought to be remembered—

1. That it applies only to those who have now already settled on the public lands. And I am quite willing to concur with others in carrying out the recommendations of the President's message, by adopting such measures as may be thought wise and reasonable for the future, as shall prevent the recurrence hereafter of any necessity for laws like this.

2. The bill makes no donation, or gratuity. It grants only a pre-emption right—a right of previous purchase, at the price for which the greater part of the public lands has been, and now is, actually sold.

3. It gives this right only to the extent of one quarter section—not more than a reasonable quantity for a farm, in the estimation of the inhabitants of these new and vast regions.

4. It gives the right only to heads of families, or householders, actually settled and residing on the tract.

And, in my opinion, it is much in favor of this bill, that what it does grant, it grants (where the requisite proof is made) at once and for ever, without mischievous qualifications, and conditions subsequent, such as formed part of the bill of last year.

It has been proposed to amend this bill, so as to limit its benefits to native or naturalized citizens of the United States.

Although I have heretofore been disposed to favor such a proposition, yet, on the whole, I I think it ought not to pass; because such a limitation has been altogether unknown, in our general system of land sales, and to introduce it here, where we are acting on rights already acquired, would be both invidious and unjust.

It has been proposed, also, so to amend the bill as to require that the settler, in addition to the dollar and a quarter per acre, should pay one-half the actual value of the land above that sum; this value to be ascertained by appraisers, appointed by the Register of the Land Office. I could not agree to this amendment; because, in the first place, we have never adopted the principle of selling lands on appraisement; but, secondly and mainly, because, if these settlers have had any ground or reason to expect a pre-emption right from Congress, (which is the substantial foundation of the bill,) they had had, and now have, reason to expect it, on the same terms on which it has been granted to others.

Mr. President, that there may be some undeserving persons among these settlers, I do not doubt. That the advantages of this bill may be enjoyed, in some cases, by those who are not actual settlers, with honest, bona fide purpose of permanent residence, is very probable. But I believe the great majority of the cases to which the bill will apply will be such as ought to be relieved. I believe the bill is the readiest way of quieting these titles and possessions, which the public interest requires should, in some way, be quieted without further delay. Indeed, no course is proposed, but either to pass this bill, or to bring the lands at once to public auction, open to the biddings of all. This last course, I am persuaded, would result in no gain whatever to the Treasury, whilst it might be attended with serious inconveniences to the public, and would be sure to throw whole neighborhoods, villages, and counties, into a state of much excitement, much perplexity, and much distress. Both for the general interests of the country, and for the interest and protection of the settler, I am of opinion that the bill ought to pass.

Mr. BAYARD spoke for some time against the policy which the friends of the bill desired to pursue, to wit: maturing this business of pre-emption into a system. That many individuals had settled land under a belief that they were legally entitled to do so, he did not doubt; but that there were others who had taken possession with a view to speculate on the public domain, he had just as little doubt. Mr. B. thought that most of the frauds had hitherto grown out of floats, and he was glad to see that the bill before them had been guarded in that particular; and if there had been any thing in it repudiating the idea of adopting the system as a general policy, he might have been induced to vote for it. As it was, however, he was unwilling to sanction the principle. Mr. B. spoke of the rapid manner in which the new States had sprung up; and now that they had attained to their present population, it was no longer the policy of the nation to drain the old States to enlarge the new, which would certainly be the effect produced if the pre-emption system were made a continuous measure. By referring to the last census, it would be seen that while the old States were stationary, or nearly so, the western States were increasing at a ratio of eighty-five per cent. If the inducements held out by the pre-emption system were continued, it would drain the old States of their agricultural population and advance the new at the expense of the old.

Mr. FULTON began by expressing the reluctance with which he mingled in a protracted debate that had been so fully and ably sustained by gentlemen on both sides of the question; but coming as he did from one of the new States which was, perhaps, more deeply interested than any other, he felt it his duty to say something on this occasion. The measure before them was of the greatest importance to the citizens of the new States, because numbers of them were in a situation where they would have it in their power to make themselves independent if it became a law, but who, if it did not pass, would be driven from their homes, rendered valuable by their enterprise and industry, and injured in their present and future prospects in a way that it was incumbent on Congress to prevent. Those Senators who took a different view of the subject from him and his friends, labored under great misapprehensions, which he had hoped that the developments of this discussion would have removed. They did not, he would undertake to say, understand the characters of the people for whose benefit this bill was framed; and in representing them as lawless intruders on the public domain, they did not represent them truly. No, sir, said Mr. F. they are a law-abiding people, and in all other respects except being found on the public lands without a legal title, they conform as strictly to the laws, and are as well ordered and industrious a community as the people of any other portion of the Union. In truth it was the hardships these people endured, the habits formed and the spirit of adventure created, which had given such an enterprising character to the citizens of the West. And why is it, asked Mr. F. that they resort to the public domain before obtaining a legal title to it? It was because, in travelling with their families to the West, they had exhausted their little means, and they were not able to make an immediate purchase, and therefore went beyond the lands already in market, which they knew would be entered and taken from them by speculators so soon as they would improve them. It was to gain a little credit, perhaps, of a few months, and to procure the means of complying with the demands of the Government that they were induced to take possession of the vacant unoccupied spot, which they honestly and in good faith intended by purchase to make their own, by giving for it, when brought into market, the same price at which the Government was able to sell all her public lands. And what should be the policy of the Government with respect to persons thus situated? Were they not our fellow-citizens? And shall we deny to them the poor privilege of making an effort to better their condition, or stand coldly by and see them ruined, and their wives and children deprived of a home and a shelter? Was not the vast public domain the common property of the people? Ought not all who desire to live by cultivating the soil, to be encouraged to do so by the Government? Were there not millions of acres of this common property lying idle, to which the Government had a title, but which was valueless while it was waste and uncultivated; and which she could not have sold during our lives, if it had not been penetrated and opened by those very settlers who have gone into the wilderness and converted it into flourishing settlements. It was only when waste land was improved that its true value could be known, and it was by settlement and improvement in this way that it was brought into notice and estimation. Was it, then, just or reasonable that the settler, whose labor had given value to the land, should have to cope with combinations of speculators, leagued together to keep down the price of the public lands, and to enrich themselves by preying on the industrious cultivator? Ought he not to have a preference in the purchase of at least one quarter section of land? It was only because of these combinations at the public sales that the lands of the Government, particularly those in the improved districts, were prevented from bringing a vast deal more than the minimum price. It was because, when the sales were advertised, and every means used by the Government to produce competition, and make the lands sell for something like their value, that large numbers of capitalists were in the habit of combining together and keeping down the prices, and who, by uniting together, and selecting one of their number to bid alone, were enabled to purchase all the valuable lands offered at auction at a trifle over the minimum price. If these capitalists were not to combine together, but were to enter into an honest competition one with another, the lands would sell for far higher prices than they did. It was a fact that sales had taken place, when the best of the lands were bought up in this manner, and immediately after the sale, these capitalists had an auction of their own, and bidding against each other, run the very lands they had bought up at one dollar and a quarter an acre, to ten and twenty dollars, and then divided amongst the company the money thus made, and to which the Government was fairly entitled if the sale had been honestly conducted. These were the means by which the Government had been defrauded, and not by the means of the honest settler, who enhances the value of the public domain, and assists in bringing it into market. With such claims on the favor of the Government, we present, said Mr. F. this honest settler to your notice, and ask for him his little improvement, of 160 acres, at the Government price. Say that, under this system, a few pre-emptions have been obtained by fraud, are the great body of honest and deserving settlers to be destroyed on this account? Far, far greater abuses have been committed by combinations of land speculators; and if they refused to pass this bill, instead of preventing fraud and speculation, they would be protecting these combinations, and aiding this system of swindling, if he might call it so. Our sales at auction, instead of being fair and open, and affording to the poor, as well as the rich, an equal chance to purchase, have been the means entirely of benefiting the rich, of defrauding the Government, and of oppressing and grinding the poor.

If, said Mr. F. you are to contrast the various speculators on the public lands with each other, would you for a moment hesitate to decide between the "bone and sinew speculators," as the Senator from Connecticut called them, and the money speculators, who combine to keep down the price of the public lands? If, said Mr. F. we asked for this pre-emption privilege as a bounty, if we asked for it as a gift from the Government, and did not propose to pay the average price at which, after every effort to get more, the public lands have been hitherto all sold, we might perhaps be accused of asking something unreasonable; but when we ask to be permitted to pay for it, and to pay, too, the highest price which, it would be seen by the documents on the tables, had ever been received by the Government, it could not be denied that all that was asked for the settlers was the protection of the Government against the speculators, who monopolise all the valuable public lands. Some gentlemen had said that this bill contained new principles, or introduced a new policy in the Government; but it was not so. They were not now about to enact a new pre-emption system. The bill simply provided that those who actually resided, on the first of December last, on public land, shall have the right to enter one quarter section at the minimum price. It gives no right to such as settle after that day. It merely gives to those who have settled upon the public lands since 1834, the same privilege which Congress gave to others in 1830, '32, and '34. If, however, the passage of this bill should encourage others hereafter to settle on the public lands, ought it to be objected to on this account, after contrasting the pre-emption with the auction system?

With regard to the lands in Indiana, acquired under the Miami treaty, and spoken of as being worth from forty to fifty dollars per acre, they would, if put up at auction to-morrow, in consequence of the combinations that would be formed by speculators, produce no more to the Government than one dollar and twenty-five cents per acre. With these considerations, the friends of the bill thought it not unreasonable to ask, that the honest settler and cultivator should be put on the same footing with combinations of speculators. This was the whole state of the case. We are said to be only providing homes for these individuals, who went by hundreds and thousands into the wilderness, reclaimed it by their industry, and while they gave value to the spots selected by themselves, gave increased value to the adjacent property of the Government. Yet it was said that these settlers grasp at vast tracts, actuated by a "heartless, boundless, demoralizing spirit of speculation." That in this way all the best lands are seized upon, leaving none but the inferior lands for competition in the market. This view is altogether erroneous. We know (said Mr. F.) that in Illinois every acre of land is valuable. We know that in Arkansas, prior to 1836, there were whole sections, containing the finest cotton lands of that section of country; and although they had been offered at public sale, no settlement had been made upon them. During that year they were all entered by different companies of land buyers. He lamented the loss of a valuable friend who went there, and purchased for himself and others, and last year settled on these lands. He went with a young and interesting family into this uninhabited region; for he found not a single family within twenty miles of him. He opened a plantation, and had just time to see the wilderness changed into cultivated fields, when he fell a sacrifice to that enterprising spirit which made him risk so much in persuit of independence. There were vast quantities of such lands yet unoccupied, and if it was not for these combinations of speculators, these lands would sell when there was competition in the market, at from twenty to thirty dollars per acre. It, therefore, appeared to him, that in considering this important subject, the Government should be looked upon as a vast landed proprietor, having, as appeared by the documents on file, millions upon millions of acres of land for sale, and hundreds of millions of acres ready to be brought into market. One question then presented itself. Having ascertained that, in consequence of the combinations he had referred to, the price was kept down to the minimum fixed by law, the only question for this great proprietor to consider, was whether he would permit the industrious cultivator who goes with his family into the trackless wilderness, and builds his cabin, to purchase at the price at which only he can sell his best lands at auction or at private entry, or force him to purchase his improvement at a ruinous price from the land speculator; or, as was proposed by the amendment of the Senator from Vermont, force him to pay half its ascertained value, instead of the price at which he sells to all others. Having permitted his wild lands to be occupied and cultivated by settlers, without molestation in all past time, after vast portions of his territory has been explored, opened, and brought into view, by a hardy and daring race of pioneers and settlers, who have thus caused the rapid settlement and sale of his waste possessions, whether he will permit these pioneers to purchase a home from him at his selling price; or will he sell the labor and improvements which these poor pioneers have added to his lands to companies of capitalists, to be sold to them at such prices as their tender mercies may induce them to fix upon their improvements? In such a case, it is easy to determine what a just proprietor would do. The new States have been settled in this manner. Multitudes who have gone upon the public lands, have no knowledge of the law supposed to prohibit them from settling upon them, and do not believe they have violated any law, or interfered with the rights of any man. They have followed the lead of thousands of others, all seeking to better their condition; with, as they supposed, the sanction of their Government; and will this Senate now fix a brand of criminality upon all such? or will it submit to have the noble spirits, who have converted our western wilds into powerful, flourishing and independent States, to be denounced as public spoilers, without standing forward in their vindication? Will the country tolerate an act of injustice to such a people? No, sir, never.

Mr. CALHOUN said that he had remained silent during this discussion, from the conviction, derived from the experience of the last session, that all opposition would be unavailing. Nor did he rise now with the least expectation of changing the vote of a single Senator, but simply to state the grounds of his objections.

If the passage of this bill would terminate the pre-emption system, he, for one, would not object to its passage; for he felt, with the Senator from Massachusetts, that under the influence of the passage of similar bills, many persons had made improvements on the public lands, of which it would be almost cruel to deprive them; and he regretted that the Senator, who had turned his attention to the subject, and who was so well qualified for the task, had not incorporated some provision in the bill to terminate the system, as he was equally opposed to its continuance as himself. Had he done so, the bill would have received his support; but as it is, he was compelled to vote against it.

Considering it, then, as the continuation of a system of passing acts from time to give, giving to the occupant the pre-emption in the sale of public lands, he would ask, when and how the system was to terminate? The passage of every additional bill but confirmed and strengthened it. The same exigency that passed this, would increase the necessity of passing another hereafter, and that a subsequent one, till it would terminate in the surrender of the public domain to those who could first seize on it, unless some means should be adopted in time to terminate the system. Now, sir, if the surrender would be to the poor, but honest and industrious settlers, giving each the one hundred and sixty acres of vacant land on which he might settle first, to be a home for himself and his family, he would have no great objections. But would that be the end? Would it benefit the man, with many children and but little money, who might desire to emigrate to the West to improve the condition of himself and family? His opinion was, that its termination would be directly the reverse. Instead of benefiting the poor and honest emigrant, the system would operate, in the end, to the almost exclusive benefit of the rich, the strong, and the violent. Let it be once firmly and universally fixed in the public mind, as it surely will be under its operation, that the public lands belonged, of right, to those who can first seize them, and the result will be, that the moment a treaty is held to extinguish the Indian title to a tract of land, and long before it is submitted to us for our ratification, an armed body of men, acting for themselves, or with speculators, will rush into it, and make themselves masters of the country, and would exact more from the poor and peaceable emigrant for the liberty of settling, than the United States would for the quiet fee simple of the soil.

If he was correctly informed, the Ioway country had been already seized on by a lawless body of armed men, who had parcelled out the whole region, and had entered into written stipulations to stand by and protect each other, and who were actually exercising the rights of ownership and sovereignty over it—permitting none to settle without their leave, and exacting more for the license to settle, than the Government does for the land itself. In confirmation of this, he would ask the Secretary to read a letter which he had received from an emigrant to that region, with the view to make a settlement; and how he fared there, the letter would show. In desiring it to be read, he had no expectation that it would have any influence over the vote of the members. His object was to turn the attention of the Senate to the actual state of things in that quarter, in the hope that something would be done to provide against the evil in future, and to put an end to a system that led to such results.

[Here Mr. C. handed the letter to the Secretary to be read; but after various objections to it unless the name of the writer was given, which Mr. C. refused to do, from the hazards to which the disclosure, if made, might expose the writer, he finally withdrew it.]

He said, as the reading of the letter was objected to, without the name of the writer, he would not press it, but would give a very brief summary of its statement. He (the writer) stated, that he emigrated with a view to make a settlement; that the country consisted of a small portion of woodland to a large portion of prairie; that the latter was only valuable in connection with the former; that the woodland had been seized on by large bodies of armed men, who had marked out and designated their respective possessions, and entered into written stipulations for mutual protection. He says that he was driven about from place to place without being permitted to form a settlement; that he finally offered to purchase a place for which a most extravagant price was asked, and was at last compelled to purchase at a rate far beyond the Government price. The individual wrote like a man of intelligence and sense. He stated that his life had been menaced, and that he had been informed that the lives of several intruders had paid the forfeit.

Whether these things were so, or not, he did not vouch; but he felt a certain conviction that such must be the final termination of the system, if it has not already reached it; and on that account, among other reasons, he objected to it. He had no objection to people emigrating to the West, in the hope of bettering their condition; and if it were possible to pass a prospective law, giving to every man who would settle on 160 acres of land, with the view to improve and cultivate it, a pre-emptive right, without opening the field of speculation and violence, he knew not that he would object to it. It would be almost unnatural in him to be opposed to the brave and hardy pioneers. He was the immediate descendant of one who spent all the active and vigorous portion of his life on the frontier, and won his home by his courage from the savage enemy; and he had, therefore, a feeling in common with those who were the professed objects of this bill. He objected to it, because it would not effect that object.

He had another and strong objection to the perpetuating the system. So long as it continued, it was utterly impossible to prevent questions in relation to the public domain from running into, and controlling, the party politics of the day. It was too great a stake to be drawn into party struggles, and ought to be withdrawn without delay; or otherwise, they would in a short time be gambled away by the combatants of power. The system, as it stands, operated well enough in the infancy of the Republic, when the new States constituted so small and unimportant a portion of the Union. When he first entered into public life, there were but three new States, including Kentucky and Tennessee, with Ohio; but now there were nine, excluding the two first, which might now be considered old States. These young offsprings of ours have already 18 out of 52 Senators on this floor; and, with the co-operation of 8 from the old States, had one-half of the Senate. Instead of repining at this state of things, he rejoiced at it. He gloried in their wonderful and unparalleled growth. They are our descendants; and he considered the vast and mighty West but as the inheritance of our posterity, bestowed on us by a kind Providence for settlement and improvement. But he could not close his eyes to the fact, that this mighty and still rapidly-progressing change made a thorough and radical change in our land system indispensable. So long as the present state of things continue, you will have 18 solid votes from the new States for a continuance of the pre-emption system, with the whole weight and influence of the public domain constantly bearing perniciously on our party struggles. Of this he became fully convinced on the discussion of the land bill at the last session, in which he took an active part. The result then satisfied him, that so long as the present state of things continued, it was impossible to prevent the incessant agitation of the subject of public lands, or the passage of any particular law, which either the new States, or party considerations, might bring forward. It was useless to complain or resist. It grew out of the nature of things, and must continue so long as that continued.

Under these impressions, he turned his attention at the last session towards a remedy; and after careful investigation he could discover but one, and that was to place the new States in such a condition as to the public lands within their respective limits, as would identify their interest with that of the old; and for that purpose he introduced a bill to cede to them the public lands within those States, under certain conditions, which were intended to secure the interests of the old States, and place the whole system under a solemn compact between the Government and the new States, in order to give it stability and uniformity. His reflections, and the additional experience derived from the present occasion, have satisfied him that there ought to be no delay in effecting a change, and he thought the one he then offered was the best that could be devised; but he was not tenacious, and if there was a better, he hoped that it would be presented. He would cheerfully surrender his for one that might promise an equal or more effective remedy for the growing evil.

He felt much reluctance at making a first move on the subject. He knew that whoever brought forward a measure of this kind, would expose himself to the imputation of ulterior motives; and, though he was conscious that he was not actuated by any such, as he desired nothing of the Government or the people, he had been peculiarly liable to such imputations. It was the more strange that he should be, as he had shown so little regard to popularity or favor as to take, for the last ten years, under a sense of duty, the most likely course that could be to make one unpopular; still he could not exempt himself from such imputations, though he felt conscious there was so little justice in them, that when duty demanded it, he had but little choice between a popular or unpopular act.

Not desiring, for these reasons, to take a lead in proposing a remedy, he would wait and see whether any other Senator, more competent or conversant with the subject, would; but, if not, he would not shun the responsibility of again offering for the consideration of the Senate the bill he introduced at the last session, as the only remedy, in his opinion, capable of reaching the disease.

Mr. LYON said the honorable Senator from South Carolina, (Mr. CALHOUN,) who had just taken his seat, remarked that he lived in an old State, and, not knowing any thing from personal observation of the state of things in the new States, he might be mistaken concerning them. Mr. L. believed he was mistaken; and he entertained no doubt that if he had had the advantage of personal observation there, he would be as much in favor of the policy of those States, in relation to granting pre-emption rights to settlers on the public lands, as any member of the Senate. There is, said Mr. L. but one class of politicians who, in my opinion, have any cause to be opposed to such a policy, and the Senator from South Carolina is not of that class.

The statements contained in the letter which the Senator had received, in relation to the settlers on the public lands in that part of the Territory of Wisconsin west of the Mississippi river, were probably correct, with some few exceptions. The statement, however, that the writer could not find, in the whole country, a piece of good land unoccupied, on which to settle himself, and that the settlers had formed combinations to keep others off, and secure to themselves all the good lands, Mr. L. knew to be untrue. Though the Territory of Wisconsin has been settling very rapidly within the last two or three years, since Mr. L. had been there, he knew very well that there must still remain unoccupied hundreds of thousands of acres of land on both sides of the Mississippi river, of as good quality as could be found in any country; and he knew the hospitable and generous character of the people there too well to believe, for a moment, that any person going there with the intention of becoming an actual settler in the country would be treated badly by those who had gone before him.

They have, it is true, formed pre-emption societies west of the Mississippi, the articles of which Mr. L. had seen published in some of the newspapers, according to which articles the members of such societies are to be allowed to purchase each a quarter section, or one hundred and sixty acres of land, including his improvement, without any competition from the other members at the public sales. Such a society has also been formed by the settlers on the public lands in the State of Michigan.

Now (said Mr. L.) I see nothing so very wrong in this. These societies contemplate no resistance, no force, no violence, either at the public sales, or elsewhere. Any person who chooses to bid against the settlers will be left as free do so, as though they had not been formed. The members merely pledge themselves that they will not disturb each other in the possession of their own improvements. The lands in Wisconsin have been a long time withheld from sale. Had they been brought into market as soon as they were wanted for settlement, there would have been nooccasion for the formation of these societies, for every man could then have bought the piece he wanted for one dollar and twenty-five cents an acre. This is the price of the Government; and no land, however good, lying in advance of the settlements, especially any considerable distance in advance, can ever be worth more. It is impossible, in the very nature of things, that it should be worth more. Why, Mr. President, said Mr. L. what is it that makes land valuable? What but settlement, cultivation, and improvement? Nothing, sir. What would any man give for the best land in the fertile, but wild and uncultivated region west of the Rocky Mountains? Would he give a dollar an acre? Would he give fifty cents, ten cents, or even five cents an acre? If he would, he might have it and welcome, against any thing that I would give. What would any man give for the best land lying only even fifty miles in advance of settlements?

Why, sir, said Mr. L. I know something about this matter. I have travelled some forty or fifty thousand miles, at different times, and in different directions, through the woods and over the prairies, in all parts of that vast region bordering on the Great Lakes and the Upper Mississippi river, embracing a country as fertile as any on the face of the globe; a country, too, which has been and id now filling up with population faster than ann other portion of the United States; and I have seen but very few tracts of land that have ever been sold, or would ever sell, for more than the Government price, before they were reached by the advancing settlements, however rapidly their value might increase afterwards. It has been so throughout the whole northwestern States, and it was so in the empire State of New York. A gentleman of great respectability, now residing in the city of New York, informed me, not long since, that some time about the year 1790, I think it was, said Mr. L. he received as security for a loan of only sixteen thousand dollars, a mortgage on the whole county of Ontario, which then embraced nearly, or quite, the whole of that State lying west of the town of Utica. How many hundreds of millions the same land is now worth, I will not pretend to estimate; but, whatever may be its value, the increase has been caused chiefly by settlement and improvement; the same process which the settlers on the public lands in Michigan and Wisconsin are now carrying on, and which has already caused the wilderness there "to smile and blossom as the rose."

Yet these settlers have been denounced by the Senator from Kentucky (Mr. CLAY) as "land pirates," "plunderers," "robbers!" Do they deserve such epithets? Whom have they robbed? Certainly, not the Government. They are ready to pay for the lands they occupy all the Government could have sold them for had the policy of the Senator from Kentucky been adopted, and the settlers kept off those lands. They have committed no waste; injured no one, either the Government or any individual. They have, in truth, been of service to the Government, by giving additional value to lands lying in the neighborhood of their improvements, and thus enabling the Government to sell those lands at an earlier period than it could have done had their improvements not been made. The Senator from Mississippi (Mr. WALKER) proved, incontestably, from the public documents which he read yesterday, that the average price per acre, for which the public lands have been sold since the date of the pre-emption law of 1830, has been greater than it was for several years pyevious to the passage of that law, and that the average quantity of lands annually sold, and the amount of money paid into the Treasury, therefor, has been increased since the passage of that law more than three hundred per cent. over the averrge annual amount of previous sales! This is sufficient to show that the Government has not been robbed; that the Government has no cause to complain of the effect of the pre-emption laws—and if the Government has not, I ask who has?

But it is said these settlers are trespassers and intruders; that they have violated the laws in settling on the public lands; and therefore, ought not to receive the protection and encouragement which this bill will give them. What laws have they violated? Laws, sir, which do injustice to every poor man in the United States who is unable to purchase land, and seeks a home where he can support himself and family; laws which are as unreasonable as they are unnecessary, and which are opposed to the moral sense of the people; laws which it would require a standing army of a hundred thousand men to enforce; which you never have enforced; which you never can enforce; and which ought, in my opinion, to be repealed immediately. If any reasons can be advanced in support of these laws, I have never heard them; and if there is any instance where they have been enforced, I am not aware of it. I can understand the propriety of laws to prevent waste and injury to the public lands, but can see no reason or justice whatever in laws to prevent their improvement by any person whose comfort or interest may be promoted thereby, without injury to the Government.

I have shown, sir, satisfactorily to myself, at least, that the public lands of the United States will bring the Government more money under the pre-emption system than they will if sold exclusively under the auction system; and, as I have before remarked, I believe there is but one class of politicians who can find any good reason to oppose this system. That class, sir, is made up of the supporters of the famous "American System," a system, the prosperity and success of which, I can well imagine, may require, either that such a duty shall be laid on foreign fabrics as will, in a great degree, prohibit their importation; or that such a policy shall be adopted by the Government, in relation to the public lands, as shall have the effect to confine the growing population of the country within the old States, where the poor man will be compelled to become the tenant of some wealthy landlord, and place his children in a manufactory, for such wages as their master may choose to give them, instead of seeking a home on the fertile lands of the West, where he and his family could be comfortable and happy. I go, sir, for no such system; but shall vote for this bill with great pleasure.

Mr. CLAY of Ky. said, that in corroboration of the testimony which the Senator from South Carolina was about to adduce to the Senate, he begged leave to read some extracts from an official document which had just been received.

[Here Mr. C. read extracts from the field notes of Mr. Lucas and Mr. Biggs, who were employed in the survey of the Black Hawk purchase, stating that the land was generally settled by armed intruders, and complaining that their progress was interrupted by the opposition and threats of this description of persons]

He supposed, Mr. CLAY said, that all this was false—nothing true in it. I dare say (he continued) there are members in this, and the other House, ready to pronounce that a more honest, deserving set of men, than these "club law men" does not exist: men who openly violate the laws—men whose moral sense would be violated by an enforcement of the existing laws, as they had been told by a Senator on that floor. Whose moral sense? Why the moral sense of these club law men, who band themselves together, and overawe and set at defiance the officers of the Government. What pretence had these lawless men for roving about the country and seizing by violence on the choicest spots of land?

He read a statement, by which it appeared that there were in the State of Illinois millions of acres of as fine farming lands as the sun ever shone upon, that could be entered by any man who was willing to pay his dollar and a quarter per acre for it. And all the new States contained an abundance of the best land which could be obtained by the settlers on the same easy terms. The honorable Senator from Michigan (Mr. LYON) had made the notable discovery that it was the settlement of land which constituted its value. No, sir, said Mr. C. it is the fertility of the soil, the natural advantages of the tract, and its capacity to yield a profitable return for the capital and labor expended on it, which gave value to the land; and there were millions upon millions of acres of such land that would readily find purchasers were it not for the practices introduced by this pre-emption system. He had had occasion to say that prior to 1830 there was no general pre-emption law. The laws of that description, passed before that time, were all founded on particular circumstances, limited as to the territory and limited as to their duration. The first pre-emption law originated in 1830, and was one of the fatal series of experiments which grew up under the late Administration, and been followed by the present, and the effects of which he feared would be felt for years. But this system expired two years ago, and owing to the abuses and corruptions which sprung from it, it came into general disrepute. Why, said Mr. C. do you not recollect the scenes enacted at the Chicago sales? The moment the sale commenced, there were persons present ready to oppose the sale of every tract offered crying out "settler's claim, settler's claim," and the sale was interrupted in the most disgraceful and outrageous manner.

In consequence of the abuses that had been practised under this system, it became so odious that it could not have found a vote in either House to support it. No one ever thought of reviving it until the last session, and all the unauthorized settlements that have been since made on the public lands, have been made in violation, not only of the known laws, but in violation of the well ascertained sense of Congress. He had shown that there were one hundred and fourteen millions of acres of land already surveyed, and in the market—that there was no want of elbow room—no want of good land for the settler to choose from, on paying for it; and there was therefore no reason why the settlers should move off, and seize upon lands not yet surveyed. The Senator from South Carolina had correctly said, and he himself was aware, how vain it was to resist these practices. There were nine States with their eighteen votes ready to go for this system. It was an Administration measure also, supported by the friends of the Administration, with one solitary exception, and that was an able and high minded representative of one of the old States, who was worthy of his distinguished sire and his grandsire. There was a combination therefore of the friends of the Administration, and the members from the New States, the President himself taking the lead; and he found further, with the greatest pain and regret, that this system found support from another quarter; from a gentleman (Mr. WEBSTER) who had been his powerful and efficient ally in opposing the experiments of this and the last Administration, and who was so deservedly celebrated as the able expounder of the Constitution, and the firm unwavering supporter of the laws.

That gentleman stated as one of the strongest reasons why he should vote for this bill, that a state of things with regard to these settlers existed, which could not be met—that encouraged by former pre-emption laws, they had gone and settled upon these lands, and could not now be removed. Sir, said Mr. C. I will meet them with the laws of the country. Let the lands be exposed to public sale, and afterwards at private sale, and then put in force, if necessary, the existing laws, and remove these lawless intruders from the property they have forcibly appropriated to their own use. What right had they to the public domain more than any other descreption of plunderers to the goods they may seize upon? An auctioner has his warehouse broken open by a lawless body of armed men: one man seizes upon a bale, another upon a hamper, and another upon something else, and says he has a right to take it at his own price. When other purchasers come to auction, and say Mr. Auctioneer, why not give me these goods on as cheap terms as these gentlemen who have broken open your warehouse obtained theirs. Why, what sort of answer would it be to say that these gentlemen are pre-emptioners, their moral sense has been outraged by locking up these goods, and keeping them from their use, and as they particularly wished for this bale or hamper at their own price, and are honest, industrious men, who are unable to give the real value for the goods, they have taken this natural and harmless method of getting possession of them. In a country like this, where there are one hundred and fourteen millions of good land open to sale at the lowest price, you find (said Mr. C.) these men, in opposition to the laws, and in opposition to the known sense of the Legislature, going further to the West, seizing from latitude to latitude upon the choicest spots of the public lands, and their moral sense is so wounded by the nation wishing to retain the lands in their own hands, that they must have them at their own price. And this was one of the experiments of this Administration, far worse than the experiments upon the Treasury. The Administration, not satisfied with tampering with the currency, becomes a squatter, and settles down upon the lands of Wisconsin, becoming mortagers of the public domain to unknown foreigners and unknown pre-emptioners. Mr. C. here went into an examination of the land system as considered disconnected from pre-emptions, which he eulogised very highly, and contended that a better system could hardly be devised. Ohio, Indiana, and several other of the new States, he said, were beginning to see that their exterior interest in the public domain, owing to the diminution of the quantity of public land in them by sales and pre-emptions, was becoming greater than their interior interest, and he prophesied that the time would shortly come when pre-emptions would be as unpopular in Ohio, Illinois, or Indiana, as they now were in Virginia or Kentucky. Mr. C. then commented on the manner in which this bill had been carried through. What, he asked, had they seen? A proposition was made by an honorable Senator from Maryland (Mr. MERRICK) to limit the pre-emptions to citizens of the United States, native and naturalized: rejected. And could any body say, after that naked vote of the Senate, that it has not become the permanent policy of the country to go on inviting all the hordes of Europe to come over and partake of this bounty, derived from our ancesters, and which we should preserve for our posterity.

Again: in the Miami purchase, in the heart of a dense population, before the signature to the treaty was dry, we find a crowd of grasping speculators rushing in to seize upon land acknowledged on that floor to be worth from forty to fifty dollars per acre; and yet when an amendment was offered to exclude these lands from the bill, it was voted down. Then there was the last amendment, offered by the Senator from Vermont, (Mr. PRENTISS,) to make the pre-emptioners pay one-half the ascertained value of their land above the minimum price. What became of that proposition? It was voted down, like the others. It is true one apparent security was obtained on the adoption of the amendment offered by his colleague, restricting the pre-emptions to actual habitation and cultivation; but after this, a proposition was made late in the evening, on the motion of the Senator from Illinois, when there was not a full Senate present, and against his remonstrance it was adopted, rendering his colleague's amendment almost useless. Mr. C. said he knew how vain any struggle of his was against the passage of this bill, two-thirds of the Senate voting for it. But he rested his hopes, where the hopes of the American people were on this occasion—on the other branch of the National Legislature. This Senate, on which the late Executive had placed his feet before he retired from office—this Senate, which had not even left the poor privilege of preserving its own records from mutilation, was not the body to which he could look for the preservation of the rights and liberties of the people; but there was another body in the other wing of the building—the body peculiarly belonging to the people—and on whom their eyes were anxiously turned at this important crisis; and he confidently trusted that they would not be turned in vain.

Mr. CLAY of Alabama observed that the last remark of the Senator from Kentucky constrained him again to express his admiration of that gentleman's wonderful versatility. Three or four years ago, would that gentleman have said that the hopes of the American people were concentrated on the other branch of the National Legislature? No. Then, in his opinion, they were under the control of Executive influence, and the Senate was the palladium of the liberties of the people. But now he would sing hosannas in praise of the popular branch, while he has the courtesy to denounce the Senate, because, from political changes in that body, he cannet indulge the hopes (though very distant in realization, Mr. C. trusted) from it that he rested on the other. Mr. C. called the attention of the Senate to the course of argument the gentleman had thought proper to adopt in reference to those persons who were the objects of this bill. The gentleman referred to a document, which he (Mr. C.) had not seen, and therefore knew nothing of, from which he picked out some isolated cases of alleged resistance to the public officers, among the vast number of those who had settled on the public domain; and, on the authority of this document, he would withhold from all the others the trifling boon which justice, humanity, and, above all, the public good, imperatively demanded. Was this the Senator's idea of justice, of equality, and of a sound national policy? If a single individual, or even a dozen of them, in Ioway or Wisconsin, should manifest any hostility to the officers of the Government, he asked if this was a good and sufficient reason for withholding the benefits of this bill from thousands of industrious and meritorious claimants in all the other States and Territories? But the Senator had another objection to this measure: it was one of the unfortunate "experiments" of the late Administration. Now he apprehended that this was the true source of all the gentleman's objections, for he was not aware that he had given his support to any one measure of that distinguished patriot and statesman, who had lately filled the Executive chair with so much honor to himself, and glory to his country. But with regard to what the Senator had said, in reference to the settlers in Wisconsin, he would say a word or two, and in his turn refer to documentary evidence.

The honorable delegate from that Territory had informed him, on the authority of a gentleman of respectability—who, perhaps, now heard what he was saying—that a majority of this population had gone there under the sanction and authority of an agent of the Government. There was a law on the statute book providing for a lease of the lead mines belonging to the United States; and, in pursuance of the provisions of this law, the agent of the Government had, by an advertisement in the public newspapers, invited persons to bid for them; and it was in this manner that the mass of the settlers in that country had gone over. In the very law to which the gentleman referred—the law to prohibit intrusion on the public lands, as he calls it, and which was made as well to protect the Government against claimants settling under spurious grants, and thereby gaining advantage by possession, as to keep intruders off the Indian lands—this provision would be found: "That in all cases where the tract of land applied for includes either a lead mine or salt spring, no permission to work the same shall be granted without the approbation of the President of the United States, who is hereby authorized to cause such mines or springs to be leased for a term not exceeding three years, and on such conditions as he shall think proper."

Now, under this act, he was informed that a vast majority of these people who had settled in Ioway, had gone there under an invitation of an agent of the United States, and therefore could not be the lawless intruders the Senator from Kentucky described them to be. If there were no other persons in that country than those referred to in the document quoted by the Senator from Kentucky, his denunciation might be proper; but would it be just to deprive all settlers of their homes and their improvements, because some may have acted even as unworthily as had been represented? Was it compatible with any principle of justice to deny them what other portions of the people of the United States had received, because some amongst them had not shown as much mildness and docility as the Senator from Kentucky required? One Senator—the Senator from Delaware, (Mr. BAYARD) objected to this measure because he apprehended that it would drain the old States of their population, and prevent them from filling up and maintaining their ascendancy in the Union.

In the name of Heaven (said Mr. C.) how much greater population than she now has, could little Delaware sustain? Did the honorable gentleman suppose, that by preventing the passage of pre-emption laws, he could keep back emigration from the new States? No: as well might he attempt to stop the waves of the ocean, or turn the current of the Mississippi, and bid it roll back to its source, as to say to the industrious poor of the old States, that though fertile fields, and the rich rewards of industry, invite you to the West, you must stay at home and drag out your lives in hopeless dependence, in order that the old States may not be excelled in wealth and population by the rising States of the West. No: neither the Senator from Delaware, nor the Senator from Kentucky, whose unnatural opposition to emigration, had been so perseveringly displayed on that floor, neither of them, could stay this vast, this unceasing current, which had been flowing into the great valley of the Mississippi for more than forty years. He might brand them all as renegades, denounce them as squatters and outlaws, and still the tide of emigration would roll on. But he would tell the Senator of what description of men the settlers whom he denounces, in such unmeasured terms, were composed. They were such men as nobly and victoriously sustained their country's honor at the battles of the river Raisin and the Thames; men who fought and conquered our savage enemy at Emuckfaw, Enotochopee, and Tehopeka, in the late war; and though last, not least, the men who, on the ever memorable eighth of January, 1815, under the immortal Jackson, finished that war with Great Britain "in a blaze of imperishable glory." Yes, sir, said Mr. C. the population of the new States and Territories is constituted of such men as will be ever ready to defend their country against every enemy, and every invader. But, said Mr. C. neither do these people receive any extraordinary favor by the passage of this bill, nor will the Government lose by it. You have, said he, fully tried the auction system, and have not received more by it than under the system of experiments which the Senator from Kentucky deems so unfortunate. He had, on a former occasion, sufficiently demonstrated, from documents on the files of the Senate, that the Government received no more, in proportion, from the sales of its lands in other years, than in the periods when the pre-emption laws were in operation. The question, at last, resolved itself into this: Will you, asked Mr. C. sell to these men, whose enterprise and perseverance has given settlement and cultivation to your remotest wilds, their homes and improvements on the same terms, and no better, that you give them to the speculators; or will you allow the speculators to drive them off, and reap the fruits of their industry? This was the true question presented to the Senate, and he hoped it would be maturely weighed before coming to a decision.

Gentlemen should recollect, said Mr. C. when they are warring against the poor settler of the West, they are, at the same time, warring against the poor cultivator of the soil in the old States. It is to the great West, to the great valley of the Mississippi, that the poor laboring man, who has no land he can call his own, who is the lessee, or hireling, of some rich proprietor, or wealthy landlord, looks with hope for the improvement of his condition. Impose hard conditions on the occupants of the West, and raise the price of land there, and you operate to the prejudice of the humble cultivator in the States east of the Alleghany. For his own part, Mr. C. said, he was not only in favor of giving the present settlers of the public land the right of pre-emption, but he would be willing to extend the favor of the Government so far as to give to every industrious poor farmer of the old States, who was not a freeholder, the opportunity of becoming so, by extending to him the privilege of taking a limited quantity (a quarter section) of the public land at Government price, on the condition of his settling on it, improving it, and occupying it a sufficient length of time to give earnest of his citizenship.

He knew of no better mode of disposing of the public domain. He would extend this privilege to the citizens of Delaware, Massachusetts, Connecticut; yes, sir, to the citizens of all, all the old States. He would make every tiller of the soil a freeholder, and thereby render him more independent and useful to his family, and as a citizen. Mr. C. said he was willing to abolish the auction system altogether, for he had seen enough of the evils of its frauds and combinations. He had shown the way to avoid all those evils and to establish a better system of equality, which seemed to be such a desideratum with the Senator from Kentucky.

They were about to take the question on the final passage of the bill, and he trusted that they would again exhibit the same triumphant majority that they did on the question of engrossment. Let it be sent to the other House, where he looked with as much confidence as the Senator from Kentucky did, and however they might receive it, or whatever might be its fate, the friends of the bill would at least have the satisfaction of knowing that they had done their duty.

Mr. HUBBARD said that it was perfectly true, as the Senator from Kentucky had stated, that previous to 1830 no general pre-emption law had been passed by Congress. It is no less true, that during the existence of our Government particular acts granting pre-emption rights to portions of the public domain have repeatedly been passed by Congress.

The Senator from Kentucky had denounced this measure as an Administration "experiment," and said that the friends of this Administration, with an honorable exception, (alluding, he presumed, to his friend, Mr. ROANE, from Virginia,) were the advocates, the supporters, and the defenders of this policy and of this particular measure. The Senator has, in unmeasured terms, denounced what he has been pleased to call the experiments of the last and the present administration of the Government. He has given his opinion of the effects produced upon the industry of the country; and it was far from his (Mr. H's) purpose, at this hour and on this occasion, to go into an examination of the policy of the last and of the present Administrations, or to contrast that policy with the policy of the Administration which preceded them. He had risen for the purpose of showing to the Senate the rise, progress, and effect, of the pre-emption act of 1830, and of satisfying the honorable Senator himself that this pre-emption system was not, as had been alleged, a party measure; that it was not an "experiment" of the last Administration in the sense the gentleman from Kentucky attaches to the term "experiment." He was free to admit that the bill was brought forward and was passed under the administration of General Jackson; but while that bill was pending in the House the debate never assumed a party character, and the ultimate vote upon its passage will show that it was sustained and opposed uninfluenced by political feeling. He, with his friend from Alabama, (Mr. CLAY,) were then members of the House of Representatives, and he never should forget the impressions made on his mind by the debates on that occasion upon that pre-emption bill. That measure could not but be regarded as a direct innovation upon the land system, as it had long existed. It was introducing an entire new principle touching the disposition of the public domain. It was declaring to the American people that the public lands might not only be settled, but might be actually sold to the occupant, without the agency of public auctions. He then regarded the measure, as he had ever since regarded it, as an important change in the practice of the Government in relation to the mode of possession, and in the mode of acquiring a title to the public lands. He then looked upon the measure as a measure of public policy, and if experience should approve it, he supposed that it would become the settled policy of the Government. Such he believed was the prevailing sentiment at that time in the House of Representatives. The measure was most powerfully and efficiently supported by the present Speaker of the House of Representatives in Kentucky; it found, also, a warm friend in the present Governor of Ohio, neither of whom could be called the friends of the then Administration. The measure was also supported by the present Speaker of the Senate of Kentucky—by the present Governor of Massachusetts—by the then representative from the city of Boston—by the head of the American system; and how far they were the supporters of the administration of General Jackson he would leave for the Senator to decide. The measure was opposed by the late Governor of South Carolina, an efficient friend of the Administration. The history of that measure will most conclusively show that it was no party measure. He at that time, and on that occasion, was convinced by the arguments of the friends of the bill that it ought to pass He gave to it his feeble support. He had never seen cause to regret it. He believed, in his conscience, that it was a measure founded in justice and in right—that this occupation and settlement, this mode of purchase, accomplished the great purpose which was intended to be accomplished by the Government in the sale of the public domain It increases the moral and physical power of the country. Whether the Government immediately derived the greatest possible amount for the public lands, by this mode of sale, was to him a matter of minor importance—a secondary consideration. That these purchases and settlements, that these possessions and improvements, greatly added to the nation's wealth, and increased the resources of the Republic, no one can doubt. He had voted for the act of 1830, to grant pre-emption rights to settlers on the public lands; and the bill now before the Senate seeks but to revive that act, to grant pre-emption rights to persons who had settled on the public lands on or before the first day of December, 1837. On what ground is the bill opposed? First, on the ground that the entries and occupations are in violation of public law; that individuals, without right, without authority, against the moral sense of the community, have intruded upon the public lands. He was perfectly aware that, according to the strict letter of existing law, these occupants of the public domain were in the possession of land rightfully belonging to the United States; that at the time of making the entry, of taking the possession, of commencing their improvements, these settlers had not the sanction of law. This he freely admitted; but he could not admit that these citizens were, from that fact, obnoxious to the charge of wilful intruders upon the public domain.

He had, with some care, examined the several acts of Congress in relation to this subject; and, as he had before remarked, he regarded the passage of the pre-emption act of 1830 as the introduction of a new principle, the commencement of a new policy, with reference to the settlement and sale of the public lands. That act was much debated, was fully considered, and, uninfluenced by any party considerations, it passed the House of Representatives by a vote of 100 to 58. That act was a virtual repeal, as far as it went, of the act of Congress passed March 3, 1807, "to prevent settlements being made on lands ceded to the United States, until authorized by law." The letter, the spirit, and the object, of the act of 1807, was to prevent intrusions upon the public domain, and, when made, to provide for their prompt and efficient removal. Under the act of 1807, all occupations of the public land, unauthorized by law, were expressly prohibited.

The act of 1807 was in full force on the 29th of May, 1830, when the first general pre-emption law was passed by Congress. But had its particular provisions been enforced? Had the strong arm of military power been employed to eject intruders, to remove actual settlers from the public lands? Not so: the act of 1807 could not have been executed without difficulty, and without danger. If it could have been, why was it permitted to sleep? The settlements upon the public lands had increased under the Administration of the Government which preceded that of General Jackson, and yet there was no resort to arms; there was no calling forth the militia to drive off these settlers who had thus taken possession of portions of the public domain, in violation of the law of 1807. The language was not then to these occupants, "You are lawless intruders, trespassers, and wrong doers." So far from this, the Administration looked on, and made no movements to check the progress of these proceedings. Settlers were rapidly multiplying, and yet no attempt was made to put in force the act of 1807. The course pursued by those charged with the execution of the law was that of encouragement and protection to the pioneers of the West; to those who had left their ancient homes, their early associations, their friends and neighbors, to seek new homes, and establish new relations, in the western wilds; and in this way, many industrious and worthy citizens, from various sections of the Union, had entered upon portions of the public lands, and made great improvements under the eye of the Government, without objection. Under these circumstances, and within the first session of Congress under the late Administration, was the act of the 29th of May, 1830, passed, "granting pre-emption rights to actual settlers upon the public lands." So far from resorting to the provisions of the act of 1807, to eject from thr public lands the persons actually in the occupation, Congress passed the act of 1830, quieting these settlers in their possessions and improvements, and granting to them in terms the exclusive privilege of obtaining the title of the Government to the land by them occupied, and sufficient in quantity to make for them suitable farms.

Such were substantially the provisions of the act of 1830, and it seemed to him that they were in direct conflict with the provisions of the act of 1807; and as far as the act of Congress of 1830 went, it could not but be regarded as a virtual repeal of the act of 1807. It distinctly, and, to his mind, emphatically, declared that those who should take possession of portions of the public lands for actual settlement, for the praiseworthy object of cultivation and of improvement, so far from being driven off hereafter by military force, they should be quieted and protected in their possessions. The act of 1830 breathes the spirit of peace and security to the actual settler. It spoke the language of encouragement, and gave confidence and protection to this class of our community. The act of 1807 was a declaration of war against those who should presume to enter upon and settle any portion of the public lands, without the express authority of law. It is utterly impossible to reconcile these two acts of Congress. The one is replete with discouragement and menace: the other is full of hope, encouragement and security to the bona fide settler. He therefore, in voting for the bill of 1830, came to the conclusion that the stern and rigid enactments contained in the law of 1807 could not peaceably be carried into effect. A new policy, on essentially different principles, was embodied in the bill of 1830. The passage of that bill established what he then considered was to be the future policy and practice of the Government. And was he not right in coming to this conclusion? Had any member of the Senate ever known that a resort had been had to the authority of the act of 1807 at any time since the passage of the act of 1830, to expel occupants and settlers from the public lands? The history of the legislation of Congress since that period fully confirmed him in the views he had expressed. The Senator from Massachusetts had remarked that he should vote for this bill under existing circumstances; that such were the number and character of the settlers, such were the extent of their improvements, that he should vote for the bill now before the Senate. At the same time the Senator says that he would gladly support any measure which would check these intrusions, and prevent such pre-emption laws hereafter. He was glad to have the vote of the Senator from Massachusetts for this particular bill; but does not the Senator perceive that the passage of every pre-emption bill goes to confirm the policy, and sanction the practice, of the Government, and, in all probability, to render such pre-emption acts necessary from time to time, so long as this Government should continue to be a landholder? He would find no difficulty in voting for this bill, were it now for the first time presented to his consideration. He voted for it on principle, and in accordance with what he regarded as now the policy of the Government; and with his own convictions in relation to this whole subject, he would merely say that on all future and fit occasions, he shall be ready and willing to give his vote for any and for every pre-emption bill, for the protection and security of those citizens who had actually settled and improved portions of the public domain, to make for themselves homes, and homes for their families.

He would go as far as any man to carry out this policy of the Government. He had not only voted for the bill of 1830, but he had voted also for the bill of 1834, containing similar provisions; and so long as he was honored with a seat in Congress, he should not withhold his vote from any bill granting pre-emption rights to honest settlers upon the public lands. The best evidence that he could offer to the Senate of a determined innovation upon the policy and practice of the Government which existed in its early history, in relation to the occupation and disposition of the public lands, was not only the act of 1830, but the repeated acts of Congress since 1830, carrying out the pre-emption principle. In July, 1832, a bill was passed extending for another year all the benefits granted by the pre-emption act of May, 1830, and extending the principle of entry and occupation to fractional sections of the public domain; and the law of April, 1832, provided expressly, "that all actual settlers, being house-keepers, upon the public lands, shall have the right of pre-emption to enter, within six months after the passage of this act, not exceeding the quantity of one half quarter section, to include his or their improvements;" and the act of March, 1833, extended for another year the pre-emption system to all persons who were prevented from making their entries, in consequence of the public surveys not having been made and returned, or where the land was not attached to any land district; and the act of June, 1834, was a full recognition of the pre-emption principle; and during this period there is not to be found a single legislative enactment prohibiting the occupation of the public lands, except such occupation should be made in pursuance of some public sale. So far from such being the fact—so far from any efforts having been made to put in force the act of 1807—the reiterated legislation of Congress had invited, encouraged and protected, the very mode of occupation and improvement which the bill now before the Senate seeks to ratify and confirm. He could not, then, agree with the honorable Senator from Kentucky, that this class of occupants of the public lands merited the character of lawless intruders, trespassers, and wrong-doers. His own opinion was, that these entries, occupations and improvements, were in accordance with the general policy of the Government, as manifested by the act of the 29th of May, 1830. Upon what principle could Congress now refuse to grant pre-emption rights to actual "bona fide" settlers upon the public lands? Was there any reservation made in the act of 1830? Was there any provision contained in the act of 1834 that the pre-emption policy should extend no further? Nothing of the kind. Upon what principle, then, he would repeat, can Congress now refuse to grant to an equally meritorious class of citizens the same rights, immunities, and privileges, which have been repeatedly granted to others under like circumstances? He was wholly unable to understand any good reason which should have induced Congress, in 1830 and 1834, to grant pre-emption rights, and to withhold the same rights in 1837. The act of 1830, general in its provisions, declared most unequivocally the policy of the Government. It was not to provide at the time for a particular class of the community, and to stop there; for the acts of 1832 and 1834, in terms, contain the same general provisions. Had not this, then, been intended as part of the policy of the Government, most assuredly there would have been inserted in one or the other of the bills an express provison, limiting their operation to particular classes of the community, and to particular sections of country. The people, then, relying on the implied faith of the Government that the same policy would be extended to them, under similar circumstances, which was extended to the settlers upon the public lands in 1830 and in 1834, have gone on to occupy and to cultivate portions of the public domain; and unless some reasons now exist which did not before exist, the same measure of justice should be meted out to them as has been meted out to others.

But it is said that they are not bona fide settlers; that the occupation and improvement of the public lands, which the bill is intended to protect, have been made by speculators and the hired agents of speculators. He would not say that this might not be true to some extent; but, as far as he had learned the character of those who had left their ancient homes for new homes in the West, they were the actual cultivators of the soil—the honest and hardy yeomanry of the country—men ready to defend the Republic in the day of danger, and prepared to maintain themselves and families by honest industry. This he believed to be the true character of nineteen-twentieths of those who had left the granite hills of New England for the rich prairies of the West. Such was the known character of these citizens for industry and sobriety, that he believed no one had attempted to wrest from them their possessions and improvements by purchase at public sale or by private entry; and he entertained no doubt that if the President proclaimed the lands now occupied by these settlers for sale, the moral sense of the community, a common feeling, a general sentiment, would effectually prevent any purchases which would lead to their disturbance. And whence arises this feeling, this common sentiment? From the fact that the acts of 1830 and 1834 encouraged this mode of settlement, and that every man's possession and improvement is his own, and merit the protection of the Government.

The Senator from South Carolina has asked, how is this system to terminate? He has said that, for aught he sees, it must result in the surrender of the public domain; that these pre-emption laws will become the means of great speculation, and that the tendency is to introduce violence and force to maintain the possession of the public lands thus acquired. He (Mr. H.) was free to admit, and he would state to the Senator from South Carolina, that this system would continue so long as the United States continued to be a landholder. But he denied that the Government would, under the operation of this system, necessarily surrender this public domain without an adequate price. The Government had fixed the value of its public lands; that value would be obtained; beyond that value the Government could not expect to realize; and he should be slow to believe that this system would become the means of speculation, or would tend to introduce violence or force. The legitimate tendency and effect of the pre-emption system is to afford protection and security to the honest settlers upon the public lands—men who would not, if they could, oppose the laws of the land—men who need no support from an armed force, and no protection from violent measures. They rely with entire confidence for protection and support on the force of common feeling and public sentiment.

The leading object of the Government has been, from the early settlement of the country, not to derive revenue from the public lands, but, by their instrumentality, to increase the moral and physical power of the country; to swell the tide of population; to add to the public resources, and to augment the wealth of the whole nation. This has been the policy of the Government in the disposition of the public domain; and, in his judgment, the pre-emption system directly tends to increase the population of the whole country, and to carry out this policy.

If lands are only to be occupied which shall be sold at auction, the progress of settlement must be slow. If the Government seeks to derive a revenue from the sale of the public lands, no more lands would ever be proclaimed for sale than the pecuniary wants of the Government required. He rejoiced that an entirely different policy had distinguished the course of the Government from its commencement. Believing then, as he conscientiously did, that the moral and physical power, the wealth and population, of the country would be increased by continuing the pre-emption system, he should vote for the bill now before the Senate, as he had voted for similar bills in 1830 and 1834. Believing that the habits and character of this portion of the community demanded this measure, he would not withhold his support. Believing that by this mode of sale the Government would derive as much revenue from the public lands as from public auctions, he must give to the bill his aid; and whenever another occasion should occur, he trusted that he should be behind no man in extending to his fellow-citizens, under like circumstances, the same measure of justice.

Mr. WHITE rose to address the Senate, but gave way on a motion of Mr. BENTON to adjourn.

TUESDAY, JAN. 30, 1838.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the bill to grant pre-emption rights to the settlers on the public lands. It having been read the third time, and the question being on its passage—

Mr. WHITE addressed the Senate at some length in support of the bill; and

Mr. WALKER observed, that the Senator from Kentucky (Mr. CLAY) has denounced the pre-emption system, as one of the experiments of the late Administration upon the welfare of the country, and he says it is caused by a coalition between the new States and the friends of the Administration. It is true that the first general pre emption law, adopted for many years, was in 1830, although laws of a similar character, and much more liberal and extensive than this in their provisions, and embracing the various districts for which their enactment was intended, have been passed, as I have heretofore shown, from the foundation of the Government. But is the charge here, that the act of 1830, was an Administration experiment, that it was carried by the coalition, described by the Senator from Kentucky? On looking at the Senate journals, (which Mr. WALKER here read,) I find that the pre-emption bill passed the Senate, by the vote of 29 to 12, and that many of the Senators hostile to the Administration, including the Senators from Vermont and Massachusetts, voted for the measure. Did Vermont and Massachusetts enter into this coalition with the Administration to experiment upon the welfare of the people? The facts demonstrated that both the charges of the Senator from Kentucky were utterly groundless. The Senator from Kentucky says, this measure is carried through this Senate by Executive influence, and that the President has the Senate under his feet. This is strong language to be used by any Senator towards the body of which he is a member. The Senate beneath the feet of the President of the United States! Does the Senator mean that the entire Senate, including himself, is beneath the feet of the President, or does he mean to apply the remerks to the friends of Mr. Van Buren? If so, as one of that number, I repel the charge as equally groundless as the fancied coalition and experiment by which the pre-emption act of 1830 is represented as having been carried. But, sir, the pre-emption of the 19th of June, 1834, an act more extensive than this, embracing all the same provisions, with the addition of the floating pre-emptions: when was that act carried? It was carried in in 1834, the celebrated session at which the impeachment resolutions were voted against Gen. Jackson, and when, if I were disposed to retaliate, I might say that the Bank of the United States had the Senate beneath its feet. And how was the measure then carried? It was reported by the Committee of Public Lands of the Senate, which committee was composed of POINDEXTER, CLAY of Kentucky, MOORE, PRENTISS, and MCKEAN; all but the last opponents of the Administration. On looking at the Senate journals of 1834, [to which Mr. WALKER here referred,] I find the bill was engrossed on one day without opposition, and finally passed a few days afterwards without opposition, the Senator from Kentucky, (Mr. CLAY,) as the journals show, being present on both occasions. Where then slumbered the fiery opposition of the Senator from Kentucky to this measure, now denounced by him as so odious and detestable? Why did he then permit this fatal experiment, as he now calls it, to be made by his friends, reported by a committee of which he was a member, and passed by a Senate in which they held the majority, and with his silent acquiescence? Were the settlers more meritorious then than they are now; or is it only of late that the Senator from Kentucky has become willing to endorse the libels of the British reviewers in regard to the American settlers of the West? Why, if these settlers are, as the Senator from Kentucky proclaims, lawless intruders,—plunderers of the public property,—as criminal as those that would seize the public ships, or stores, or arsenals, why was not all this announced in 1834, when the act was passed without opposition in the Senate, to legalize and sanction all these proceedings? And if it be indeed just, as the Senator from Kentucky proclaims, that these settlers should be driven by force from the public lands, I hope that the Senator from Kentucky will be permitted to lead the army which is to perform the work of expulsion and desolation; that he will lead the forces which are to drive from their homes and consume the dwellings of these hardy pioneers, whose only crime is this: that they desire to secure, at the Government price, the farms they have selected, and cleared, and cultivated, against the overbidding of capitalists and speculators. And when the Senator from Kentucky unfurls his banner, and calls for recruits for such a purpose, can he obtain one, even in the State of Kentucky, for a service so odious and detestable?

Mr. CLAY of Kentucky said: Let the gentleman read the ayes and noes on this journal, and then say whether the majorities were composed of friends of the Administration or not. The gentleman said that he was a member of the committee who reported this bill. True, he was; but he was not aware of it when the bill passed. He was engaged at his table, writing; the pre-emption bill came up, and a friend of it said, "Clay is very busy; say nothing about it, and it will pass without his opposition;" and in this way the bill got through. But in 1834, the evils of this law began to be seen; thousands of frauds and iniquities were discovered. There was the famous Chicago case—an old fort that was taken up by a pre-emption and was now divided into shares of $2,000 each, the whole tract being worth $2,000,000. There were, he repeated, numerous frauds, and he had denounced, and would continue to denounce them. He did vote for the bill reported by the then Senator from Ohio, (Mr. Ewing,) but on what grounds did he vote for it? Was it to change the principle of the sales? No: it was to put down combinations, and guard against violence as well as corruption. We have been told, said Mr. C. of the extent of the evil, of the number of squatters who have got on the public land, and the difficulty of removing them; and that therefore there was a necessity for passing this law, to give them the lands they have unjustly seized on. Do we, said Mr. C. live in a country of laws, or not? What was the case under the late Administration, whose footsteps this Administration professes to follow, when a gallant and noble people arrayed themselves against the Union? What was the language held then? Was it said that the evil was so great that it admitted of no remedy? No, sir; the supremacy of the laws of Congress must be preserved, let it cost what it would. Why the distinction now, in favor of these squatters? Suppose, in the case of the Black Hawk purchase, the President had issued his proclamation, or caused the register of the land office to give notice that no person should go on that purchase, and if they did, that they should be removed by force. If that had been done, they would not have had these ten thousand intruders on these lands. How was it with that White House, now so amply furnished—with that famous east room, and the little man who occupied so small a part of it? Suppose a pre-emptioner was to go there and say, Mr. President, this house is too large for you; I am an honest, industrious cultivator, one of the bone-and-sinew men, and claim a pre-emption to part of this house. Would he not have as much right to squat down there, as to squat down on the public lands? When and where were these encroachments to cease? Would this bill be the end of the system, or would they not be called on, year after year, until the best of the public domain passed from their possession?

Mr. WALKER replied, and concluded by saying: The Senator from Kentucky (Mr. CLAY) has told us that, if this system of squatting is encouraged, some trespasser may squat even in the White House, and claim a pre-emption for it. This is not the first time at this session that the Senator from Kentucky has referred to the White House. It seems to haunt his imagination until he has become fearful that some squatter will claim it by pre-emption. Sir, said Mr. WALKER, I never knew of but one squatter in the White House, who could be truly called an intruder there, and that was one who was placed there in 1825, with the aid of the Senator from Kentucky, against the will of the people.

Mr. CLAY of Kentucky said that he had been at the White House once or twice lately, to see what had become of the Democracy of the country, and he was sorry to say that he could find very few of them in it.

Mr. YOUNG explained the circumstances in relation to the Chicago or Beaubion pre-emption.

Mr. DAVIS made some remarks in opposition to the bill.

Mr. BENTON expressed his gratification at the noble manner in which the characters and the rights of the pre-emption settlers had been sustained and vindicated in the course of this debate. These meritorious citizens have been violently assailed, but they have also been nobly defended. Every odious and every infamous epithet has been lavished upon them; but these epithets had been repelled with the energy of truth and with the fidelity of honor, and had fallen harmless on the floor of the Senate. The number of the speakers, the justice of the cause, the truth of the case, and the weight of the argument, were all on the side of the settlers; and the vote which was just about to be taken would, so far as the Senate was concerned, confirm their rights and seal their vindication. Many Senators had stepped forward, some from the old States as well as from the new ones, to defend the pre-emption claimants; and he could say to these Senators, judging from his own experience, that none of them would ever have cause to repent of their generous interference. These meritorious cultivators of the soil would never so act, in peace or in war, as to make their defenders blush for defending them. He (Mr. B.) had been long on the side of this valuable description of citizens, long before he was a member of this body. He could count near thirty years that he had voted on their side. He began his legislative career in the year 1809, in the State of Tennessee, and then gave his vote in favor of those occupants on the French Broad and Holston, of whom the Senator from Tennessee (Mr. WHITE) has so justly and so feelingly spoken. He began voting on their side in that early period of his life, and in that first year of his legislative functions, and had continued voting so ever since, and never had seen cause to repent of what he had done. In his long and intimate acquaintance with these hardy pioneers—this vanguard of the western population—in his long acquaintance with them, not only in Tennessee, but all over the Great West, he had found them to be the best of citizens; he had found them to be brave, hospitable, patriotic, and industrious, living upon their own labor, and that labor the primeval occupation of man and the first command of God. He had found them raising respectable families of sons and of daughters, fulfilling all their duties to society, loving hard money, paying the Government its price for its lands, and paying, not in illusive and treacherous paper, but in the solid metals, which never fail. He had never repented his votes in favor of these citizens, and he could assure other Senators who had spoken in their favor, and all those who were waiting to vote in their favor, that they would never have cause to repent of these votes and speeches.

Mr. B. rejoiced at the debate which had taken place on this subject, and he looked forward with pleasure to another debate, on an analogous subject, which was soon to take place: he spoke of the Graduation bill, which had been so long before the country, and which was now upon the orders of the day, and soon to come up under the most favorable auspices for decision. It had long been before the Senate as a measure which concerned the new States alone; but it is now to come up as a measure necessary not only to them, but the Federal Government also; for the Federal Government now needs the proceeds of those lands to supply the empty Treasury, as much as the new States need them for taxation, cultivation, and compact settlements. There are upwards of one hundred millions of acres of these old surveyed lands offered in vain, for many years, at $1 25 per acre, but which would immediately sell at graduated prices adapted to their real value. That bill will soon come up, and is, in its nature, connected with the pre-emption bill, which formerly formed a part of its provisions, and, like the pre-emption bill, is essentially and directly a measure of justice to the great agricultural interest—that interest which does so much for the country and the Government, and which receives so little from the favor, or even the justice, of legislation. Every interest in this country has been fostered and favored: commerce and manufactures have their protection, and even banks have been petted to death; but agriculture, the most useful of all, and the foundation of all, has not received justice, much less favor. The Pre-emption bill, and the Graduation bill, are measures of justice to the farmers: one of them to sell the choice of the new lands to the cultivator of the lands, the other to sell the old surveyed and refuse lands for what they are worth. These are measures of justice; there is no gift, donation, or favor in all this. It is value for value; it is sale, and not charity; and the Government gets the best of the bargain: for it gets its price in the first instance, and after that, derives forever an annual income in the shape of duties or taxes on the products of the land.

Mr. B. did not draw invidious comparisons between the different branches of beneficial and productive industry. Each branch had its merit; but there were different degrees of this merit; and this difference had been acknowledged, and had been acted upon by the wisdom and the justice of all nations. Agriculture, which produces the means of subsistence to man and to beast, is always placed in the first degree; manufactures, which fashions and prepares these means for use, stands second; and commerce, which exchanges the superfluities of different nations, is third. Each has its merit, and should have its protection, and above all agriculture should be protected; for, without agriculture, the elements of food and raiment themselves must be deficient. Agriculture is then entitled, in the first degree, to the favor and protection of the legislative power, and the first demand which it has to make is for the possession of the soil on just and equitable terms. The wisdom and justice of all nations, ancient and modern, civilized and barbarian, republican and monarchical, have granted, as a free gift, a portion of the soil to the cultivator; and this gift has always been considered as a beneficial transfer of the soil from the barren dominion of the Government, which made no use of it, to the productive energies of an individual, who would immediately make it available for the production of crops, and the payment of taxes. The United States alone has departed from this policy; it sells all, and it gives none! The cultivators may well complain of this policy, but they are not seeking to change it. The agricultural interest is not asking for donations of land; they are merely asking for the privilege of first purchase, at Government price, in a small tract in the new lands, and for a reduction of price of the old lands to their real value. The farmers then only ask to be exempted from the competition of bank-facility speculators, with their bales of borrowed paper money, at the sales of the new lands, and for the privilege of purchasing the old land at their actual value. This is what the agricultural interest—the great landed interest—requires; and this is what the time has arrived for granting to them. The time has arrived for beginning to do them justice, and their claims now come forward with peculiar and impressive titles to regard. Always the true supporters of their country, they have been eminently so in the last eight months, when the general failure of the banks, and the inability of the merchants to pay the customs, have so greatly embarrassed the Government, and were so fully believed, at one time, would shut up the Treasury entirely, put an end to its payments, paralyze every branch of the public service, and dissolve the Administration. During this portentous period, the agricultural interest has been the sheet anchor of the Government, and of the country. It has paid three and a half millions of hard dollars into the Treasury, and it has raised one hundred millions of surplus productions, to be sent to all foreign countries to pay off the balances of commercial debt, to bring home the comforts and the luxuries of all climes, and to reinforce our tottering banks with an additional importation of twelve or fifteen millions of gold and silver. And all this vast export, over above the home consumption. The hundred millions of exports are the surplus—the mere superfluity of their exuberant production—the excess which remains on hand, over and above what is wanted at home, after supplying food, and raiment to a population of fifteen millions of souls, and subsistence for their innumerable flocks and herds. This is what agriculture has done since the banks stopped payment in May last, and this is what it is ready to do every year in all time to come; and all this without distress meetings, without distress memorials, and without distress deputations to Congress; without, in fact, asking any favor, but only the justice of a pre-emption law and a graduation law. This is what the farmers, the agriculturists, the great landed interest now asks; and the vote which we are about to give will quickly prove that the Senate is ready to grant one branch of the demand, and the forthcoming vote on the graduation bill may soon show that it is ready to grant the other.

Mr. McKEAN said that because he was a member of the committee that reported the bill of 1834, it might be inferred that he was in favor of it. He never had much feeling on the subject; but all the members of the committee would bear him witness that he was opposed to the bill, and he voted against it. He never was in favor of pre-emptions, and was not now.

Mr. PRENTISS said a few words in explanation, but in too low a tone of voice to be distinctly heard. He was understood, however, to say, that he consented to the necessity of the bill of 1834, because he understood that it would cover but a few cases, but that he was opposed to it.

Mr. CLAY of Alabama remarked, then, Mr. President, the result of all this is, that a minority of the committee reported the bill which passed on the 19th of June, 1830; and, according to the Senator from Kentucky, the bill must have been passed by a minority of the Senate, by the courtesy of the majority!

Mr. CLAY of Kentucky said that they were told at that time (in 1834) that the bill would only extend to a small number of settlers, who had not had the benefit of the former law; that it would embrace a few cases only.

Mr. CLAY of Alabama replied, that the bill of 1834 was just as broad as the present one. Like the present, it covered every occupant of the public domain, wherever settled. Like the present, it revived the pre-emption law of 1830, and without some of the restrictions this contained.

The question was then taken, and the bill was passed—yeas 30, nays 18, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Allen, Benton, Brown, Buchanan, Clay of Alabama, Cuthbert, Fulton, Grundy, Hubbard, King, Linn, Lumpkin, Lyon, Mouton, Nicholas, Niles, Norvell, Pierce, Rives, Robinson, Sevier, Smith of Connecticut, Tallmadge, Tipton, Walker, Webster, White, Williams, Wright and Young—30.

NAYS—Messrs. Bayard, Calhoun, Clay of Kentucky, Clayton, Crittenden, Davis, McKean, Merrick, Morris, Prentiss, Preston, Roane, Robbins, Smith of Indiana, Southard, Spence, Swift and Wall—18.

The Senate then adjourned.

REMARKS OF MR. PICKENS, OF SOUTH CAROLINA,

In the House of Representatives, February 20, 1838—On the bill introduced by the Committee on Foreign Relations to protect our frontiers, Canada, etc.

Mr. PICKENS said he had risen in consequence fo what had fallen from the gentleman from Pennsylvania, (Mr. BIDDLE,) and from the gentleman from Kentucky, (Mr. MENIFEE,) who had just taken his seat. He deprecated the tenor of their remarks. The first had said we ought to do "nothing more than our duty, and that duty required nothing of us in this case." The latter gentleman had said that this act was nothing but an act to sustain "royal power in Canada." And is this the language for us gravely to hold to those powers with whom we are at peace, and to whom we are bound in faith by the most solemn treaties? Mr. P. asked if our citizens along the Northern frontier had done nothing to violate duty? Where are the men levied, the arms transported, and the general preparation at points for the invasion of foreign soil? What is the evidence we have heard read to us within the last few days from letters transmitted from our officers, stating that some three or four hundred men, together with several hundred Indians, were now assembling in Michigan, near Detroit, for the avowed and open purpose of invading the Canada shore?

[Mr. MENIFEE here interposed, and asked why this preparation had not been put down, etc.]

Mr. P. said he was not charged with executive duties on that frontier, and, not being answerable for the execution of the laws, he could not give the reasons; that it was not his place to do so; that he did not know the local difficulties or causes, and that it did not belong to him (Mr. P.) to detail the reasons why these proceedings had not been arrested. Mr. P. said he was for giving as strong executive power to preserve our peace and to sustain our obligations to foreign powers, as was consistent with the laws of nations and our own Constitution. The gentleman from Pennsylvania (Mr. BIDDLE) had objected to the amendment of the gentleman from Virginia, (Mr. PATTON,) because it contained a proviso declaring that it was not intended to interfere with the rights of citizens, as neutrals, to carry on any commerce sanctioned by the laws of nations.

He (Mr. C.) could see no reasonable objection to this proviso. One objection raised to the original bill, was that it abandoned our rights in trade as a neutral power. This proviso was intended to exclude that conclusion, and was a simple declaration by the enacting power as to what was the spirit and intention of the act. This was not an adjournment of the question as to the rights of neutrals from this House to the Canada frontier, but was the reverse. Much had been said as to our right to carry on a commerce in contraband goods, etc. Mr. P. then went on to show that a trade in contraband articles, even of arms and munitions of war, was not cause of war under the law of nations; but that those engaged in the traffic of contraband articles were liable to seizure and confiscation of their goods. Those engaged in such commerce must run the risk and hazard incident to such trade. The right of the citizens of neutral powers to trade in contraband articles may be exercised without subjecting the nation to the responsibilities of war; but such articles are not protected by law; on the contrary, are subject to seizure and confiscation under foreign tribunals. This is the doctrine maintained by France in her intercourse with us in our Revolutionary struggle, and the doctrine maintained by us throughout the modern wars of Europe. The great difficulty has been in specifying what are strictly contraband articles. Mr. P. then went on to contend that the bill did not interfere with the rights of our citizens to a legitimate commerce under the laws of nations. If they were disposed, for the separate and bona fide purpose of mere trade and traffic, to engage in commerce of any kind, they could do so; but if contraband, then they must become subject to the risks and hazards of such trade under the law of nations.

The bill does not propose to interfere with that, but, by the proviso, expressly excludes such intention. If executive officers under it should mistake their powers, or should seize such articles, or prevent such legitimate trade as was not intended to be embraced by its provisions, then Mr. P. apprehended it would prove good grounds for a claim for damages against this Government, or for judgment for damages in a court having competent jurisdiction.

As to the argument that the clause giving the power of seizure in specified cases is against that clause in the Constitution which prevents unreasonable seizure, Mr. P. said that the gentleman from Virginia (Mr. PATTON) had already so ably said many things on that point, that he would not trouble the House by any additional remarks of his. He would only say that the Constitution forbade "unreasonable seizure;" and surely, if men assembled together in our own territory, with the avowed and admitted object proclaimed of aiding and abetting insurrection or rebellion in any territory under the government and jurisdiction of a power with whom we are at peace, and under the most solemn ties of treaty, they are not, under such circumstances, to claim that provision against unreasonable seizure. If our treaties and the law of good faith are binding, such a position would present a case for very reasonable seizure. By the avowed designs of men under such circumstances, they dispense with the necessity and reason for an affidavit, as in ordinary cases. Their open conduct is the affidavit. As to the argument who is to judge, this, Mr. P. contended, is an argument which, if pushed to extremities, is against all power any where. There must, of necessity, be some officer constituted to judge when the proper case arises; and if he exercises his authority against the spirit of the law, he himself is amenable.

Mr. P. said, if we cannot enforce our obligations under treaties for want of power in the Constitution, better for us to have no treaties, and proclaim the fact to the world. Are the peaceful citizens of this country to be dragged into war by a handful of desperate men, who desire to live by plunder and murder on our borders, under the idea, that if we do any thing, it will be nothing but an "act to sustain royal authority in Canada." Mr. P. said something was due in this matter to ourselves much more than to Great Britain; it was due to our peace, our honor, and our character. If we cannot restrain the lawlessness of our citizens under the fear of encroaching upon their liberty, we will be thrown out of the pale of nations, and the people of this Confederacy will be made what France was under the reign of Robespierre and Danton, a nation of public robbers and murderers, defying the laws of God and man, under the profligate pretext of extending universal democracy and liberty.

Mr. P. said he was opposed to the original bill reported by the chairman of Foreign Relations. He thought it very strong in some of its features. He was particularly opposed to the clause giving the President the power to order the army and navy to execute the law, etc. He quoted that clause in the law which authorizes the "calling forth the militia to execute the laws of the Union," and contended that the power over the militia being thus named for specified purposes, showed that it was intended that the President should rely upon public opinion to sustain him in the execution of laws to be enforced upon our own people; that the militia was in fact nothing but the organization of the community—the people themselves—under military regulations; that it was this organization of the people that the Constitution intended should aid the President, if necessary, "to execute the laws of the Union," in the clause providing for calling forth the militia. He considered the power over the army and navy was intended to protect us against foreign invasion and foreign powers; it was a power conferred to maintain our intercourse as a nation with other nations. But as to the execution of laws amongst our own citizens at home, the power over the militia—the organization of the community into a "posse"—was his legitimate authority; and he (Mr. P.) was at any rate inclined to restrict his power over the navy and army, as far as the execution of domestic laws amongst our own citizens was concerned. Mr. P. was in favor of the amendment offered by the gentleman from Virginia, (Mr. PATTON.)

NEUTRAL RELATIONS.

REMARKS OF MR. TAYLOR, OF NEW YORK.

In the House of Representatives, February 23, 1838—On the "Act to amend an act, entitled 'An act in addition to the act for the punishment of certain crimes against the United States, and to repeal the acts therein mentioned,' approved the 20th of April, 1818."

Mr. TAYLOR said it was seldom that so great a diversity of opinion existed upon any question presented for the consideration of this House, as had been exhibited upon the bill under consideration. He said the bill had been promptly acted upon in the Senate, and, as he understood, passed that body with great unanimity. But here scarcely any two members seemed to think precisely alike; and yet, in one respect, an unusual degree of unanimity prevailed. Many gentlemen have given their views upon the subject; and almost all seem to agree in the propriety or necessity of responding to the Message of the President, recommending further legislative provision, to preserve our neutral relations. And here (Mr. T. said) he wished to correct an error which the gentleman from Virginia (Mr. WISE) had fallen into, in regard to the Message. That gentleman represented the President as calling upon Congress for additional powers, to enable him to execute the existing laws. This, sir, is a mistake. The President has made no complaint that he cannot execute the existing laws; and notwithstanding intimations that have been thrown out, I believe it will be found that the President has been prompt and faithful in the discharge of his duties upon our northern frontier; that there has been no want of promptness and fidelity on his part. But he has told us that recent experience had shown the inadequacy of existing laws to enforce our obligations of neutrality, and has recommended further provisions for this object; and, sir, it appears to be admitted by all, with the exception of that gentleman, that some additional provisions are necessary, to carry fully into effect the objects of the act of 20th of April, 1818. But the difficulty seems to consist in providing the necessary and appropriate remedy, without infringing the constitutional rights of the citizens, or being too severe and rigid in exactions upon them. Upon this ground have been based most of the objections which have been urged against the Senate bill; and this, Mr. T said, had constituted the chief objection, in his mind, to that bill. He believed that what additional legislation was necessary to maintain the policy of this Government, and enforce our neutral obligations, should be embraced in as few, simple, and plain provisions as possible. The law of 1818 embraces almost all that seems to be necessary; and any powers conferred by that act, having existed many years, and uniformly acquiesced in, may be considered as affording a safe precedent for our present action.

Mr. T. said he had examined with some care the different propositions which have been made to amend the bill; and he was better satisfied with the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Virginia, (Mr. PATTON,) with the proviso suggested by the gentleman from Georgia, (Mr. HOLSEY,) which is added to the amendment, than with either the Senate bill, or any plan which has been suggested. The objection which has arisen from any apprehended danger to the rights of our citizens, to carry on a neutral trade with any foreign power, agreeable to treaty stipulations or national law, is obviated by the proviso; and no powers, he believed, were conferred, but such as were embraced in the act of 1818.

The extension consisted in the application of the power to a greater number of specified objects, so as to embrace all that any supposed emergency may seem to require. He said he could not see any strong necessity or good reason for the first section, believing that the recited acts of this section, which are declared a misdemeanor and punishable by fine and imprisonment, are embraced in the sixth section of the act of 1818 In this respect he fully concurred with the gentleman from Virginia, (Mr. MERCER.) The "providing or preparing the means for any military expedition," embraces all, and perhaps more, than is recited in this section. He was not, however, disposed to oppose the retaining of this section, because, if it made any thing more plain, it might be useful, and certainly could do no injury.

The amendment of the gentleman from Virginia (Mr. PATTON) has been strongly and earnestly opposed, for the same reason that has been urged against the Senate bill. It is said that it violates the constitutional right of the citizen to be "secure against unreasonable searches and seizures." This objection, he said, had appeared to him to have some force, and if he now supposed the amendment would violate the constitutional right of the citizen, it could not receive his vote, however urgent the circumstances which might seem to require its adoption. But the discussion and reflection had convinced him that it was not liable to this objection. It stands on the same principle which has ever governed in your revenue laws. And how is it proposed to get rid of the difficulty by those who urge the objection? Two modes of effecting this have been proposed; one by the amendment offered by his colleague, (Mr. LOOMIS,) and the other by the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Vermont. With regard to the first, he had only to say, that it appeared to him entirely inadequate to the emergency which is supposed to exist. Before you can take possession of and detain any "vehicle, arms, or munitions of war," which circumstances render probable or certain, are collected for the purpose of hostile invasion of the territory of a Government with whom we are at peace, you have first to obtain a warrant from one of the district judges. His colleague, he said, aware of the great difficulty of this proceeding on the great extent of our Northern frontier, and the utter insufficiency of this necessarily slow process, as a preventive remedy, had inserted a provision for the appointment of commissioners at convenient places, to discharge the duties of judges in this matter; but, finding constitutional objections in the way, he had modified his amendment, by striking out the provision, so that the objection to this plan, of its entire inadequacy, remains with all its force.

The amendment of the gentleman from Vermont is supposed by some preferable, because it declares the property which you wish to detain forfeit to the use of the Government, and then the objection of "unreasonable seizure" is supposed to be removed. But Mr. T. said he could not see the force or justice of this mode of reasoning. It is but adding an additional penalty to the law, the penalty of forfeiture, and this for the only purpose of enabling you to seize the property; and if by this process you can make that a "reasonable seizure," within the constitutional meaning of the term, which, without the additional penalty, would be unconstitutional, you may have found a very convenient mode of evading a constitutional objection, but which may be a very oppressive one to the people. Mr. T. said he was opposed to any such contrivance to evade a constitutional objection; and he believed the law was made sufficiently penal, without the additional penalty of forfeiture of property. He believed that, if it was an "unreasonable seizure" for a marshal or collector to take possession of property collected for the hostile invasion of the territory of a foreign power with whom we are at peace, and which you have declared a crime and misdemeanor, it would be no less an "unreasonable seizure" by adding the penalty of forfeiture of property. He said that it appeared to him that the authority given to seize the arms and munitions of war, as provided by this bill, is not that "unreasonable seizure" provided against by the Constitution; and he could see no difference in principle from that authorized by your revenue laws. It is nothing more than taking possession of property, not for the use of Government, but for the purpose of preventing the further commission of crime. The right, the ownership of the property, is still in the individual, to be restored to him, either by direction of the President, or by his giving security that it shall not be used for the criminal purpose prohibited; and this in a case where the peace of the nation may be involved. It is simply the "taking possession of and detaining," mentioned in the act of 1818, and for the same purpose; it gives no new powers but such as were conferred by that act, and for the same object; and if the term "seize" is objectionable, strike it out, and insert "take possession of" in its stead. Who, said Mr. T. is to judge what would constitute an "unreasonable seizure," in the constitutional sense of the term? The law-making power, in the first instance, is to judge; we are to decide whether what we would authorize to be done is constitutional or not; and in the second place, the judiciary is to decide; and if, by his vote, he said, he should declare it to be a crime, a misdemeanor, for an individual to collect arms and munitions of war for the purpose of using them in a military expedition within the territories of a foreign Government with whom we are at peace, he should not deem it an "unreasonable seizure" to authorize the taking possession of and detaining them, if necessary, to prevent their being used in the completion of the criminal intent, and especially where the peace and the honor of the nation may be concerned.

It has been said the power conferred would be liable to be abused. This is true in all cases, and no more so in this than in any other; and the officer abusing his trust is liable for damages, and subject to indictment and punishment. There is, perhaps, less danger of an arbitrary abuse of power in the case for which this bill is more immediately designed, than in many other cases; for, in addition to those securities which ordinarily exist, the strong public sentiment which exists on our northern frontier will present a barrier against any unjust or arbitrary abuse of power. That great excitement still prevails on that frontier is unquestionably true, and that the feelings and sympathies of the people are with what is called the patriot cause, is equally true; and under these circumstances, there is perhaps a greater probability of inefficiency in the execution of the law, than of an arbitrary abuse of power; for in this country, more than any other, public sentiment is power. Sir, (said Mr. T.) I am not sure, but from the tone of this debate, injustice may be done to the citizens on that frontier. I am not sure but the impression may be made on some, that the feelings which pervade that section of the country are any thing but justifiable; that they are generally disposed to encourage measures that may lead to a violation of our neutral relations, and involve the peace of the country. If, so, great injustice would be done them. He believed no portion of the American people more cordially approve the general policy of this Government, of non-interference with the internal affairs of other nations, of maintaining a strict neutrality with foreign powers. But that feeling, common to American citizens, of sympathy for the oppressed, of those who may be struggling for freedom, is deeply rooted in their hearts, and prevails with them as elsewhere, and has manifested itself on all occasions. It is an American feeling, the natural fruit of our country's triumphs in a like struggle, and the establishment of our free institutions. It has its origin in a natural abhorence to oppression in any quarter, and in a patriotic attachment and preference for the institutions of our country, and I think the gentleman from South Carolina (Mr. LEGARE) must have misconceived the feelings of the people on that frontier, when he characterized them as "strange and unnatural." But, sir, the generous feeling which has generally prevailed in that quarter, friendly to what is denominated the patriot cause, but which sought not to disturb the neutral relations of the Government, or to compromit the peace of the country (with but a very few exceptions) has been changed from sympathy to indignation for wrongs committed;—or rather, he would say, indignation for the destruction of the lives and property of our citizens within our own waters and on our own shore, has been superadded to sympathy for the oppressed. The affair of the Caroline is not forgotten, and the rewards and honors said to have been confered by the provincial Parliament on them concerned in it, have not tended to allay the feeling. Still they are not disposed to rash and violent measures, and will wait in the full confidence that the national honor will be fully vindicated, and her rights maintained. It is believed that but few of our citizens are engaged in any unlawful enterprise, that most of those who are said to be imbodied or engaged in an enterprise for the invasion of Canada are Canadian refugees. And it is the duty of this Government to see that all our neutral obligations are enforced, and he trusted that duty would be faithfully performed, and in good faith. And, while he trusted this duty would be faithfully performed by both Government and people, that we should not only, in our relations with foreign Governments, neither ask or do any thing but what is clearly right, he trusted that other part of the maxim, worthy the man who uttered it, would be as rigidly maintained, that we shall "submit to nothing that is wrong."

THE INDEPENDENT TREASURY BILL.

SPEECH OF MR. STRANGE,
OF NORTH CAROLINA.

In Senate, March 6, 1838.—Upon the bill to "impose additional duties, as depositaries, upon certain public officers, to appoint Receivers General of public money, and to regulate the safe-keeping, transfer, and disbursement, of the public moneys of the United States."

Mr. STRANGE addressed the Senate as follows:

When, at the extra session, I had the honor of submitting to the Senate, in as condensed a manner as possible, my views on the subject now under consideration, I did not suppose that, under the pressure of that high responsibility which rests upon every member of this distinguished body, I should again be compelled to enter the arena and engage anew in this momentous strife. I did believe that such a direction would be given to the subject as to lull into repose those elements of discord which have been so long howling through the political atmosphere. I did not anticipate that the political patient would be forced to lie for months in ignorance of his disease, and without the application of any remedy that, in his anxiety and distress, his hopes and his fears might be appealed to, to wring from him concession. But such has been the result, and the subject is again before us, and, notwithstanding the great ability with which it has been discussed, I feel it my duty, avoiding, as much as possible, grounds heretofore occupied by me, to offer some suggestions to the Senate. In doing so, I shall probably repeat much that has been said by others; and if I should seem tedious to the Senate, my apology must be found in the magnitude of the subject. It is, on the side I propose to advocate, so full of topics that the difficulty is not to find something to say, but to select from the vast mass of matter which crowds upon the mind. In this respect, perhaps, the gentlemen in the Opposition may seem to have some advantage over us, for the little that can be urged on that side of the question may be thrown upon the mind in all the force of concentration, while on ours the effect of each is dissipated by the variety of considerations which claim attention. In the remarks I shall make, I beg leave in the outset to disclaim any personal allusions. Personalities in debate are, in my judgment, wrong in every point of view. They violate the decorum which becomes these halls. They are breaches of that spirit of kindness which should characterize the intercourse of members of the same body. They interfere with the faithful discharge of duty to our constituents. They are inconsistent with our own self respect, and detract from our propriety as gentlemen. In any thing, therefore, which I may say, I war upon parties, not persons; upon principles, not men. It might seem invidious to select any one from among those who have preceded me in the advocacy of what I conceive to be the cause of truth, as a peculiar subject of remark; but when it is remembered that the Senator from Ohio is a native of the State which I have the honor in part to represent, that he hath been transplanted from my own sunny clime to the cold regions of the lakes, and hath yet put forth in unabated vigor, and is withal one of the youngest members of this body, both in age and station, I may be excused for tendering him my thanks as one of the Democracy of the country, and, so far as my feeble voice may serve, cheering him on in the race of glory he has so nobly begun.

In the further progress of my remarks, I shall treat the original bill reported by the Committee of Finance, and the proposed substitute of the Senator from Virginia, together, for, like Pharaoh's dream, the subject is one, although presented in a two-fold manner. And the parallel holds in another important particular; for, if the substitute should prevail over the original bill, it will be the consumption of the seven full and good ears of corn by the seven thin, withered, and blasted by the east wind; the destruction of the seven fat-fleshed and well-favored kine by the seven thin-fleshed and ill-favored, such as were never seen in all the land of Egypt for badness. This subject has been justly pronounced on all sides as of the utmost importance. Indeed I do not believe that one equally important is likely to engage the attention of Congress through the lapse of years. Its importance is evinced by the nature of the opposition it has been doomed to encounter. The press has made it and its advocates, for months past, the themes of ridicule, insult, and vituperation. An opposition the most talented, compact, and powerful ever known in this country, has met it on both floors of Congress; and even some of those, to whose bosoms the principles are dear which it is intended to support, and who would pour out the blood of those bosoms in their defence, under (they will excuse me for saying,) "a strange, a passing strange" delusion, are found warring against it; and should this bill fail, had it a voice to speak, it might exclaim in its dying accents, "Tu quoque Brute," with the first man in Rome when he fell beneath the daggers of his friends. This reminds me that the Senator from New York [Mr. TALLMADGE] bade the friends of the Administration "beware the ides of November." I, for one, receive the warning in the spirit in which it was given, albeit I may not profit by it; and in the kindest manner I take leave to remind that Senator in return, that it was of the ides of another month that Cæsar was warned, not by a misguided friend, but by his faithful Augur Spurina; and when the sacrifice was completed, and Cæsar was slain, the chief of those concerned in his destruction were forced to acknowledge that they had acted under a wild delusion, and had "struck the foremost man of all this world but for supporting robbers;" and all that they had gained was the poor privilege of having the insulting proposal made to them "to sell the mighty space of their large honors, for so much trash as might be grasped, thus." But formidable as has been the opposition of the press, and that upon both floors of Congress, one still more powerful is waging against this bill. The banks, the banks, once the few and modest agents of commercial exchanges, have been multiplied by hundreds, and converted into one great political machine, wielding its Briarian arms in every direction. When Cadmus slew the dragon, it was dead for ever, and from its sown teeth only sprung forth armed men. But when the mother monster of banks was slain, it revived in its own person, and from some portion of its exuviæ sprang forth a legion more terrible in this controversy, than an army with banners.

This measure, in my judgment—another magna charta—another Declaration of the Independence of the people has been grossly traduced and misrepresented. Imagination has gathered around it dark shadowy forms, obscuring its stature and proportions, and then declared it, like Hamlet's cloud, an ouzel or a camel, as the humor prompted. Under her magic touch it has grown up into a vast mountain, destined to belch forth its volcanic lava in every direction, overwhelming this fair land in ruin and desolation. Mr. President, when I look to the substantial argument which is brought against this measure, I feel the same exultation which filled my soul when I heard read in this hall that able and luminous document which first brought it to the attention of Congress. Then I felt proud of my country, of my principles, and of the man whom I had borne an humble part in rendering the honored instrument, (or, if gentlemen think either our morals, our taste, or our language, is to be improved by applying low terms to dignified subjects,) the honored tool in bringing them into action. But when I look to the clouds of prejudice, which, in thick, heavy masses have gathered around it, I am oppressed with gloomy forebodings, and my heart sickens at the anticipated miseries of my country. Oh! that it were mine to wield a magic wand, by which I might brush away those clouds of prejudice, and lay bare the subject in all its simplicity, But the wish is vain, and I must essay what I can however limited my hopes of success.

The first and most natural mode resorted to by the enemies of an Independent Treasury to prejudice the public mind against it, is pouring upon it, in advance, the most violent and bitter denunciation. Odious names are applied to it and its friends, Loco Focoism, Agrarianism, Spoils Party, and a host of other catch words, having no very definite meaning, and thereby leaving to imagination to fill up the blanks with every thing dangerous and detestable. To borrow a figure from the Senator from South Carolina, not now in his seat, [Mr. PRESTON,] they are used as a bell to ring together a rabble of offensive ideas. Every one knows the effect of the cry of mad-dog upon the unfortunate animal against whom it is directed. Even the most staid and prudent men are roused from their propriety, and join in the pursuit of the doomed wretch; and the inquiry whether or not the charge is well-grounded is seldom made until it ceases to be a matter of any consequence to the creature charged whether it is true or not. This measure has been denounced upon this floor in a tone of voice, and with an emphasis which might have disturbed the sleep of every cradle in this wide-spread city, as worse than the alien and sedition law. There is, in my judgment, a vast difference between the two measures The one has already been condemned by the American people, and spurned as an attempt to fetter their liberty and bind them in slavery. The other, as I have already intimated, is a feather from the wing of their own high-soaring eagle. But there is no disputing about taste. The devil, it is said, prefers blasphemy to prayer. But what the Senator who made this denunciation can find in the alien and sedition law preferable to an Independent Treasury, I leave him to point out.

The next circumstance seized upon to prepossess the public mind against an Independent Treasury is, that it was recommended by the President of the United States; and the Senate has been taunted with being composed of a parcel of servile minions of power, assembling only to register the rescripts of a tyrant. Sir, I would ask, was our Constitution founded in wisdom or in folly? Is any here so bold as to declare the latter? If any, let him speak out plainly. None! Then it is acknowledged to be founded in wisdom; and if so, for what purpose was the third section of the second article inserted? which declares, "he (the President) shall, from time to time, give to the Congress information of the state of the Union, and recommend to their consideration such measures as he shall judge necessary and expedient." Was it merely to test whether the President would yield obedience to the behests of the Constitution? whether Congress would be so tame and submissive as to pay the slightest respect to the suggestions made under the injunctions of the Constitution? or whether any President would have the audacity to assail the jus divinum recently transferred from kings to corporations? The Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. WEBSTER] was wrong in calling the message which recommended the Independent Treasury the Æolian cave. The figure would have been much more apt if, in speaking of it in connection with the paper system, he had compared it to the inverted spear which the poet represents as having been stricken into the hollow mountain, or that launched by Laocoon against the side of the wooden horse. The effect was not, as I think, that mentioned by the Senator:

> Una Eurusque Notusque ruunt creberque procellis
> Africus et vastos volvunt ad littora fluctus.
> "All the winds rushing out in fierce storms together,
> And rolling the great waves to the shore."

But it was, in my opinion, another description of the poet,

> Uteroque recusso,
> Insonuere cavæ, gemitumque dedere cavernæ;
> . . . . . .
> Insequitur clamorque virum.
> "The womb being smitten, its hollow caverns sounded, and gave a groan. The clamor of men followed."

The next mode of prepossessing the people against an Independent Treasury, is calling it a war upon the banks, and through them upon the people. Was there ever a more gratuitous assumption? What are the facts? Does Congress propose to pass any law regulating the banks, abridging their privileges, or modifying their charters? Does it propose to tax them, or in any other way to legislate of, or concerning them? Do not the friends of this measure expressly disclaim all right so to do? Who, then, is the assailant? Congress proposes to pass a law declaring how the revenues of the Government, raised exclusively for the uses of the Government, shall in future be received, kept and disbursed, and the banks, through their agents, break in upon the calmness of Congressional deliberation, and demand that the whole business shall be committed to them. We alone, say they, are entitled to its possession. No others can be found worthy to be trusted with it. Besides, the possession of it is profitable to us; and we cannot surrender the advantages we derive from it; and what is more, we say that the people derived advantages from our possessing it; and we will so convince the people; and we will stir them up to aid us in this demand; and we declare that your effort to commit the revenues to other keeping than ours, is war upon us, and through us upon the people. This artifice of the banks in bringing forward the name of the people in their attempt to seize upon the public treasure, reminds me of an ingenious but cruel device in ancient warfare, when two cities or nations being at war, the one, by some accident, got into its possession a number of the wives and children of the other; these the former placed in front of them, and so advanced upon their adversaries, upon whom they could with effect discharge their arrows and hurl their javelins, while the latter were restrained by the fear of wounding their own kindred. The banks know that we are the kindred of the people, ourselves a portion of them; and could we be persuaded that in resisting their attempts we were wounding the people, we should yield the contest. But what is the connection between the banks and the people? Do the people control the banks, or the banks the people? There can be but one answer to these questions. It is our masters' masters, then, and not our masters themselves, who demand the public treasure; and if we do not surrender it, shall it be said we are making war upon both? We make no war upon the banks: it is the banks who have made war upon us. As the ancient Gauls did the Roman territory, they have overrun our country; we have been driven to the Capitol, the only remaining fortress, and no help is left to us, but like Manlius Torquatus, to hurl the intruders from its walls.

Another mode of exciting prejudice against the Independent Treasury system, is speaking of it as a separation between the people and the Government. No charge was ever more absurd than this. Those who use it, but betray their own habitual mode of thinking. They are wont to consider the Government as the property of the few, contrived for their special comfort and accommodation, while the people, an ignoble herd, are totally unfit to govern themselves, or to have any part in the government of others. They are accustomed to view mankind in classes, regularly graduated, at the head of which graduation stand those who administer the Government; while the friends of the Independent Treasury look upon Government as a mere institution, set up by the people for their own use and purposes, managed by a portion of themselves, appointed as agents of the whole to that end. That that it has no incarnate, separate existence, like monarchical or aristocratic Governments, and can have no rights or interests but those which it holds in trust for the people. Distinct from theirs, except so far as is necessary for the discharge of its fiduciary office, it has no existence.

But the most formidable of all the prejudices excited against the Independent Treasury system, is that caused by considering it as a part of a great system devised by the late Administration, which has thus far in its progress, brought ruin and distress upon the country. It is asserted that the nation is in the very depths of pecuniary distress, and that all this has been brought about by the unwise or malicious deeds of the past Administration continued by the present. The ghost of the late Administration is made to stalk across this hall an object of terror as well as of admiration, and men are thereby frightened from their propriety. This was the principal theme of the very able address to which we listened from the Senator from Kentucky, [Mr. CLAY,] on Monday week, and I think he succeeded very effectually in showing that neither the past or present incumbent of the Presidential chair was very favorable to banks as the fiscal agents of the Government. But that he ever reached the Q E D of his argument, to wit: that that hostility had wrought any ill to the country, I utterly deny. It never has and never can be proven that it caused the present commercial distress so loudly complained of; but, on the contrary, it is perfectly manifest, and the experience of every day renders it more so, that this distress is the result of over-trading and excessive bank issues. This state of over-trading and over-issuing, presented a deceitful show of great prosperity, most glowingly described by the Senator from Kentucky, who last addressed you, [Mr. CRITTENDEN,] and to convey some adequate idea of it, he borrowed from the beautiful soliloquy of Cardinal Wolsey:

> "We were like little wanton boys who swim on bladders and the Senator might have continued the quotation, and found in it the cause of the sad reverse:
> These many summers, on a sea of glory;"

> "But far beyond our depth: our full-blown pride
> Burst under us,
> And left us to the rude mercy of a stream,
> Which threatens to o'erwhelm us."

Yes: this sea of glory in which we have been swimming and bathing, is that in which we are in danger of being drowned. Confirmation is daily added to the positions taken by the President, and maintained by his friends at the extra session, that the paper system had been expanded in England as well as in this country, and that the commercial distress complained of in this country was to a greater or less extent prevalent in all the trading nations. This very morning, before I came to the House, a friend read from a late newspaper in my hearing, that the trade of Canton was nearly suspended. Was the suspension of the trade of Canton attributable to the Specie order of President Jackson? To the removal of the deposites or the suppression of the United States Bank? No, one, I suppose, would pretend that it was. In addition to the proofs of commercial distress in England cited at the last session, listen to a few sentences from the Edinburgh Review, No. 131:

"The commercial and pecuniary history of Great Britain during the last twelve months, deserves to be carefully studied and meditated. In January, 1836, trade and industry were generally believed to be in the most satisfactory condition. The country was perfectly tranquil, mercantile and moneyed men had the greatest confidence in each other, the foreign demand for our manufactures was beyond all former precedent, all sorts of laborers had full employment, prices were moderate, and the Bank of England had above seven millions of coin and bullion in her coffers. Now, as every one knows, no political convulsion has taken place in the interval, the public tranquillity has never been for a moment disturbed, the home and foreign demand for our manufactures continued, till recently, to be as great as ever; the gloomy anticipations that were at one time entertained with respect to the late harvest have not been realized, and many important public works have been undertaken in the course of the past year. Such being the case, a person unacquainted with the circumstances would naturally conclude that there must now be more confidence than ever; that the extraordinary extension of manufactures and trade must, by making most foreign countries our debtors, have determined the balance of payments in our favor to such an extent as to render the accumulation of bullion inconvenient to the bank. But how reasonable soever these conclusions may appear to be, not one of them, we are grieved to say, would be consistent with the fact. Instead of increasing, confidence has been well nigh destroyed; a great derangement has taken place in commercial speculations, and, instead of being increased, the stock of bullion in the bank has been reduced from about seven to not more than three and a half millions, and that establishment has been placed in the greatest jeopardy! Such are some of the anomalous results we have lately witnessed."

Is there no pecuniary distress depicted here? It is well remembered by the Senate, that early in this session, Birmingham papers were distributed among the members of this body, containing a memorial of the citizens of that manufacturing town in England to Lord Melbourne. It struck me at the time that that memorial was full of useful instruction to us, and had fully intended to preserve with care the copy which fell to me, but I have, by some accident, mislaid it. It fortunately happens that extracts have been taken from it in that article in the Edinburgh Review to which I have just referred, and I beg leave to call the attention of the Senate to some of those extracts, together with some few other sentences of the article itself.

"The following memorial may be referred to in proof of this, Birmingham not being affected by any particular discredit. It was presented to Lord Melbourne in March last, and was signed by all the principal merchants, manufacturers, and traders of the town. The facts it communicates are in no degree exaggerated, and are equally striking and instructive:

"MY LORD: We, the undersigned, merchants, manufacturers, and other inhabitants of the town of Birmingham, beg leave respectfully to represent to your Lordship the following facts:

"1st. During the last two or three years a very great improvement has taken place in the trade and commerce of the town and neighborhood. The workmen have generally been placed in a condition of full employment and good wages, producing a general state of satisfaction and contentment among them. Their employers have also enjoyed a condition of ease and security, which might be called affluence when compared with the losses, difficulties, and anxieties which they endured for several years before. No stock of goods was accumulated; no over-trading of any kind existed; the product of one man's industry were readily exchanged for those of another; and all the products of industry in every trade were carried off into the absolute consumption of the people quite as fast as they could be produced.

"2d. Suddenly, within the last three months, with all the elements of general prosperity remaining unimpaired, this gratifying state of things has disappeared, and has been succeeded by a general state of difficulty and embarrassment, threatening the most alarming consequences to all classes of the community. Orders for goods are countermanded and discontinued, both for foreign and home trade. The prices of goods are falling, so as in many cases to occasion a loss instead of a profit on their production. The process of production is thus obstructed, the workmen are beginning to be discharged, or be placed upon short employment, and we are confident, that unless remedial measures be immediately applied, a large proportion of our population will shortly be thrown entirely out of employment."

Here, then, are pictures of pecuniary distress equal to any which can be drawn by American fancy. And does any one suppose that they have been drawn by the writer of this article, and the men of Birmingham, just to gratify President Van Buren, and to sustain his theories? No one, I presume, will so imagine. And to what do the people of England attribute their distresses? Is it to their Government? or to ours, or its measures? To the Specie Circular, the removal of the deposites or the non-charter of the United States Bank? Let them speak for themselves:

"It is not necessary, in order to get a sufficiently distinct view of the circumstances which occasioned the late and present difficulties, to go farther back than January, 1836. At that epoch the exchange was either at par, or slightly in our favor, showing, consequently, that the currency was at its proper amount, and that it ought neither to be increased nor diminished otherwise than through the influx or efflux of bullion. But, while matters are in this situation, a peculiar combination of circumstances conspired to set on foot and inflame a wild and dangerous spirit of speculation. The favorite objects to which the public attention was directed, were the formation of companies for the construction of railways and the establishment of joint stock banks. The ruin of those concerned was the worst evil that could result from the formation of crude schemes of the former description, or from the undertaking of works that could not reasonably be expected to yield a profitable return. But it was quite otherwise with the rage for banks. Had they been only banks of deposite, their multiplication, how little soever it might have been required, could not have been productive of any considerable inconvenience. Unfortunately, however, they were not so restricted; and, besides undertaking the care of other people's money, they almost all set about issuing money of their own. The extent to which paper mints of this description were multiplied, during the early part of the last year, would hardly be believed by any one not conversant with the facts. From 1826, when the act authorizing the formation of joint stock banks in England and Wales passed, down to the 31st of December, 1835, being a period of ten years, sixty joint stock banks had been established in England and Wales, giving an average of six banks a year. But in 1836, a new era began—a mania for joint stock banks suddenly grow up—and such was its violence, that between the 1st of January and the 26th of November, 1836, no fewer than forty-two of these establishments had been organized and brought into competition with those previously existing!

"In point of fact, however, the number of banks created during the past year was vastly greater than appears from this statement. We believe that, at an average, each of the forty-two new banks had from four to six branches; and as these branches transact all sorts of banking business, and enjoy the same credit as the parent establishment, from which they are frequently at a great distance, they are, to all intents and purposes, so many new banks; so that, instead of forty-two, it may be safely affirmed that about two hundred new joint stock banks were opened in England and Wales in 1836!

And yet, in the face of all this, it was asserted upon the floor of the Senate, at the last session, that there was no undue expansion of the paper system in England, and no general commercial distress. The truth is, the same spirit of speculation, rage for banks, railroads and joint stock companies, and land monopoly, sprang up in this country and England about the same time, and one encouraged the other in its excesses. Those in this country who did not cast their eyes beyond the Atlantic to see what was going on there, attributed the increase of banks to the withdrawal of the checking influence of the United States Bank, and adopting the quack's maxim, post hoc propter hoc, concluded that because this state of things was very nearly simultaneous with the refusal to recharter the bank, and the removal of the deposites, the one was cause, and the other effect. The total inefficiency of the Bank of England to restrain this evil there, ought to convince one, it would seem, how powerless a United States Bank would have been for the same purpose, had one been rechartered here. The cause of the revulsion is plain enough. Our gold bill, British investments in American stocks and American loans, caused the golden tide to set rapidly towards this country, and the specie in the Bank of England was in a very short time reduced from between ten and eleven millions to about three and a half. This sudden collapse of the money bags on which she had fixed her imperial throne, jostled the Juno Moneta, called by the moderns confidence, and threw her from her seat. The Bank of England became alarmed, and in her haste to regain her necessary supply of gold, spread dismay in every direction. Her efforts naturally threw exchanges greatly against this country, and produced all that sudden prostration about which wise men affect to make a mystery. She has succeeded in regaining the quantity of specie which it seems has long been deemed necessary to her safety and comfort, and which, by the last accounts coming under my observation, had risen to between eleven and twelve millions. We already feel its effects. Exchanges are again in our favor; the commercial tide is beginning to move, and, in spite of panic makers, trade is beginning to flourish; and it will continue to flourish, without any adventitious stimulants, as long as our soil remains fertile, is tilled by our industrious fellow-citizens, and the blessing of Heaven descends upon their labor.

Again: we are represented as acting in direct opposition to the known will of the people, and are charged with want of fealty to our constituents. We profess the utmost respect for the voice of the people; and if we understand it aright, are, notwithstanding the delusion under which we fear a large portion are acting, but obeying the will of a decided majority. The Opposition have their feasts, raise a noise and clamor, make bold and swaggering speeches, and put forth splendid newspaper puffs and descriptions; and as the "rabble rout," as one of their orators has termed it, passes by them, mingle their shouts with theirs, and pronounce it the united voice of the people. "The ox knoweth his owner," and as yet the people are in the ascendant, and no public servant dares to question their supremacy; but if no check is put to the present progress of events, the other part of the text will become true, and "the ass will know his master's crib;" for no one will attain to wealth or honor, who does not receive them at the hands of the bank aristocracy. The Senator from Virginia [Mr. RIVES] has been pleased to allude to the popular voice in North Carolina; and I must say I am not a little surprised at such an allusion from such a quarter. My very kind feelings and personal respect for that Senator, prevent me from addressing to him the harsh language of reproof, in the words of St. Paul—"Evil communications corrupt good manners;" but I will say, that a man soon learns to speak the language of those with whom he associates. I will undertake to assure that gentleman that there are but few Conservatives in North Carolina; and if there is one, I have never known or do not now remember him. When men there leave the Administration, they go over at once into the ranks of Whiggery. They call not at that half-way house so much commended by the Senator from Kentucky, [Mr. CLAY;] they make but one day's journey from Democracy to Federalism; they do not even stop on the way to bait. If, then, there has been any change in public sentiment in North Carolina, unfavorable to the Administration, it has not been to Conservatism, but to absolute Whiggery or Federalism; and if such changes are pleasing to the Senator from Virginia, I can only say, he also must have greatly changed since he was a noble competitor with the usual occupant of that seat for that distinguished honor.

But, sir, I believe and trust there has been no change in North Carolina, unfavorable to the Administration. An opinion founded upon there being a majority of Opposition members from that State in the House of Representatives, would be exceedingly fallacious. We seldom place our elections in North Carolina exclusively upon political grounds, and our freemen will consult their hearts as well as their heads in the exercise of their elective franchise. It is long since the Administration had a majority in the House of Representatives from our State. When my honorable colleague who fills his station with so much honor to himself, and credit to his State was last elected, there was a majority of opposition members from that State in the other House, and yet, upon joint legislative ballot, he obtained a majority of thirty. And when the humble individual who now addresses you was elected, there was a like majority in the other House. It is true he received but a bare majority of the votes of the Legislature upon joint ballot, but more than one Administration county in the State had sent an Opposition member, and if there was a single Opposition county represented by an Administration man, it has escaped my memory. But, Mr. President, if the people of North Carolina are dissatisfied with the course of their representatives upon this floor, they know well how to signify that disapprobation, and they know, too, that they have in my colleague and myself two obedient servants, who, when the will of their constituents is communicated to them in a proper and intelligible manner, will either conform thereto, or bid adieu to these halls, "nor cast one longing lingering look behind."

I have thus endeavored to put aside some of the prejudices which stand in the way of a fair consideration of this subject, although perhaps with little success. Indeed I have never flattered myself with the hope of doing more than the maker of a chart, who indicates to the unwary passenger some of those rocks and shoals upon which there is danger of his being wrecked, but has no power to remove them from their deep foundations. Having done what I may, however, in the effort, I proceed to consider this question, in the first place, in its financial bearings: that is to say, as a mere method of keeping and disbursing the public revenue. It was observed by Mr. Madison, in the debate in the Virginia Convention upon the adoption of the Federal Constitution, that "money was the soul of a Government." To this it was replied by the distinguished Patrick Henry, (one of the most ultra Democrats of any age or country, and who was altogether opposed to entrusting to the Federal Government the power of levying a revenue,) "shall I take my soul and give it to a government?" It was my fortune the other day to dine in company with a Revolutionary patriarch, one of those staunch and sturdy Democrats who has become a septuagenarian in the preservation and maintenance of those very principles which gave rise to that great struggle, "all which he saw and part of which he was." I learnt from him, with the liveliest satisfaction, that, in his judgment, this was but a crisis in that great strife, which had been going on in this nation ever since it had an existence, and that we were now engaged in the advocacy of those principles upon which he had kept his eye steadily fixed through his whole life, and from which he had never swerved; and, referring to the incident just mentioned between Mr. Madison and Mr. Henry, "shall the Government," said he, "take its soul and deposite it with a soulless corporation?" Yes, sir, money is the soul of a government: its vis mobile—its animating principle. Without it government can never execute those ends whereto it was constituted, and, however willing its agents, they can never perform the behests of their constituents. It is of the essence of the utility of money that it should be commanded at the moment of the exigency, and should not fall materially short in amount of the regular computation. In other words, that it should be readily commanded, and ultimately safe. In both these particulars I insist that the Independent Treasury has decidedly the advantage over the proposed substitute. And first, as to readiness of command. Of what readiness of command the deposite with local banks furnishes, we have before us a large volume of experience. Strongly as we were convinced by the sudden and general failure of the local banks, and the vast amount of public treasure which was thereby locked up and rendered useless to the Government, embracing nearly the whole amount of the revenue on hand, that conviction has gathered strength incalculable by the experience of the last few months. A suspension, which was at first declared to be temporary, and dependent upon mere accidental causes, still continues, although months have rolled over our heads since it commenced, and no human sagacity can even now foresee, with any certainty, when it will cease. Indeed, I have been credibly informed that a politician of much distinction, and not of the party to which I belong, has uttered the opinion that the banks will never resume specie payments. But grant that they will resume; we have now seen enough of their nature to satisfy us that they will always be liable to a repetition of casualties similar to the present. Indeed, that it is a casualty which must befal them often, unless fortune should be peculiarly propitious, and that just in proportion as the necessities of the Government become urgent, so will the ability of the banks to furnish the funds deposited with them diminish. That no stream of revenue supply can be relied upon as long as the banks are the fountain from which it must flow. Unlike the Independent Treasury receptacles, which, if any disaster happens to one, leaves the rest entirely unaffected, the banks, by a sympathy as certain and pervading as that of the Siamese twins, feel through the whole system any injury to one, of which system that one is but a part. Like the electric spark, such a disaster affects the whole of that atmosphere, confidence, in which only banks can exist for a single moment, renders it unfit for their mysterious respiration, and they become paralyzed, and their vital functions suspended or destroyed. The necessity of banks for this magic atmosphere of confidence furnishes, to my mind, a most conclusive reason why it cannot rationally be accorded to them. Every humbug is dependant on confidence, and few things but humbugs bespeak a confidence which they cannot command. The juggler, who intends to deceive you with tricks of legerdemain, bespeaks your confidence or credulity as essential to the success of his deception. The ventriloquist deceives your senses by first bespeaking your confidence that he will perform a certain thing, and leaves to imagination to assure you of its fulfilment. If the banks were really able to fulfil their engagements with the public, would they care a fig whether it had confidence in them or not? It is only because they are not able to fulfil those engagements that they desire to have the confidence of the ability substituted for the fact. The man who pays cash as he goes, cares not whether people have confidence in his ability or not; but the man who wishes credit requires confidence. This, in the case of the individual, is all fair, because he frankly acknowledges, "I am not able to pay you now, but I expect to be able to pay you at such a time;" and your belief that he will industriously exert himself to fulfil his engagement, that he is honest, and that Providence will smile upon his exertions, are the grounds upon which your confidence is awarded. But the unreasonable demand of the banks is, that you should have confidence, not only without any thing whereon to rest it, but in the face of your experience that it is misplaced. Let them show their ability, and they will command confidence; but when their hollowness and natural incapacity is visible in their whole texture, they sue for it in vain. When I ask confidence that I can lift the feather which I hold in my hand, I command it also, for I show at the moment that I am able to perform; but were I to assert an ability to uproot a mountain, my dearest friend would sneer at my effort to practice on his credulity. Confidence, like love, and hope, and joy, must be the spontaneous growth of the bosom it inhabits; it cannot be enforced. But I would ask the Senator from Virginia whether his Whig friends, who yield their support to his substitute, have confidence in it? He knows well they have not. They use it but as a half-way house in their journey onwards to a National Bank, whither they will certainly arrive, if time is allowed them to recruit their strength at this hospitable stage. If it is doubted what opinions the Whigs entertain in relation to this measure, I will read an extract from a Whig paper in my own State:

"We inquire next, are the local banks safe depositories of the public money? It is not pretended by any body, but that the removal of the deposites, and placing them in the pet banks, which afterwards refused to give them up, was what principally contributed to the fatal overthrow of our once happy and prosperous financial system. It is easy to foresee, that while the General Government remains dependent on some scores of banking corporations, subject only to the legislation of the respective States that created them, there can be no public security against their selfish frauds and faithless impositions, tempted as they are by that avarice which is at this moment, in one shape or another, sucking up the very life's blood of this Republic."

I proceed now, in the second place on this branch of the subject, to treat the question of ultimate safety. I made, at the extra session, a hasty concession, which farther reflection compels me to retract, to wit: that although the revenue would be more readily commanded by the Government in the hands of its own agents, yet each particular portion of it would be safer in the banks. My retraxit is founded not only upon a consideration of the subject, but upon the light which experience has already furnished in favor of individual agency. A tabular statement, for which I am indebted to my friend from Connecticut, [Mr. NILES,] seems to me sufficient to counterbalance all the theoretic conjectures which have been made in opposition to it:

Losses by the Government by depositing in banks, principal and interest—1814—1817 - - -	$1,892,642
Depreciation of bills received and paid out from 1814 to 1817 - -	6,000,000
Bills of broken banks now on hand, interest thereon not computed -	178,470
Bank of the United States withholding dividend and interest - -	233,422
Due May 1st, Treasury and public officers -	$31,212,058
Reported for suit by Secretary, under act of October, 1816 - 4,331,796
Average discount 6 per cent. on eighteen and a half millions of paper paid out by the banks of deposite on hand in May last - - -	1,100,000
Average discount on ten millions yet to be paid, say four per cent. - -	400,000
Loss by individuals from 1814 to 1817, supposed equal to Government -	6,000,000
Total,	$14,814,534

Thus it appears that not less than about fifteen millions of dollars have been lost by the banks, while the whole amount reported, from the foundation of the Government, to have been lost by individual agents is about three millions of dollars. And it seems that this account is subject to a deduction of about 66⅔ per cent. leaving an actual balance of about one million of dollars. Recently banks have failed in the Eastern States by which gentlemen on the other side intimate that heavy losses have been sustained by the creditors, and will be sustained by the Government. Whether this is so or not, dangers are certainly thickening around the banks, and if the Government loses nothing by them, it will be because it will have little or nothing in their custody.

Mr. President, in the course of this debate, I am drawn into a very frank expression of my opinions of the tendency of the banking system. Convictions produced by deep reflection, and enforced by the highest sense of duty. But I should do injustice to my feelings did I fail to declare that, so far as I am acquainted with banking operations in my own State, they have been conducted with much integrity, and the evils, if any, are the evils of the system, and not of its administrators. The great propriety with which banking operations have been conducted there, has rendered us too insensible to the evils of the system, and I doubt not that many sensible men will look upon these announciations of opinions on my part as coming from a heated imagination.

In addition to readiness of command and ultimate safety for the revenue, cheapness of administration, is an important consideration. Upon this point the people are justly sensitive. Economy is an important principle in a Republican Government, and ought to be secured so far as may be consistent with the safety of other principles, more important. The utmost extent of increase of expense by the adoption of the Independent Treasury is estimated at sixty thousand dollars. Now sixty thousand dollars considered separately, is a large sum; but when it is remembered that the present revenue expenses of the Government exceed two millions of dollars, the amount of sixty thousand dollars is scarcely a drop in the bucket. I have taken some pains to ascertain the amount of the revenue expenses, and have found an accurate ascertainment impracticable; but I am very certain that two millions are under the amount, and that an ascertainment cannot be made without much trouble, which will not be two or three times the expense of the Independent Treasury variant from the true amount. But it will be said that the substitute avoids even this expense. A remark by the way altogether inapplicable to the special deposite system, a great favorite with some gentlemen, for that proposes to pay the banks for keeping the public money, and thereby incurring an expense which I will venture to say will far exceed the expense of the Independent Treasury. But the apparent exemption of the substitute plan from expense is altogether delusive. The stimulus it will apply to banking, will greatly increase both public and private expense, lead to high tariff, and every other mode of increasing the public income, that the banks may have the keeping and use of it. An effort has been made to liken the Independent Treasury to the revenue system of France, and to show that system to have been exceedingly expensive. The number of revenue officers, it is said, amount to one hundred thousand. This I suppose is but conjecture, and I should be inclined to think an erroneous one. Mr. Goldsmith, a late writer on French statistics, presents the nation as divided into 86 departments, 362 arrondisements, and 39,381 communes. In each department there is a receiver general, to each arrondisement a receiver, and each commune, a collector. These officers added together, make a total of 39,821; and I admit that to this, there is probably a considerable addition; how much I am unable to say, but certainly I should conceive not such as to make the whole equal to 100,000. The number at best is large, but it carries with it this high recommendation, that upon this simple plan it renders these officers very safe checks upon each other. It has been also stated, that the revenue expenses of France amount to twenty-four cent. upon the whole income.

Now, sir, it has never been my fortune to bask under the sunny sky of France, and at the same time in the smiles of this wicked Administration; but thank Providence I have access to books, and from them I learn that the revenue of France in 1814, was about 450,000,000 francs, the expense attending it to about 15,000,000, or less than four per cent. That in 1815, the revenue amounted to 743,830,200 francs; the expense to 16,334,246, or something over two per cent. This is the more remarkable, as this year comprehended the hundred days, when the war expenses alone amounted to 328,293,134 francs. It is true, that in 1829, during that period of misrule, immediately preceding the last revolution in that land of revolutions, the revenue amounted to 986,156,821 francs, and the expense to 128,058,685, or between twelve and thirteen per cent.; and taking the average of these three years, it brings the expense to about six or seven per cent. very little varient from our our present expense; for it has been seen, that with a revenue of about thirty or thirty-five millions of dollars, our expenses are about two millions, or between six and seven per cent. Besides, it is necessary to take into view two or three important considerations. Most of these officers of the French revenue are collectors, and not keepers of the revenue; more than 39,000 of those enumerated being of the former class. This is a class which, under no revenue system, can ever be dispensed with, and it is not proposed by the bill to increase their number. Another observation is, that a large portion of the revenue of France is raised by direct taxation—confessedly the most expensive mode. And this brings to my recollection an appeal made by the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. CRITTENDEN] to the friends of the Administration, how they supposed the people would bear, in the event of resort to direct taxation, a demand of its payment in specie? In reply to that appeal, I have only to say that direct taxation always has been, and I presume always will be, an odious mode of collecting revenue, whether in specie or paper. That any thing may be rendered odious by coupling it with something odious in itself. That unless it be necessary no people bear taxation worse than the Anglo-Saxon race, and when necessary no people pay it more cheerfully. That neither in paper nor specie would the American people yield quietly to have money demanded of them in person by a tax-gatherer, in behalf of this Government, unless the necessities of the Government compelled a resort to that course; but whenever they do, the people will pay with readiness, and that in whatsoever the wisdom of the National Legislature shall pronounce expedient. A third observation which I make is, that, surrounded as France is, or nearly so, by other nations, with whom there is direct land communication, it is of course necessary for her to keep up a strong and expensive body of men engaged in what is called the preventive service. The wonder then is that the revenue expenses of France should be so inconsiderable, and it furnishes another proof of the genius of that wonderful man to whom is accorded, by common consent, the superiority in genius of the present, if not of every age, who perfected a system which works so admirably even in the hands of a far less talented controller. In addition to all this, I am informed, from high authority, that the French Government deputed a commissioner to England to investigate the subject, and the result of his examination was a decided opinion that economy would not be promoted by changing the French system for that of the English.

While upon this part of the subject, I will add that the banks after all impose upon the people of this country the most onerous tax they pay. A slight examination of the terms upon which the banks supply us with currency will be full of instruction. Before we enter upon this investigation, it must be received as a proposition in political economy, fully susceptible of demonstration, that he who tills the earth, or digs the metal out of it, furnishes the basis of all values, and in whatever state or wherever values or property are ultimately found, to one of these sources we must look as the original means of its possession. In whose hand soever real money is found it was originally levied upon the labor of the miner or the agriculturist, or upon what are called the productive classes. I will now proceed to take for example the State of North Carolina, and will suppose that six millions of dollars of circulating medium are necessary for her purposes, and, in order to test the matter fairly, will suppose farther that she has not within her borders one dollar of circulating medium. Now, according to the modern ideas upon this subject, there are two modes in which the necessary supply may be obtained, supposing her to have the necessary quantity of surplus produce. The one is by the incorporation of a bank and making use of a paper medium. The other is by converting her produce into specie in a foreign market, and bringing that specie home. Let us try the first process, and suppose a bank to be chartered with a capital stock of two millions of dollars: of this we will suppose about 10 per cent. to be paid in specie into the bank, that is to say, $200,000, before the bank is allowed to go into operation. That amount is obtained by loan from abroad, or in some other way, by the individual stockholders; but it is fairly paid in, and the bank is now ready to commence operations. The different farmers of the country bring together at a given time, two millions' worth of produce at the different market towns of the State, and offer it to the merchants for sale. The merchants say to them, "you are well aware, gentlemen, that there is not a dollar of money in the whole State of North Carolina, except what is in the vaults of the bank, and, of course, we have none with which we can pay you for your produce. But if you consent to consider us the purchasers of your produce, and will take payment for it in bank notes, the matter can be arranged; for we can sell our bills, drawn upon the faith of this produce, to the banks, for which they will pay us out their notes." The arrangement is made, and the banks accordingly throw into circulation two millions of dollars in their notes. For these they have received the representatives of so much specie, and which they consider as a specie fund, and are thereby placed in a situation to issue four millions more in their notes upon the discount of promissary notes, (for three paper dollars in circulation for one dollar in specie, or specie funds in their possession, is not beyond the limits of the most prudent banking) and thus the whole six millions of circulation is furnished by the bank. But who has furnished the real capital upon which this whole process is bottomed? Why the farmers, surely, who have supplied the produce, and not the manufacturers of paper, who charge the community as if they had furnished the substance, and not the shadow only. For it is very certain, that in one way and another, they levy upon the community, at the very lowest, at the rate of six per centum per annum for the amount of paper so furnished by them. This, it will be at once seen, amounts to three hundred and sixty thousand dollars per annum. Now this, as I have already said, comes out of the productive classes, who, let who will dance, ultimately and invariably pay the piper. It will thus be seen upon the United States at large, where about one hundred millions of this paper currency is furnished, six millions of dollars at least is levied. Let us now try the other process, and suppose the credit given by the farmer to the merchant, who only awaits the return of the proceeds of his cargo, which we may calculate, on an average, at six months, and we have the interest of two millions of dollars for that period, amounting to sixty thousand dollars; and by repeating the process thrice, so as to command an equal amount of circulating medium, you have one hundred and eighty thousand dollars, half the expense, and a currency of real substantial and abiding value. So much for the comparative cheapness of the Independent Treasury and fiscal agency of banks.

But the highest claim, after all, which the original bill has over the substitute, is, that the one is in strict conformity with the letter and spirit of the Constitution, while the other violates both. The first clause of the eighth section of the first article of the Constitution declares: "The Congress shall have power to lay and collect taxes, duties, imposts, and excises." For what purpose? "To pay the debts, and provide for the common defence and general welfare, of the United States," etc. But some time must, of course, intervene between the said collection and the application of the money to the purposes for which it was so raised; and the question is, what is to become of it in the mean time? The Constitution informs us, in the sixth clause of the ninth section: "No money shall be drawn from the Treasury but in consequence of appropriations made by law," etc In the Treasury, then, the money must be placed when raised. True, the Constitution does not so directly declare, but it says it shall not be drawn thence; and surely, the interdiction against its withdrawal distinctly implies that it must be there placed. And can any one, I ask, imagine that the Treasury in contemplation was a bank? If such a thing was in contemplation, it was easy to have so declared; but it was not so declared. It is not said money shall not be drawn out of the United States Bank, or the deposite bank, but out of the Treasury; and we learn by the debates in convention that the framers of the Constitution were not ignorant of banks, but purposely declined granting to Congress the power of chartering one. But the word Treasury had a plain and significant meaning, understood by every one as a place where individuals or communities kept their treasure, and in that plain, popular sense was used.

But allow, for the sake of the argument, that the Government might, in the general meaning of the word Treasury, elect to make a bank such Treasury, yet surely, under the clause I have just read, it could not make such bank the Treasury by a general deposite; for, whether the Treasurer be the cashier of a bank, or whatever complication of character may belong to him, he cannot withdraw money from the Treasury but in consequence of appropriations made by law. Will it be said that a general authority granted by Congress to the cashier to withdraw and replace money in the Treasury, is an appropriation made by law? Does not such an interpretation reduce the provision to an empty sound, and repeal it as to all substantial operation? But it may be said that the specific authority to lend out the money is an appropriation made by law. From whence does Congress derive the authority to make such an appropriation? The purposes for which Congress is authorized to collect revenue, are expressly set forth in the first clause of the eighth section of the first article: "to pay the debts, and provide for the common defence and general welfare of the United States." To lend money is not one of them. It will be said that, having the money, we have a right to lend it. This right is exceedingly doubtful; but grant it to exist, the substitute not only proposes to lend the money which you now have, but all that you shall hereafter raise, and places the same, ere yet it is raised, in the very process of getting to you, in the hands of banks to be lent out.

There is yet another part of the Constitution standing directly in the way of the proposed substitute, to wit: the latter part of the first clause of the eighth section of the first article: "But duties, imposts, and excises, shall be uniform throughout the United States." Now, is not the effect of the substitute entirely to destroy this provision? Grant that there is a uniformity in the original levy and collection, is not the effect of uniformity entirely done away if the revenue is immediately distributed by way of loan, in unequal proportions, among the different States of the Union. Suppose, for instance, ten gentlemen were to go to a boarding house in this city, and say to the landlord or landlady, as the case might be, "We all desire to have equal fare, and to be charged at the same rate." "Certainly," is the reply; "you shall all have the same fare and be charged at the same rate;" and the bargain is accordingly closed. It turns out, however, in the event, that the landlord has stipulated with one of the guests to lend him out of the ten dollars agreed to be paid weekly, seven dollars; to another five; to another three, and to another one, without interest, and this for the whole time they remain boarders at his house; that is to say, to make the same return weekly for which they would give their notes, which the landlord stipulates with them shall be treated by him as so much gold and silver. Will any one pretend the parties had been treated with the stipulated impartiality? Clearly not, and so in a much more absolute sense is this stipulation of equality in the Constitution violated by the operation of the deposite system.

Again it is declared in the 5th clause of the 9th section of the 1st article that "no preference shall be given by any regulation of commerce or revenue to the ports of one State over those of another." And can any one doubt that the revenue regulations of the General Government hitherto acted upon, and those proposed to be adopted by the substitute of the Senator from Virginia has, and will have, the effect of giving decided advantages to the ports of one State over those of another? Have they not and will they not, paralyze the commerce of the Southern States, and give more vigor to that of a favored few at the North? To any one who does not see this, it is useless to address argument.

Our whole system of Government is based upon principles of equality, and these principles have always been more or less violated in its administration. But the substitute proposes a violation even greater than has yet been practised. Even the United States Bank might locate a branch in any State desiring it; and under the deposite law of 1836, the Secretary of the Treasury was not restricted to any State for the choice of banks, nor to any given number of banks in any one State. But we have, by the provisions of the substitute, the system of equality completely subverted, and the power of the large States magnified, and that of the small ones diminished. In the first place, the banks are limited to twenty-five, so that one State of the Union must of necessity be excluded from any participation in the real or imaginary benefits of this arrangement, and only twenty-five banks out of the hundreds in the Union are allowed to share it. This will be a pet bank system with a vengeance. And what is worse, the selection of these banks is to be committed in part to Congress, where the large States, in one branch at least, have a most decided advantage. Truly is the principle of equality altogether overlooked in this measure. But there is another clause of the Constitution standing in the way of the adoption of the substitute, (for it runs counter to a whole phalanx of constitutional provisions,) and that is a portion of the 2d clause 2d section of the 2d article; "he, [the President,] shall nominate, and by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, shall appoint, ambassadors, other public ministers and consuls, judges of the Supreme Court, and all other officers of the United States," &c. Now, waiving the question raised by my colleague, whether corporations are competent to be chosen officers of the Government, (and I do not say that the objection is not a valid one,) it seems to me evident, from this clause of the Constitution, that whether the officer be an individual or corporation, he can only be appointed by the President, by and with the consent of the Senate, or by the President alone, or the heads of Departments, if they shall be vested by law with that power. And yet the substitute proposes that banks shall be selected as fiscal agents of the Government by Congress, contrary to the letter of the Constitution, and its manifest policy.

Whether receiving paper in payment of the public dues, be a direct violation of the Constitution, as insisted by the Senator from South Carolina, [Mr. CALHOUN,] or not, it ought, at any rate, to receive no sanction from Congress: because, in the first place, if not actually prohibited by the Constitution, it is evident it would have been done had its framers foreseen that an attempt would be made to establish it as the regular medium of receipt for the public dues. We find whole masses of the Constitution directed by them against the paper system, and we well know that it was a thing of which bitter experience had made them heartily sick; that they were, in the memorable language of a gentleman on the other side, hard money men. In the second place, no prudent person ought to receive what he cannot with propriety pay out; and it was well urged by the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. WEBSTER] on another occasion, that the Government ought only to pay, or even offer to pay, its creditors in a sound, uniform medium, so that the actual amount paid to each creditor should be equal to the nominal amount due him. In this I heartily concur; and therefore think the commanding the receipt by revenue officers in payment of public dues of what cannot be considered as such a medium, highly improper. Money is the only medium in which the law should authorize or compel the receipt of debts, and especially public debts; and it is an abuse of terms to call bank notes money. They want the main characteristic of money, and have, by looseness of conversation as well as of ideas, assumed the name of that for which they only stood as a substitute. From England, from whom we have borrowed the paper system, we have also borrowed this vice of expression, which confounds things essentially different. Bank notes are no more money than the note of an individual is money. It is of the nature of money, when paid to discharge altogether the previously existing debt, and to vest without more the property purchased in one person, and the money paid for it in another. But the payment of a bank note merely changes the debtor, and substitutes the bank as a debtor to the holder of its note, in lieu of him from whom he received it. It is still but what the lawyers call a chose in action. In ancient times, money consisted of cattle or other articles which had an intrinsic value, and the transactions were rather barters than sales, in the modern meaning of that term. In later times, gold and silver were found to possess all the requisites of a common standard of value in a higher degree than any thing else. They combined intrinsic value in a small compass with indestructibility and almost indefinite divisibility, and they have been adopted, by the common consent of all mankind, as the only general money of the world. When they are transferred, the debt before existing is extinguished, and no new one is created. They are the arbiter and finisher of all transactions. But it is insisted by the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. CLAY] that the Government makes money of whatever it receives as such. I agree that the Government does, by affixing its stamp of approbation, cause to pass as money what is not so in truth. And does not this consideration of itself, so far from furnishing a reason why Government should fix its stamp upon bank notes, operate directly the other way? In declaring that to be money which is not money, Government gives currency to a falsehood, and unsettles the sound foundations of public opinion; and no man can see the consequences to which a falsehood may lead, which he has once labelled as truth. The notes of a bank are no more money than the notes of individuals; and the Government can, by its action, make one pass as money as well as the other. And why should they not? Why should favored associations be taken under the fostering care of the Government, and individuals, whose worth and ability may be more distinctly known, discarded from it? Is this in keeping with the great principles of equality upon which our institutions are based? If assistance to the poor, in whose behalf the Senator from Massachusetts who last addressed you [Mr. DAVIS] spoke so pathetically, were a legitimate object of the action of this Government, it would certainly be much better accomplished by its endorsing the notes of the poor and needy, but worthy and struggling, citizen, than those of these wealthy corporations.

But the system proposed by the substitute is a radical change in the whole action of our Government from that proposed by the Constitution. In the first place, it legislates into perpetual existence a currency unknown to the Constitution, and against which many of its provisions are directed. In the next, it introduces into the texture of the Government a fourth estate, never designed by its framers to enter into it. It in effect declares that our ignorant forefathers knew nothing of the dire corruption which pervades the human heart, or had overlooked the only means of providing against it. That they did not see the beauties of that bank machinery by which the public treasure might be secured against the fingers of the pilferer, and neglected to provide it. And it is now proposed by their more sagacious sons to supply by legislation this dangerous omission. If all this is true, shall we suffer that sacred instrument to be thus interpolated without a regular process of amendment—that the legislature shall thus alter what was framed for the express purpose of circumscribing its own action? Surely not. But it is not true that the framers of the Constitution were ignorant of this bank agency, but it seems had it distinctly before them, and deliberately repudiated it.

But, notwithstanding all this, the Opposition calls the Independent Treasury a novelty—an experiment. That is to say, that the only plan known for the first 5,000 years of the existence of the world, is a novelty, although it has been, with very few exceptions, continued ever since; while that which was never heard of until about seven hundred years ago, and did not receive any thing like the form in which it is now urged until a little more than one hundred years since, is a perfect antiquity, and stands protected by hoary experience. The first bank which we hear of in the history of the world was that of Venice, established in 1157, A. D.; the next was that of Genoa, in 1345, near two hundred years after; the next was that of Amsterdam, in 1609; and then that of Hamburg, in 1619. The famous Bank of England had no existence until 1694, and about twenty years afterwards was followed by the Bank of France, to wit: in 1716. These places have all been conspicuous upon the theatre of the world, but not least for their wars and robberies. Commerce has enriched them, but it has been a commerce conducted in fraud and enforced in blood. I will not go back to Venice and Genoa, but take England, and the groans of oppressed India speak for her. The rivers of blood which have deluged that unhappy land, cry out for vengeance upon her lust of gold. Plunder by force or stratagem is the real sustenance of those nations, who subsist only on commerce. The first bank in France was a part of Mr. Law's famous bubble, for the payment of the national debt, and a very similar origin is found for that of England. From their unlucky explosions, the alchemists learnt lessons by which they profited in future experiments. But no bank became the fiscal agent of the Government, until the Bank of England became so in the reign of Queen Anne, whose expensive wars on the continent had involved the Government in pecuniary difficulty, and compelled her to apply to the bank for assistance. In consideration of that assistance, the bank was secured in a monopoly with a doubled capital. The equivolent she paid was an advance to the Government of £400,000 in cash, the cancelling of exchequer bills to the amount of £1,775,027, and throwing into circulation £2,500,000 more of the exchequer bills. And thus the bank for relieving the necessities of the Government, had secured to it a larger privilege of plundering the citizens—of covertly taxing them to reimburse herself. Upon the same principle it was that our U. S. Banks of 1791 and 1816 came into existence. Government necessities were great, and bonus, loans, and other accommodations to the Government obtained for the banks the authority to make these disguised exactions from the people. Yet gentlemen say that banking is not profitable, and refer to the small dividends of the United States Bank. They leave out of the calculation the amounts paid to Government for their monopoly, the losses by frauds and mismanagement up to 1819, and the contingent fund for promoting the spread of bank principles. These are the institutions which claim the merit of antiquity, and look down upon that as a novelty, which, beginning with the history of mankind, has existed in its native simplicity to this day.

Again, it is argued that the collection and disbursement of the revenue in gold and silver are altogether impracticable, without creating great public distress through the scarcity of those articles. And here I will frankly confess, that when I first began to consider this subject, I was apprehensive that the adoption of the Independent Treasury system would materially affect the price of property, reducing it to a distressingly low value; and that has been, in my view, the only unfavorable circumstance connected with it. But longer observation and deeper reflection has dissipated that fear, and I now feel confident that the depression in the value of property, produced by the present reaction, is far greater than that which would be more permanently produced by any probable check given to the paper system by this or any other measure within the reach of Congress, or, indeed, by the total suppression of bank paper. I will call your attention to a report furnished by the Secretary of the Treasury at the present session, showing the balances in the Treasury at the end of each year, by which it is, in my judgment, manifest that five millions of dollars are enough for the Treasury circulation; and with the reduction in the revenue, which I hope to see take place, three millions will be amply sufficient. Mr. Gallatin computed the precious metals in the world (in 1819 I think it was) at between four and five thousand millions; and after all allowances each way, supposed the annual increase to be equal to about one per cent.; which, by this time, would bring it up to between five and six thousand millions. Of this about two thousand five hundred millions exists in coin. But our calculations are not to be circumscribed within the two thousand five hundred millions, the whole amount of the five or six thousand millions belonging to the great family of nations, for that purpose for which the God of nature seems especially to have provided them; and whenever the coin is found deficient, the bullion existing in other forms will, by an irresistible law, come as offerings to the altar of public convenience, whether it is found in the embellishments of modern life, or the curious vases dug from the ruins of antiquity. The circulating medium of the world may be compared to a vast ocean, of which the peculiar portion of each nation is connected with it, like a bay or arm of the sea. Each is affected by its tides; receives of its fullness at its flood, and must pour back into it at its ebb. From this ocean all that we would want for the purposes of our Treasury, would be but as a bucket-full from the waters of the Potomac.

It is next urged against the Independent Treasury that it is in fact a Government bank. "If this were so, it were a grievous fault," and many of its present friends, could they be so persuaded, would at once abandon it. But assertion is not proof, and after all the ingenious efforts of the Opposition to make good this charge, they have, as I think, signally failed. The most plausible of all the untenable arguments to which they have resorted to support this charge is, that the bill authorizes a transfer, by draft, if necessary, of the funds of the Government from one part of the country to another; and this they say constitutes a bank. If this be so, then almost every man in the country is not only a banker, but a bank. For who is there who may not, by bill of exchange, transfer money which he may have in one part of the country where he does not want it, to another where he does. But this objection of a Government bank comes with peculiarly ill grace from the Opposition; for however we may beat around the subject, the sting of a Government bank lies at last in its power to furnish a circulating medium to make loans and pay dividends. These are the alvers by which public opinion is to be moved, and all these the substitute in effect proposes to give to a system of institutions connected with the Government, while, whatever may be said to the contrary, the Independent Treasury wants them all, and no human ingenuity can lay its finger on the clause of the bill in which either of them lies. If gentlemen choose to suspect covert purposes not appearing on the face of the bill, there is no reasoning with suspicion. In this respect it resembles confidence: a man confides, because he will confide; and he suspects, because he will suspect.

It is further objected to the Independent Treasury, that it increases Executive patronage. We have heard a great deal of humbugs upon this floor; but of all the humbugs which have ever come under my observation, this is the merest. Already the offices holden at the will of the Executive exceed ten thousand, and our fears are suddenly appealed to upon the addition of twenty. Public liberty is perfectly safe with a corps of ten thousand office holders, but ten thousand and twenty threaten its immediate annihilation. Sir, I say again, as I have said before, that, under our institutions, an open and acknowledged patronage is a principle of weakness, rather than of power, to him who wields it. I feel it in my own humble sphere. My situation here entitles my opinions to some little respect in the appointment of officers in my own State, and I am, of course, occasionally applied to on that ground by those who desire them. In the discharge of my legislative duties, my constituents and I understand each other perfectly; they know what course I am likely to take upon any great measure, and there is no disappointment. But in the exercise of the little influence I possess in the distribution of offices it is different. For one whom I have it in my power to gratify, I am forced to disappoint ten; and I am more fortunate than I expect to be if those whom I cannot oblige do not impute my not doing so, some to ingratitude, some to a want of a due sense of their merits, some to a wish to accomplish objects of my own, and others to a want of that influence which a more able man in my place would command. In either view I have made a bad bargain, and have lost much more than I have gained. Such, in a much larger sphere, is the situation of the President. But that is not all; his appointments, when made, do not always add strength to his administration. So far as my experience goes, the mass of applicants for office are from the ranks of the Opposition; and their feelings of opposition, though temporarily smothered, are seldom appeased, but are certain to show themselves on the first occasion of trial; and the instances are far more numerous of those who received office while professing attachment to the Administration, afterwards becoming its opponents, than of opposition being won over by appointment to attachment and advocacy. But what is true of open and undisguised patronage, is not true of that secret and complicated influence which may be exercised through the banks, whenever the objects of the Administration and of the banks become identified. Agents of this influence start up, like Rhoderick Dhu's men, from behind every bush, and their appeals can be addressed in the most subtle, and yet, in appearance, most innocent forms. Take a single instance. A member of this, or one of the State Legislatures, is debtor to a bank, and a measure of great importance is pending before the legislative body—those most conversant in bank affairs choose to suppose that it will in some way materially affect banking interests, and the general conversation upon the subject inculcates that belief. A bank officer has occasion to write to this member merely to inform him that on such a day his note will be due; but, as he has his pen in his hand, he adds: "The measure now under consideration in your body, if it becomes a law, will, it is thought, create a necessity for the banks to curtail their issues, and the debtors will, of course, be required to pay up their notes in full." Now, there is nothing wrong in all this; but what is the effect upon the recipient of the letter? A perfectly natural one. His thoughts take a new direction. "It is true," he says to himself, "I had intended to have voted for this measure, and supposed it a beneficial one; but in that I may be mistaken; and if it is to affect the banks as stated in this letter, the consequences to myself are appalling. I am not able to pay up this note, without the sacrifice of all that I possess. My wife will be reduced to beggary, and the prospects of my little ones forever blighted. The hazard is too great: I cannot encounter it." So would reason, under these circumstances, a man who had not the integrity of Aristides, with the firmness of Socrates. Sir, we all feel this bank influence pervading the very atmosphere we breathe. The filaments of its attraction insinuate themselves every where, into the most secret and retired places; and every man feels himself drawn on this side, and upon that, by some subtle power of which he is scarcely conscious.

I now proceed to the consideration of the subject as connected with commerce and political economy. I am not induced to take this view from any belief of my own, that it is pertinent to the present investigation; but our friends on the other side have obtruded it upon us, and by pressing it themselves in debate, have made it necessary for us to meet them upon that ground. I insist, as I did at the extra session, that the President was right in his opinion of the obligations of this Government, in relation to the currency. I deny that the Government is bound to furnish or regulate any other currency than that of gold and silver, nay, I deny its right to do so. Sir, the word currency is not in the whole Constitution, although a late fellow-traveller of high respectability, who had been recently reading the speech of the Senator from Massachusetts, [Mr. WEBSTER,] delivered at the last session of Congress, insisted that it was. I ventured modestly to put in my dissent to this opinion of my fellow-traveller, but to no effect; and as the argument grew warmer, he finally brought the weighty authority of the Senator from Massachusetts to bear upon me, and declared that that gentleman was unrivalled in his knowledge of constitutional law, and that any man who would read his speech must be satisfied that it was there. I was forced to admit, as I do now, that any man who was not himself acquainted with the Constitution, and would read the speech of the Senator, would come to the conclusion that the word currency was in the Constitution; and yet I admit that the honorable Senator from Massachusetts did not say that the word currency was there. He derives the authority of Congress over the currency, and the obligation to regulate it, from the third clause of the eighth section of the first article, which declares that Congress shall have power "to regulate commerce with foreign nations and among the several States," &c. and this, he says, coupled with the seventeenth clause of the same section and article, gives to Congress the power to create and regulate the means of commerce. I did understand the Senator, at the last session, to insist that the words regulate and create often meant the same thing; and, if my memory serves me, he offered some examples to prove it. But, sir, if the meanings of words are to be thus confounded, it seems to me that language loses all its utility, and words cease to be as they were designed—the vehicles of ideas. "God created the heavens and the earth," and his right to regulate them, grows out of his creative power. But yet the two rights or powers are altogether distinct. One of them he has transferred, to some extent, to man, and given him dominion over the fish of the sea, and over the fowls of the air, and over every living thing that creepeth upon the earth." But his creative power is uncommunicated, and perhaps incommunicable. But relieving the Senator from any verbal criticisms, and even granting him his premises, namely, that Congress, under the Constitution, has power to regulate commerce, and, under the seventeenth clause of the eighth section of the first article, to furnish such medium of commerce as may be necessary for its regulation, his conclusion will not follow; for the necessity does not exist, upon which his superstructure rests; and, of course, that superstructure must fall to the ground. The best medium on earth for commerce is already provided, and there is no necessity for another. But if this matter could be reduced to a mere question of commercial expediency, I deny that Congress ought to connect her fiscal affairs with the local banks. Who applies the scourge to the flying courser? And such would be the effect of Government continuing the stimulus of her deposites, and receipt of bank paper, with the local institutions. But I know it will be said she is invited to apply the rein, and not the scourge. Sir, this is a ruinous fallacy. It is, in fact, an invitation to place both the scourge and the rein in irresponsible hands, and with the power to use them with the wildest discretion, or, rather, without any discretion at all. And a scourge it would prove to the whole country. The Independent Treasury system proposes nothing more than to withdraw the stimulus which the Government has heretofore given to a system she has neither the right nor the power to control, and leave it to the action of those laws to which it is properly subject; laws founded on the eternal principles of truth and nature, and by which it will certainly, in the end, be properly guided. But the soundest principles of Government are at war with any connection with the paper system. Fluctuation is one of the most prominent characteristics of that system; in proof of which, if any is required, I will read an extract from the last April number of the Edinburgh Review, pages 33 and 34:

"There might, indeed, and most probably would be, commercial revulsions, and a fall of the exchange, even though the currency were wholly metallic, or fluctuated exactly as a metallic currency would do; but there is not the slightest reason for supposing that they would be either half so frequent or severe, as under the existing system. A mixed currency, or a currency of coin and paper, supplied like that of England, is exposed to fluctuations in its amount, and capacity of transacting business, ten times greater than any that could attach to a purely metallic currency, or to a mixed currency fluctuating according to the demand for bullion. If the currency consisted wholly of gold, of if no additional supplies of paper could be obtained except upon the deposite of an equivalent amount of gold, no general rise of prices could take place, except when there was an influx of the precious metals; and these, as every one knows, cannot be accumulated in any one country to a much more considerable degree than in others. But when individuals or associations are allowed to issue notes, or paper fitted to serve all the purposes of money, not upon a deposite of bullion, but merely upon their receiving a promise to repay it with interest at some future period, a new and most powerful element of variation is brought into the field."

Mr. Locke, one of the most profound writers in the English language, has said: "It is the interest of every country that the standard of its money, once settled, should inviolably and immutably be kept to perpetuity; for whenever that is altered, from what pretence soever, the public will lose by it. Men, in their bargains, contract not for denominations or sounds, but for intrinsic value." I know that Mr. Locke is here speaking of an alteration by the arbitrary action of the Government. But the consequences of alteration will follow as certainly, by whatever power it may be brought about. But if the Government adopts the paper system, the principle of fluctuation will be incorporated in the money of the country by the Government itself, and the alteration of its standard will be the act of the Government. One of the most serious evils of this fluctuation is the sudden change it produces in the condition of men. The paper system, in addition to its tendency to fluctuation, increases this latter evil also by the encouragement it gives to speculation, and by the joint operation of these two causes men are continually rising suddenly from poverty to wealth, and sinking from wealth to poverty. Mutability is one of the worst features in human destiny, and is always reckoned among the chief ills of life. Men become accustomed to any state or condition, and fitted to avail themselves of its enjoyments, whatever they may be, and to bear the ills attendant upon it. A gradual improvement of a man's condition is healthful both to the soul and body, and a gradual deterioration may be borne with philosophical composure, and without any very perceptible loss of comfort. But any sudden revulsion either way is attended always with many painful incidents. Even where the change, humanly speaking, is for the better, it is seldom attended with real happiness. The heir of poverty, who is suddenly advanced in fortune, has rarely any of those qualifications which fit him for its enjoyment. He is removed from the circles and associations which were wont to engage his affections, and thrown into others with which his heart knows no sympathy. But who can paint the misery of him who, reared to better hopes, has lived under sunny skies and amid bright prospects, and suddenly finds himself overwhelmed with pecuniary ruin? Time will not allow us to follow out this fruitful and affecting theme.

But another great evil of the paper system is, that it causes the producers of the country to sell at specie prices, and buy at paper prices, or in other words to buy at prices, regulated by an inflated currency, and sell at those which are regulated by a stable currency. Gentlemen affect not to see the force of this argument, and ask whether the planters do sell their produce in one country, and buy their articles of consumption in another? I answer yes. The price of every article produced in this country, and which usually goes to a foreign market, is here regulated by the price in the foreign market. The paper currency of a country does not form a portion of that great ocean to which I had reference in a former part of my remarks; but is, as it were, an isolated lake which has no outlet by which it may mingle itself with those vast waters. You may pour into it until it will overflow and inundate the country in which it is situate, and thus involve it in ruin; but it leaves the great ocean without unaffected by its swell. It raises prices at home but affects them not in other markets. However abundant, therefore, money so called may be at home, the exporter can afford to give the farmer no more than the price in the foreign market will warrant, leaving him his reasonable expenses and profit besides. But it is not so with the articles he imports; when he gets them here they at once feel the influence of the swollen circulation, and bring correspondent prices, and at those prices the consumer must purchase. But it will be said that England, the principal country with whom we trade, is a paper country, and therefore we lose nothing by our paper system in our intercourse with her. Sir, a man loses all by any circumstance, that, but for that circumstance, he would have made. Although England is a paper country, yet, if we were exclusively a metallic country, we should make more by our intercourse with her. And why should we, because she chooses to maim herself by her paper system, follow her example? The whole business of life is a struggle between nations and individuals for their respective portions of the goods of fortune; and why should any wise man, who is embarking in any strife, disable himself because his adversary has had the folly to do so. I am certain, sir, that to do justice to this argument it should be more elaborate, but I must leave it with the few hints I have thrown out, which I trust will be understood by any intelligent mind. And yet the paper system is applauded to the skies, as the wing upon which England has soared to her present prosperous height. Sir, England has thriven in spite of her paper system, and not by reason of it; and the same answer applies to the panegyrics which has been poured forth upon the wonders attributed to the banks in this country. They have, it is said, caused the wilderness to blossom, built up towns in the desert, opened our lands, constructed our railroads, and caused the steam-moved palaces to float upon our waters. If this were so, they would indeed deserve our gratitude and praise; but I have thought, and still think, that we owe all these things to the enterprise and industry of our citizens, and the abundant resources with which it has pleased Heaven to bless our country. Through them all these wonders have been accomplished, and the banks supported besides. Such has been the vigor of the patient's constitution, that he has supplied nutriment to this vast wen, and borne its enormous growth, and furnished support, at the same time, to all the functions of life, and his own natural increase.

And this brings me to the consideration of another evil of the paper system, and that is, its tendency to call men off from the most productive employments to those which are less so, or not so at all; drawing them off from the cultivation of the soil to become speculators, bank officers, shopkeepers, and livers upon their wits. All values are created by the spontaneous production of the earth, by human labor, by animal procreation, or by some or all of these united. The spontaneous production of the earth is, of course, the most profitable to him who can avail himself of it of any other; and the production of the earth, combined with human labor, furnishes at last the basis of all wealth. Human labor may, after the production by the earth is completed, put into more advantageous forms, and in more advantageous places, what has been produced; but to the earth we must go back for the origin of all wealth. Wealth to a nation is happiness; that is to say, the more aggregate wealth a nation possesses, provided it be sufficiently distributed, the more people does it place in possession of the means of procuring the essentials of happiness. The larger portion of a nation's population engaged in the production of values, and the more advantageously engaged, the better for that nation. Labor applied to bringing into action the productive powers of the earth, is, as a general rule, the most advantageous mode of producing values. Every thing, therefore, which has a tendency to divert any considerable portion of a nation from agricultural pursuits, by turning them to speculation, professions, merchandise, or even to manufactures, where that nation possesses a suitable field for agricultural pursuits, has, as a general rule, the effect of diminishing the wealth of that nation. But I can pursue this topic no further. I conclude that Congress has not the right, and if it had, it would not be expedient for it to undertake the creation and regulation of a common paper medium through banks. But if it possessed such right, and such obligation rested upon it, the substitute proposed by the Senator from Virginia provides no such medium, the currency it would foster would be, after all, but local in its character, and with all the disadvantages, would possess few of the advantages of a common paper medium.

Having finished what I had to say upon other branches of this subject, I now propose to treat it, in the last place, as a mere political question. This, after all, is by far the most interesting and important light in which it presents itself. Two great political parties have been striving for mastery in this nation ever since its existence began, and probably will continue to strive as long as its present institutions remain. Indeed, the strife may be said to have begun before the nation had an existence, and to have been waged in giving form and character to that existence. The party to which I belong holds, and ever has held, the capacity of man for self-government; that Providence has bestowed on each individual certain natural gifts and advantages, which he has a right to use without molestation or restraint, so long as he forbears to use them in infringing upon similar rights in others. But that owing to a corrupt propensity in our race to infringe the rights of others, Government is necessary, and to support Government taxation is necessary; but that no more government should be exercised than is required for the purpose for which alone it was instituted, and no more taxation resorted to than is necessary for its support, and that it is a gross abuse of Government to take from one man any of his natural or providential rights and advantages, and bestow them on another. That Government is at best but a necessary evil, or, in the beautiful language of Thomas Paine, "Government, like dress, is the badge of lost innocence; and the palaces of kings were founded upon the ruins of the bowers of Paradise." That this necessary evil was designed for the benefit of the many, and not of the few, and that the greatest good of the greatest number should be the object as well of the philanthropist as of the honest and enlightened politician. That every new society of men has a right to choose its own form of Government, and to change it afterwards, with the concurrence of a majority of the parties to the original compact. That the best form of Government, upon the whole, is that under which we at present live, reduced as it was by its wise founders to a solemn written compact, which no man has a right to change or modify peaceably and insidiously by construction, or openly and violently, without incurring great political guilt and just condemnation. We believe in the existence of virtue and patriotism, and hold them to be the only proper bases of political action; and that every thing tending to place political action upon any other basis, is dangerous to liberty and subversive of our institutions. History informs us that much the opposite of all this was held by the other party; that the present Constitution was very far from being such as they would have had it; that it was too Democratic in its nature, and distributed power too equally among all classes of the people, the bulk of whom they believed unfit either to govern themselves, or to participate in the government of others. But they agreed to accept it upon the whole, believing that, by construction, many deficiencies might be supplied, and that vigor in which it was eminently wanting might be imparted. We learn, from high authority, that the Constitution was scarcely put in operation, before the principle of construction was applied, and that those who were most active in its application avowedly held the doctrine that a monarchy was the best Government on earth, and, with Sir Robert Walpole, that a man's patriotism was to be sought for in his pocket.

"But Hamilton was not only a monarchist, but for a monarchy founded on corruption. In proof of this, I will relate an anecdote, for the truth, of which I attest the God who made me. Before the President set out on his Southern tour, in April, 1791, he addressed a letter of the fourth of that month, from Mount Vernon to the Secretaries of State, Treasury, and War, desiring, that if any serious and important cases should arise during his absence, they would consult and act upon them. And he requested that the Vice President should also be consulted. This was the only occasion on which that officer was ever requested to take part in a cabinet question. Some occasion for consultation arising, I invited those gentlemen to dine with me, in order to confer on the subject. After the cloth was removed, and our question agreed and dismissed, conversation began on other matters, and by some circumstance was led to the British Constitution, on which Mr. Adams observed "purge that Constitution of its corruption, and give to its popular branch equality of representation, and it would be the most perfect constitution ever devised by the wit of man." Hamilton paused, and said, "purge it of its corruption, and give to its popular branch equality of representation, and it would become an impracticable Government: as it stands at present, with all its supposed defects, it is the most perfect Government which ever existed."—Jefferson's Memoirs, page 450.

The leader of this party was a splendid man, whose talents I admire, and the integrity of whose purposes I do not mean to question; but his notions on government were, I believe, as erroneous as those of Tycho Brahe in philosophy. The first fruits of these principles were the funding system and United States Bank, with respect to which Mr. Pitt, looking to their consequences with the eagle eye of a profound statesman, declared, that if the Americans embarked in them, he would give but little for their liberties. The nature and operation of these measures will be found explained in Mr Jefferson's Works, vol. 4, pp. 446—449.

"Hamilton's financial system had then passed. It had two objects; first, as a puzzle to exclude popular understanding and inquiry; and second, as a machine for the corruption of the legislature: for he avowed the opinion that man could be governed by one of two motives only, force or interest; force, he observed in this country was out of the question, and the interest therefore of the members must be laid hold of, to keep the legislature in unison with the Executive. And with grief and shame it must be acknowledged that his machine was not without effect; that even in this the birth of our Government, some members were found sordid enough to bend their duty to their interests, and look after personal rather than public good."—Jefferson's Memoirs, page 446, vol. 4th.

"I know very well, and so must be understood, that nothing like a majority in Congress had yielded to this corruption. Far from it. But a division not very unequal had already taken place in the honest part of that body, between the parties styled Republican and Federal. The latter being monarchists in principle, adhered to Hamilton, of course, as their leader in that principle, and this mercenary phalanx added to them insured him always a majority in both Houses; so that the whole action of the legislature was now under the direction of the Treasury. Still the machine was not complete. The effect of the funding system, and of the assumption, would be temporary; it would be lost with the loss of the individual members whom it had enriched, and some engine of influence more permanent must be contrived, while those myrmidons were yet in place to carry it through all opposition. This engine was the Bank of the United States."—Page 449.

The bank was chartered; and, according to the decision of the times, which as yet stands unreversed, and perhaps ever will, (whether properly or not, this is no time or place to discuss,) the charter could not be revoked, but must run out the period for which it had been granted, whether for weal or woe to the country. Its effects were counteracted as far as possible by Mr. Jefferson, at the head of a Spartan phalanx, which continually gathered strength; still, when it became fairly united with an administration strictly Federal, it made rapid encroachments upon the Constitution. But a bold stride of power, conscious of having at its command something more efficient than a sceptre to subdue the wills of men, was manifested in the passage of the alien and sedition law. This rash and premature measure served to open the eyes of men ere it was too late, and the grasping Administration was hurled from its place. This separation of the Administration and the moneyed power served for a time to save popular rights, and preserve the Constitution. In 1811, the charter of the bank expired, and upon the question of its renewal, the whole force of the Democracy was arrayed against it, and with triumphant success. Some noble efforts were made against it on the floors of Congress, and some, I am sorry to say, who then won in the cause of Democracy the greenest laurels that will ever bloom above their graves, have since changed their opinions, and become the advocates of a National Bank. They are still men of high intellectual power, and time cannot have abated their vigor. But how different are their efforts from what they then were? They still strike with power, but they beat only the air. The ground which they occupy does not afford scope for the exertion of their might. Upon this subject Sampson is shorn of his glorious locks, and shakes himself in vain, as at other times.

I now come to a portion of my country's history, from which I would turn aside with shame; but the story must be told. A war of glory had been fought; the Federal party had opposed its beginning, and during its continuance fasted for the victories of their country, and rejoiced over those of the enemy. But the war ended as it had begun, in the honor of the nation. But war is expensive, and the Administration found itself involved in debt and taxation, and the local banks had stopped payment, and the Opposition began to wag their heads, and point the finger in derision, and cry "There! there! So would we have it." The pride of the Administration was stung, and another instance was furnished of the frailty of man in his best estate; and in a desperate effort to retrieve its pecuniary affairs, a United States Bank was proposed and chartered, against the opposition of the Federalists, consistent only in opposition. Such I believe to be the true secret of the charter of the second Bank of the United States. Others more familiar with the political secrets of the day may account for it upon some other principle, but such I believe, and always have believed, was the true nature of the transaction. But the bank was chartered, and some apology must be made for this barefaced inconsistency of the Republican party, and an apology, the strangest that ever could have entered into the conception of one who set any value upon a written Constitution, was offered. It had been once decided, it was said, by all the departments of the Government, that a bank was constitutional, and therefore it was settled. Strange that the very warmest opponents of construction should thus have established it in the very heart of the Constitution, and made what was intended to be stable as the hills, and inflexible as iron, as fugitive as stubble, and as supple as a hazle wand. That what was intended to encompass the powers of the Government, and hedge them in with walls of brass, so that they should not encroach upon the rights of the States, should be rendered submissive to the ever encroaching spirit of that very Government, securing to it the undisputed right to every foot of ground it gains in its advances. If the bank was ever unconstitutional, it was so then, and must continue so until that Consitution is altered by the only means which has been provided. But the bank was chartered, and soon began to show forth its natural fruits. A high tariff for the protection of manufactures, a process by which the Government is enriched, and the nation impoverished, and which in the particular instance was well nigh rending asunder this noble confederacy, and polluting its sacred soil with the minged blood of kinsmen meeting in hostile array. Splendid schemes of internal improvement by the General Government, by which local bargains and legislative log-rolling, acting like gold upon the Roman legions, decided who should be elevated to power, and who degraded: while the people are reasoned with through their sufferings, as to the mode in which they shall exercise their sovereign prerogative of election.

For the greater portion of the existence of the late United States Bank, its mischievous tendency was very much restrained by the want of concert between the administrators of the Government and the administrators of the bank, but notwithstanding the resistance which it thus met with, it imperceptibly drew arter a Democratic administration into the path along which it naturally led. It was only during the one term of the younger Adams that an Executive, on whose co-operation it might calculate, was in power, but, fortunately for his country, so impracticable was he in his disposition, that the finest plot ever formed would be marred if at all dependant for success upon his co-operation.

I come now to the two terms of his revered successor. He found upon coming into power high tariff, internal improvement, and other Federal abominations, in full possession of the Capitol, introduced by the United States Bank, like another Trojan horse concealed within her dark and capacious bosom.

Penitusque cavernas
Ingentes uterumque armato milite complent.

He was not only a brave man, but a wise one. His was that true heroism which combines the most undaunted bravery with the most consummate prudence. He knew well that it would not be safe to make an open and direct attack upon these formidable and combined interests, but by the most ingenious and refined strokes of policy, he dealt first one, and then another, some disabling blow, until he was so fortunate as to hand them all over to the American people, bound hand and foot, to be dealt with by them according to their pleasure. This it was which provoked against him the hatred of the Opposition; this was the very head and front of his offending. He had cast their idols to the moles and the bats, and cleansed the temple of liberty of their polluting presence. For this, they have pursued him with most unrelenting vengeance long before his Presidential term had closed, and even now, when he has retired, like another Cincinnatus, to his own peaceful Hermitage, the hoarse baying of their ban-dogs breaks in upon the stillness of that magic circle. I will not anticipate the time, now so near at hand, when he will share the repose of her who shared with him in life the calumnies of the world. When his shall be the only apothehsis known to the Christian. When his name shall be nothing but a watchword to wake up the recollection of noble deeds. When his tomb shall be a sacred spot, whither each western traveller will turn aside from his path; a shrine where valor and patriotism will rekindle their fires, and Beauty and Purity offer the pearl of gratitude to their gallant defender.

But efforts are making to re-establish in their ancient niches those tutelary deities of the Federal party which he hath cast down, and efforts will continue to be made until success shall attend them or even hope becomes desperate. We have heard some description upon this floor of the machinery employed: we have learned that the United States Bank, in the late application for a recharter, had dealings with members of Congress very similar to those described by Mr. Jefferson, in by-gone times—that the press ceaselessly poured forth its venom and threatenings upon the heads of those who dared to oppose its recharter, and that even the galleries of Congress were filled with the myrmidons of the bank, striving to overawe its deliberations. And shall we, with this experience, with all our experience, again create a tyrant to scourge us into submission? Shall we set up a golden calf to draw off the devotions of the people from principles consecrated by the blood of their sires? Shall we charter another United States Bank? But I shall be told the substitute does not propose the charter of a United States Bank. I know it does not in terms, but its effect will be to produce that or a similar result. The existence of an institution with powers much more vast than any heretofore enjoyed by a United States Bank, will follow its adoption, as certainly as the springing of the herbage upon the showers of April. Either the United States Bank, so called, at Philadelphia, will seize upon the public treasure, and thus accomplish the consolidation of the money power, with a capacity for wielding it heretofore unknown, or the honest Federalists and the timid Democrats, alarmed at its power, will, upon the principle of setting back fire in a prairie to check the wide spread ruin with which that raging element is already threatening them, unite in the charter of a United States Bank as the desperate but only remaining remedy. See what power that institution possesses even now. The other banks stand by, like trembling slaves, obedient to its nod, and stop or resume the payment of specie, as it commands. What will be its power, if the substitute is adopted, and it possesses itself, as it must do, of the public deposites? Whom it will it will set up, and whom it will, destroy. Whichever of the alternatives before stated is adopted, the chains will be forged which will bind the wills of the American people in fetters stronger than iron. And when so bound, whither will they be led? First, to bow down at the feet of an aristocracy, and from thence at the footstool of a king; for the chrysalis does not more certainly become a butterfly, than Government proceeds from one gradation to another, until all power centres in one man, if there is no provision made for resisting that tendency. Our Constitution presents that resistance, while it remains in its primary vigor, but if sapped by the corrupting influence of money, our security is lost. The Senator from Kentucky, [Mr. CLAY,] with a candor which does him credit, admits the corrupting influence of money, and especially when that influence is thrown abroad from one great centre. But we are not limited to the Senate for proof of this corrupting influence. The sacred scriptures declare money to be the root of all evil. With the ancient pagans Plutus was ranked among the infernal gods. He was not deemed worthy to take his seat in the celestial throng: his propensities were considered low and grovelling: he was of the earth—earthy. And of the tendency of consolidated wealth in a bank to affect materially the political action of a nation, and especially when that bank is its fiscal agent, we have testimony ab hoste. A writer in the Edinburgh Review, No. 1, p. 196, himself evidently a friend of the paper system, says as follows:

"If the Bank of England must now be considered as a national establishment, not merely influencing, by the superior magnitude of its capital, the state of commercial circulation, but guiding its movements according to views of public policy, an important revolution has taken place since the first creation of that corporation as a banking establishment. That power of issuing the medium of exchange, with the opportunities it implies of varying its quantity and value, which, while precious coin was in use, was exercised under the immediate prerogative of the Crown, is now virtually vested in the governor and directors of the Bank of England. In the official character of that board, some of the functions of sovereignty are united to those of a trader; and the opportunities of banking profits are blended with a trust and charge of the public interest. It will be pleasing if these shall prove more happily compatible than they have been found in other instances. The organization of this establishment, possessed of such means to control the operations of commerce, as well as to facilitate the advance of financial supplies, may, into our political constitution, already so complicated, introduce a new principle of action, the effect of which cannot be easily discerned

"Perhaps an unbounded field will be opened for the extension of ministerial influence. Perhaps an unexpected control may be gained to the people over the views and measures of the Executive."

If such is to be the effect in England, where a strong Executive exists like a balance-wheel, to keep steady the action of the Government, such as it is, what must be the effect with us, where the political action is from below, from the great mass of the people, upon whom this pestilential influence may be brought to act in the most subtle and imperceptible manner? I wish I could say of this Republic as Louis of France did of his monarchy: "The monarchy is very old, but it will last my time." This Republic is but fifty years of age, but if something is not done to arrest the corrupting influences abroad among the people, it will sink into ruin before, in the common course of nature, those who now fill these halls are gathered to their fathers. There was a time when the American people despised appeals made to their pockets, but now they have learned to listen. Already are we reproached in Europe as a nation of merchants, whose sordid souls are always in the market; and the same venerable man to whom I referred in a former part of my address, remarked to me, with honest indignation in his countenance, that he never doubted the stability of our institutions until he found so large a portion of our people calculating the value of exchanges. Nothing marks so strongly the decline of that vigorous virtue which makes a nation, as when the barter begins of principle for gold, as when men and measures commend themselves to the public favor by the luxurious splendor with which they are invested. How fallen was Athens from its Democratic purity and provincial bravery when the talented and accomplished but corrupt Pericles scattered abroad the public treasure in buying up the hearts of the people. He threw around them the magic chain of pleasure, dazzled them with magnificent public works, instituted expensive games, pampered their appetites, and steeped them in sensual enjoyments. Nor were the fine arts neglected; every thing, in short, was done, and that at the public expense, for fitting them to throw themselves, as they did in two or three generations afterwards, at the feet of Philip. Look to the Roman Republic. When Fabricius despised the gold of Pyrrhus, "Rome," it was said, "seemed like one great temple, and the Senate like an assembly of many kings." What a different picture did it present when even the treacherous Jugurtha, disgusted with its cupidity, declared that the whole people but waited for a purchaser. There was a time when three poor American youths, (I allude to the captors of Major Andre,) turned a deaf ear to every appeal made to their interest or their ambition, when the welfare or honor of their country was at stake. But that time I fear is passing away. Brennus, the hardy Gaul, has been alluded to in this debate, who, when the Roman quæstor was weighing out the gold which was to purchase immunity from his ravages, threw his sword into the scale with a væ victis—woe to the conquered. But when the American citizen is balancing in the scales of reason some great public measure, the bank director shows him his note with a frown, and a woe to the refractory. The heart of the unfortunate man quails, his brain reels, his hand trembles, and that scale preponderates into which his imperious master thinks proper to cast his paper. Oh, that some modern Camillus would come with the American legions, and drive these Gauls not only from the Capitol, but from the country, for if their inroads are continued, we shall finally be reduced to a bondage even worse than Gallic.

Sir, I have little hope that the paper system will be soon arrested. Standing here, I have no right to propose or advocate any measure for the accomplishment of that object. I can only vote for the withdrawal of that encouragement, that stimulus, which the Government has heretofore afforded it; and that it is my desire and my purpose to do, and nothing more. But the tendency of the paper system is onward. Look to the Birmingham memorial once more, and there you find that people praying for the repeal of Mr. Peel's bill compelling the Bank of England to pay specie. Like the drunkard, they cry out for more of that stimulus under whose sickening effects they are now laboring. Once more let us turn to the Edinburgh Review for testimony concerning its effects upon the mercantile classes:

"The radical defect, in fact, in the constitution of the bank, consists in its participating too much in the feelings and views of the mercantile class. It is managed by merchants, and we need not wonder that it should sympathize with them. It may, however, be inferred, with almost unerring certainty, that the bank is acting on erroneous principles when its conduct is warmly approved by the merchants, and conversely. Whenever the city articles of the metropolitan papers teem with eulogies on the conduct of the bank, we may be quite certain that mischief is abroad. A merchant is anxious to get bills readily discounted at a low rate of interest, and his good or bad opinion of the bank directors depends, in nine cases out of ten, on their readiness to negotiate the paper he lays before them."

Witness its effects even upon this floor. The Senator from Kentucky [Mr. CLAY] insists that even now the notes of the banks ought to be taken by the Government, in the face of their refusal to pay specie. The principle of convertibility, upon which only bank paper was ever tolerated, is now abandoned, and every thing must be treated as money which assumes the form of a bank note. Such is the tendency of the system. The people have tasted of the cup of Circe, and their noble natures are changing, and will, I fear, continue to change, unless some modern Mercury shall come with the herb Moly, or some other antidote, to the arts of the enchantress. There is one hope, and that is, if pressed much further, the system must explode of itself; it cannot hold out here as it has done in England. There have been many circumstances to sustain it there, which exist not here, and will probably never exist. When England commenced with her paper system, she commanded the trade of the world. Soon the Indies opened to her their treasures, and a vast mine they have proved, their golden strands sparkled with wealth in every form, and the British armies had only to fight a battle, and then gather gold from among the gore as a boy would pick up pebbles on the beach. In one year, Mr. McCulloch informs us, £15,000,000 or $75,000,000 were returned from India. Here was ballast enough for a vast paper system. Besides all this, her exchequer bills and her national debt, by the magic operation of confidence, have been converted into substantial capital. No one believes that the national debt of England will ever be paid; but its interest will, and it is eagerly sought after as an investment for capital; and a father bequeaths it to his son, as conscious of having enriched him as if he had left him the proprietor of so much land. But in this country the paper system has none of these supports, and, if pushed much farther, it must explode, and perhaps in time to save the country.

But whether it does or not, I wish to detach it as much as possible from our national existence. Its swiftly moving car may roll on; but let it not drag after it every thing dear to the earthly hopes of man. Let the inflated balloon ascend if it will; but let it not, in its ascent, wrench from their foundations the institutions of our country. While they remain within their sacred enclosure, the seeds of public virtue will sprout and vegetate. Planted on their firm battlements, the flag of freedom will yet soar aloft, and attract the admiring gaze of nations. Protected by their time-honored walls, the tree of liberty will spread forth its branches, inviting all who choose to come and repose beneath its shade. But if the parasite vine of the paper system is allowed to twine about it, it will wither and decay. If it is suffered to insinuate itself among the crevices of our institutions, it will gradually force out the cement which holds them together.

Mr. President, with the utmost respect for those who think otherwise, the tendency of the constructive spirit towards monarchy, is, in my humble judgment, as absolute as that of the streams of the earth towards their ocean home. This measure is proposed in resistance of that spirit, and if it fails, I pray Heaven to avert the consequences of that failure. That the gloomy visions which crowd upon my soul may prove to be such stuff as dreams are made of. But, if on the contrary, I find them to be the terrible shadows which more terrible realities have cast before them, in their advent, I shall have the poor consolation of having, as one of those placed by the people upon the watchtower, warned them of their approach. In performance of that duty, I appeal to the spirits of the mighty dead who have perished on our country's war fields to rise in vindication of the principles for which they fell in glorious martyrdom. I cry to the millions of American freemen in defence of the charter sealed to them by the blood of their ancestors. To their representatives assembled in the other extremity of this Capitol. And to you the patres conscripti of this great Republic. But if, all these appeals having been made in vain, I shall yet live to see the ruined institutions of my country, nothing will remain to me but in bitterness of soul to exclaim with Cæsar, as he walked among the festering corpses of his countrymen, who fell in that last fatal battle which completed the overthrow of Roman liberty, "They would have it so."

THE INDEPENDENT TREASURY BILL.

SPEECH OF MR. SMITH,

OF CONNECTICUT.

In Senate, February 14, 1838—Upon the bill "to impose additional duties as depositaries, upon certain public officers, to appoint Receivers General of public money, and to regulate the safe-keeping, transfer, and disbursement of the public moneys of the United States."

Mr. SMITH of Connecticut said, that the course pursued by those who were opposed to the bill under consideration, in execrating and denouncing it in unmeasured terms, before it had been discussed, and even before it had been presented for discussion, induced him to believe that they were conscious they could not sustain themselves by a fair investigation of the subject, and by argument, in the position they had taken in relation to the measure; or that they held in utter contempt the capacity and understanding of the people, who were, in his estimation, fully competent to judge correctly of all public measures affecting their rights and interest, and so well and so correctly had all the great disturbing and important questions affecting the Government, and the interest of the people, by which they had been agitated more or less, ever since the formation of the Government, that no one need to doubt the correctness of their decision in this case; and on whose decision alone, the measure is finally to depend. The people of the United States were early divided in opinion, as to the form of Government which would be most likely to secure to them, their persons, property, and personal rights, and the greatest degree of happiness; which is a natural consequence of a free Government; and they have been, and still are also divided in opinion, as to the administration of the Government; and it is reasonable to suppose that such divisions will always exist, while the people are left free to discuss all such questions as affect their several rights; and though many abuses grow out of the privilege of a full and free discussion, yet without it, the rights of the citizens would be so curtailed as hardly to be worth preserving.

Mr. S. said he would ask the indulgence of the Senate to read some extracts from letters written by Mr. Jefferson, and by Colonel Hamilton, to General Washington, upon the subject of our Government then in its infancy, which were both written on the same day, the 9th of September, 1792, in which their views were expressed in relation to the form of Government, in their opinion, the best calculate to promote the general interest of the people of the United States. Those two eminent statesmen were, at that early period of our Government, arrayed against each other, each deveoping the principles of his favorite Government, and each endeavoring to impress upon the American people the advantages they would derive from the Government he was proposing for their adoption. Extract from Mr. Jefferson's letter. "No man in the United States, I suppose approved of every tittle in the Constitution; no one, I believe, approved more of it than I did; and more of it was certainly disapproved of by my accuser than by me, and of its parts most vitally republican. Of this the few letters I wrote on the subject, (not half a dozen I believe,) will be a proof; and for my own satisfaction, and justification, I must tax you with the reading of them when I return to where they are. You will then see that my objection to the Constitution was, that it wanted a bill of rights, securing freedom of religion, freedom of the press, freedom from standing armies, trial by jury, and a constant habeas corpus act. Colonel Hamilton's was, that it wanted a King and a House of Lords. The sense of America has approved my objection, and added the bill of rights, not the King and Lords. I also thought a longer term of service, insusceptible of renewal, would have made a President more independent. My country has thought otherwise, and I have acquiesced implicitly. He wished the General Government should have power to make laws binding the States in all cases whatsoever. Our country has thought otherwise. Has he acquiesced? My whole correspondence while in France, and every word, letter, and act on the subject, since my return, prove that no man is more ardently intent to see the public debt soon and sacredly paid off than I am. This mostly makes the difference between Colonel Hamilton's views and mine: that I would wish the debt paid to morrow; he wishes it never to be paid, but always to be a thing wherewith to corrupt and manage the Legislature."

Extract from Colonel Hamilton's letter: "But when I no longer doubt that there was a formed party, deliberately bent upon the subversion of measures which, in its consequences, would subvert the Government; when I saw that the undoing of the funding system in particular, (which, whatever may be the original merits of that system, would prostrate the credit and the honor of the nation, and bring the Government into contempt with those descriptions of men, who are in every society the only firm supporters of Government,) was an avowed object of the party; and that all possible pains were taking to produce that effect, by rendering it odious to the body of the people, I considered it as a duty to endeaver to resist the torrent; and, as an effectual means to this end, to draw aside the veil from the principal actors. To this strong impulse, to this decided conviction, I have yielded. And I think events will prove that I have judged rightly."

Mr. S. said it was in the principles of these two able statesmen, that the political parties of this day may look for their origin. The Federal party followed Colonel Hamilton, and embraced his political principles, and the Democratic party followed Mr. Jefferson, and embraced his political principles. Mr. S. said it was in this funding system, invented by Colonel Hamilton as a part of the machinery he had designed for the operation of the Government, that the first United States Bank had its origin; and in which many of that class of men (the wealthy,) designated by Colonel Hamilton as being "the only firm supporters of Government," laid the foundation of princely fortunes, by purchasing up the securities, at two shillings and sixpence in the pound, of the soldiers who had sacrificed their property, and worn themselves out in the service of their country, and by whose labor, toil, and sacrifices, the independence of our country had been achieved. Mr. S. said that the political principles of each of the two great contending parties had been fully developed, and were now well understood by the people, and certain known landmarks had been established and defined, by which the course of either party may be determined by all whose interest may be affected in the administration of the Government; and one very important one was in the construction of the Constitution. The Democratic party were for giving it a rigid and strict construction, while the Federal party were for giving it a loose and latitudinous construction. Mr. S. said that the liberty which the Federal party had taken in construing the Constitution, and paramount law of our country, to suit their own principles, had entirely changed the character and power of our Government; it was in this fruitful source of construction that the United States Bank, internal improvements, high tariff, and vested rights in corporations, had their origin, none of which would ever have come into existence under the construction put upon the Constitution by the Democratic party. Another important subject about which the parties materially differed, was the State banking system; the Democratic party being for diminishing the number of banks, and increasing their restrictions; and the Federal party being for increasing the number, and diminishing their restrictions. Another was, on a gold circulation; the Democratic party being for it, and the Federal party against it. Another was, on the increase of the specie circulation; the Democratic party being for it, and the Federal party being against it. Another was, on the resumption of specie payments by the banks; the Democratic party were for it, and the Federal party against it. Mr. S. said he thought the great body of the people of the United States must be as blind, stupid, and ignorant as the Federal party had always affected to consider them, if they were not able by this time to discover their transcendent virtue, superior intellect and attainments, and noble mien, if they really possessed them; for they had declared on all occasions, in private and in public, and at all times for more than forty years, certainly not from any unkind sentiment which they entertained towards the people, but purely with a view to impress upon them the important fact that they were wholly incapable of taking care of themselves, and that, unless they submitted themselves to their care and control, they would certainly be ruined. So common are their claims of superiority to be found in newspapers, that hardly one can be taken up without being greeted with one; one of which I have taken from a Pennsylvania paper, recently made by Judge Hopkinson in the State Convention, and which I will ask the indulgence of the Senate to read:

"Much had been said concerning the Federal party, but it was the intelligence of that party which formed the Government and which understood the Government; and his opinion was, that the Government never can be administered on any other principles than the Federal principles of Washington's administration. In times of trouble the intelligence of the prostrate Federal party has been called into action, and more than once has saved the country. When the torch of civil war was almost lighted in the South, that prostrate party stepped forward, and, by their intelligence, prevented the effusion of blood. Notwithstanding all the calumnies that have been uttered against the Federal party, yet they are always at their post in the hour of danger. Their principles are always invoked to rescue that country from difficulties when it is plunged therein by the rashness of their opponents. Thus, in times of difficulty they triumph, and they are now again coming into power! I see [said he] some honest faces present, who are not ashamed to own themselves Federalists."

Mr. S. said that we may come to a right result in endeavoring to weigh and duly to appreciate the unrestrained denunciations of the opponents of the bill, for arguments seem not to be brought into requisition, and to put a just estimate upon the predictions and prophecies so lavishly and profusely bestowed in regard to the measure, and that some aid may be derived by instituting a comparison between their professions of love for the people and their continual predictions of disastrous results, indiscriminately, of all the measures of the Democratic party for so many years, while the administration of the Government has devolved upon it, and their acts while in power, and the actual results of the Democratic administration of the Government for nearly forty years; and with that view he would take a retrospective glance at their proceedings, commencing with the first prominent acts of the elder Adams, who administered the Government in perfect accordance with the professed principles and notions of the Federal party; and their anxiety for the welfare of the people at that time was as strongly marked, and as clearly manifested, in their unqualified asseverations of love for them as now. One of the first important acts was to raise a standing army; and what was this for? Had we any war that the army was necessary for the defence of the nation? None: it was to prevent the people they so dearly loved from destroying and ruining one another, who, in their estimation, were their own worst enemies, and were not only incapable of taking care of themselves, but would destroy each other without a strong guard to protect them. The expenses of a large army the people were obliged to pay from their daily earnings, and, for that purpose, almost every article of property they possessed was taxed, and, with the rest, the collectors' fees were to be paid, consuming, with the ordinary expenses of a family, all that a laboring man could earn; and of the necessity for this, the people were not permitted to judge, because the affairs of the Government were beyond their comprehension. Another, and one of the most odious acts passed while the Federalists were in power, was the Sedition law, enacted to guard their public functionaries against the attack of the people, who were too exalted and sacred to be approached by the vulgar people with such frightful "huge paws." The people supposed those who ministered the Government were their agents, and ought to be accountable to them for their public acts, and that they ought to be permitted, under a Government, for the establishment of which they had left their homes, and all that was dear to them, and fought their enemies, internal and external, and had sacrificed their property and spilt their blood, to examine and scrutinize their conduct as public officers, with that freedom that belongs to freemen and citizens of a Republican Government; but here, again, the same party showed to the people their paternal care over them, by erecting a legal barrier between them and those in power, that they might administer the Government unmolestedly, and more beneficially for the people, according to their notions of the Divine right which they fancied they were favored with, to govern and rule them; and any one who dared to write or say any thing against the public officers, to prejudice or excite the people against them, were to be punished by a fine not exceeding two thousand dollars, and by imprisonment not exceeding two years. The term of Adams was on the wane, and the poor Democrats had been so showered with the blessings of his administration of the Government, that they began to look around to see if they could find some candidate for the next Presidency, under whose administration they might expect the Government to "shower its favors alike on the high and the low, the rich and the poor," and their choice fell upon Mr. Jefferson; and the Federalists, with more resolution, zeal, and activity than they had ever before manifested, came forward to the rescue of the people, who were going to be instantaneously devoured, body and soul, by such a monster. All their energies and skill were united in defence of the poor, ignorant, misguided, and abused people; they were actually frantic in their vituperation and denunciation of the infidel. The institution of marriage was to be profaned; the Christian religion was to be defiled; the Holy Bible was to be destroyed; the house of worship was to be razed; all social happiness was to be banished; and the whole land was to be stained with the polluted hand of an idolater and debauchee; and how grieved they were that the stupid and demented people could not be roused to a sense of their danger! when they had sacrificed so much, with no other motive than to save the people from destruction.

Disregarding alike the law of nations and of humanity, and rioting in their wonted rapacity, and feasting upon the sorrows of disconsolate wives and agonized friends, the bitter fruit of lawless impressment of our gallant seaman, the British were in the daily habit of boarding our merchant vessels at sea, and with brute force seizing upon the husband, the father, and the son, while in the lawful and peaceful service of the American merchants, sacrificing the happiness of the pleasant and comfortable fireside of their friends at home, to gain a sustenance for themselves and families, and dragging on board of their charnel houses, ships of war, where they were lacerated and beaten into submission, by the aid of the thong and cat-o-ninetails, and often expired under the tortures of the minions of a vaunted despot and his nobility, in their endeavors to tame the free, unfettered, and noble spirit of American seamen into the servility of a British subject; and such were the benefits to be derived from the dispensations of that paragon of a Government, so much the admiration of the Federalists, that they thought it not worth while to heed these trifling complaints and intrusions, and more especially, as it would only involve our nation in an expensive and unprofitable war with a magnanimous and honorable people, for the sake only of releasing a few renegade seamen from a service in which they could do quite as much good is if they were at home.

Yes, said Mr. S. these despised creatures, who afterwards won imperishable and unfading glory under the flag of the country, were not, in their estimation, worthy of consideration, and would have remained in bondage, to pine away and waste their lives in slavery on board of British ships, and been compelled to aid the enemies of their beloved country in their battles against it, had not the Democracy of the nation determined that no American citizen, however humble his condition, should be subjected to ignominy or oppression. Strong symptoms of an approaching war with Great Britain began to make their appearance, and to secure the property of the citizens from the grasp of the enemy, which seemed to excite the cupidity of the then mistress of the sea, a foretaste of which they already had, the embargo was laid upon the vessels at our wharves, and then the sympathies of the Federalists were again awakened to the interests of the merchants. They were going to be ruined, because they were not permitted to go to sea, until the Government could get prepared to protect them against the depredations and captures of an insidious enemy; and high-sounding notes of disaster and absolute ruin to the people were raised, because there would be no market for their surplus produce; and the people were warned to take care of themselves in season, by giving them the reins of Government, lest they should be ruined by such misrule and abuse of power, which the people had improvidently confided to the unworthy and blighting Democracy of the country. Notwithstanding the alarm and philanthropic interference of these guardians of the people these measures were meant to save them from their own destruction, and by a timely embargo, the result of wise and prudent counsels, the property was saved, and the people were not ruined.

At length war was declared against Great Britain, on which the air rang with their wailings, followed by their bitter execrations of such a detestable band of outlaws as the Democrats were, for bringing such a crisis upon the nation: nothing, they said, but disorganization, desolation and confusion, would mark the footsteps of the demagogues: the Government would be overthrown, and all would be prostrated and crushed beneath its ruins. The pious ministers of the Gospel seized the first opportunity, after war was declared, to send forth from the hallowed desk their denunciations of the measure in the most fervid and eloquent strains, and offering up their prayers for the miserable, besotted people, who were the victims of a venal and corrupt administration. Mr. S. said that the great interests and welfare of the people were at the bottom of their united efforts to awaken them to their forlorn condition in those days as well as these. He would ask the indulgence of the Senate, while he would read, as evidence of it, an extract or two from a discourse delivered by the Rev. David Osgood, D. D. pastor of the church in Medford, soon after the declaration of war: "One hope only remains, that this last stroke of perfidy may open the eyes of a besotted people, that they may awake, like a giant from his slumbers, and wreak their vengeance on their betrayers, by driving them from their stations, and placing at the helm more skilful and faithful hands." Another extract from the same discourse: "A civil war becomes as certain as the events that happen according to the known laws and established course of nature." This was one public discourse, said Mr. S. among thousands of others delivered by the clergy on the Lord's day at the eventful period, who seemed to consider it their duty to aid the Federal party in uprooting that greatest of all evils, the odious Democracy of our otherwise happy land. The newspapers groaned with their onerous vituperations, which they were bearing with great rapidity to the door of almost every man in the Republic. All was alarm, and all was consternation. And yet the good sense and intelligence of the people, so much overlooked and despised by their self-styled guardians, the Federalists, were manifested in their steady support of the administration of their choice of the Government. The war was closed with more honor and glory to our happy Republic, than the most sanguine friends of it could have anticipated. The honor of the nation was saved, and the most honorable rank assigned her among the nations of the earth; and "free trade and sailor's rights" established; and how did their vaunting opponents stand? Let the page of history answer! The transcendant talents, patriotism, and virtue of General Jackson, which had shone with such lustre during the war, had rendered him as popular with the Democracy as they had odious with the Federalists. He was selected and brought forward as a candidate for the Presidency by his Democratic friends. No man in the nation probably could have been selected who would have struck the Federalists with such dread. Their engines were again set to work to batter down the man whom the people had selected, and all out of regard for their happiness, considering them incapable of making a choice for themselves. He was represented as a perfect cannibal. Their subtle poison found its way to the peaceful fireside of the sage and patriot, and ere its ravages could be arrested, undermined and sapped the domestic happiness of the man who had saved his country from disgrace, and perhaps from ruin, and had won for it in the field imperishable laurels, and gained for himself the admiration of the world. He was elected by the people, notwithstanding the persecutions of the Federalists; and the invaluable benefits resulting from his administration are too deeply graven in the hearts of the American people to require delineation.

In 1832, the powerful and much cherished ally of the Federal party, the Bank of the United States, came before Congress for a renewal of its charter, and, by some means or other, received the sanction of both Houses, and was sent to President Jackson for his approval. The President disapproved the bill, and returned it to the Senate, in which it originated, with his reasons for his refusal to sign it; which were, that it was unconstitutional and inexpedient, and would be unjust to the people in its operation. Again the same party attacked the President with as much violence and ferocity as they ever had done; and the gigantic power which the party, with its ally, the bank, were capable of wielding, the people were made to feel in its full plenitude. The whole nation was thrown into convulsions, and the aggrandizement of the party, through the bank, was wholly lost sight of, in their extreme anxiety felt for the suffering people, who were to be deprived of both money and credit, if the bank could not be rechartered.

President Jackson became satisfied that the public funds were being used by the Bank of the United States to oppress and harass the people, who were the rightful owners of the moneys; and to secure the people against such abuses, he advised the removal of them from the United States Bank to other banks, and thereafter to deposite no more of the public moneys in the Bank of the United States; and such was the course pursued by the Secretary of the Treasury, who coincided with the President in the propriety of the measure; and although the removal of the public moneys from one bank to another did, nor could, not diminish the quantity, nor vary the rights of the bank—for the bank had no more right to the use of the money than any individual, nor as much, because every individual contributed something toward the public funds, while the bank contributed nothing—yet, from this simple and just act, the memorable panic of 1834 was raised, and the whole country was agitated and thrown into commotion. Ruinous was the measure to the Government and to individuals, was proclaimed by the Federal party; prostration and ruin to all business was confidently predicted would be the consequences; and so difficult was it for the people, even the best informed, to understand, without some time for investigation, the nature of the act, and so zealously, and vehemently, and perseveringly were their bodings, that the people were, for a time, disposed to pause, and to some extent give heed to them. But how has it eventuated? Just in that proportion as the interests of the great body of the people were advanced, the banks, speculators, and stock-jobbers, the vampires of the country, were depressed; and from them, and their agents only, the people, upon sober investigation of the subject, were enabled to determine, came this note of alarm.

The next important act in which the peculiar love for the people of the Federal party was manifested, was the impeachment of President Jackson in the Senate of the United States; invading the province of the House of Representatives, and usurping their constitutional authority to prefer an impeachment to the Senate, whenever such an occasion should occur, who were, with the assistance of the Chief Justice of the Supreme Court of the United States, constituted a tribunal to impartially, under a judicial oath, try such impeachment. So intent was that party on securing and restoring to the people their rights, which they insisted had been shamefully and wantonly invaded by the President, that they could not, nor would not, wait for the House of Representatives to make the impeachment, if they should find cause for it, whose sole province it was that the Federal part of the Senate, being then a majority, preferred the impeachment against President Jackson to themselves, and proceeded immediately to trial, refusing to admit the President to a hearing, and passed sentence of condemnation against him—finding him guilty of the vague and undefined charges which they made against him. And what was the result of this rash and wicked proceeding? Let the black lines which environ the ex parte judgment, as recorded upon the Senate journals, give the answer. The election of President Van Buren, said Mr. S. was predicted by this party to be pregnant with such evil as to overwhelm this nation with disaster, and bring upon it disgrace and ruin; and again the deluded people are to suffer ignominy and shame for their stupidity and ignorance, and want of capacity to select for themselves a suitable person for Chief Magistrate.

And so alarmed, said Mr. S. had this party recently become for the people, that they had employed and sent missionaries from the far West, into the Eastern States, to enlighten them in the science of Government, and to warn them of the imminent danger they were in, under the misrule of President Van Buren, whose mal-administration had already been too obvious, they thought, not to be discovered even by the besotted people, without the aid of these shining lights from the West. And where do we find the principal theatre of action of these missionaries at the East? Why, in the city of New York, located in the most splendid hotel in the city, from whence they issued their tickets at ten dollars each. Such of the people as were able, and disposed to pay that sum for the privilege of hearing their eloquence upon the ruinous condition of the country, and their pathetic appeal to them to unite with them in their efforts to reinstate the people to their long-lost rights, could have the privilege; and all others were excluded from the boon. As they were missionaries sent out by the Federal party, they probably considered it unprofitable to irradiate the intellects of that class of benighted and vulgar beings described by the great financier of the Federal party, Nicholas Biddle, in his oration delivered at Nassau Hall, Princeton, New Jersey, into whose merciful hands the substitute offered by the Senator from Virginia [Mr. RIVES] for the bill under consideration, is calculated to, and inevitably will, consign them; and therefore were disposed to shut them out, and to admit only such of the people as were described by Alexander Hamilton, in his letter to General Washington, of the 9th September, 1792, before alluded to, as being the only class of men "who are in every society the only firm supporters of Government." And, said Mr. S. that the people may understand the favorable estimation in which the great financier, Mr. Biddle, held them—who is to be their future protector if the substitute succeeds and is adopted—he would ask the permission of the Senate to read an extract from the oration alluded to, in which they will find a mirror furnished by Mr. Biddle, in which they could have a perfect view of themselves, as depicted by the head of the Federal party:

"From your quiet elevation, watch quietly this servile route, as its triumph sweeps before you. The avenging hour will at last come: it cannot be that our nation will long endure the vulgar dominion of ignorance and duplicity: you will live to see the laws established. These banditti (the people) will be scourged back to their caverns; the penitentiary will reclaim its fugitives in office, and the only remembrance which history will preserve of them, is the energy with which you resisted and defeated them."

And, said Mr. S. while the Federal party, under different names, covering the same principles, who early lost the power, by abuse of it, which they held but a short time, to regain it, and again ingratiate themselves into the confidence of the people, have been denouncing, villifying, and abusing the Democracy, with all the opprobrious epithets that the vocabulary could furnish, for nearly forty years, and predicting, in every prominent measure of the Administration, destruction to the Government and ruin to the people, thirteen new States have been added to the Union, and settled with a thriving, happy people; and the nation, under the guidance of the Democratic party, with the fierce and ferocious assaults of the Federalists to encounter, has prospered, and increased in population, in improvements, and grown in wealth, far beyond any example furnished either in ancient or modern history.

Mr. S. said it was not his purpose to complain in the least of the Opposition for the course which they had thought proper to pursue. His only object was, in presenting it to view, that there might be some criterion by which the people, whose interests were apparently so near to their hearts, could ascertain how much reliance was at this time to be placed upon the illimitable denunciations, in the absence of argument to sustain them, of the measure under consideration.

At last, said Mr S. the Opposition have discovered an act more ruinous than a war with the most potent nation, and more odious than the sedition law, in the recommendation of President Van Buren to the people, of a simple and safe method to keep and take care of their own money, instead of confiding it to the care of faithless corporations, who, when they had got into their possession nearly thirty millions of dollars of the public money, shut their doors against them, and laughed to scorn every attempt of the people to withdraw it from their clutches; and, moreover, boasted of their power and disposition to block the wheels of Government, and bring to their feet the Government of the people, an humble suppliant.

Mr. S. said the general principles of the bill before the Senate, he was satisfied with, and, if adopted, would accomplish all he desired, and that was, to separate the public treasure and business from the money and business of the banks, and of all individuals, and would gradually bring the currency to be received for the dues of the Government to the constitutional provision, and standard; and this, he had good reason to believe, would be entirely satisfactory to the people, and he was satisfied it was demanded by them. The Government then would have no cause of complaint from the conflicts arising from the intermingling of private business with the public, against the banks, or individuals connected with them; and as it has no power or control over them, they would have no right or just claims upon the Government to inspire them with the vital spark, which they, by their own constitutional infirmities, weakness, or folly in their management, had extinguished. Until he could hear some argument from the opponents of the bill, which would weaken his convictions of the soundness, and, as he deemed them, unanswerable reasons and arguments of the Senator from New York, [Mr. WRIGHT,] in support of the bill, he had no wish to go into the details of it, to substantiate what, in his opinion, had been clearly proved, and no attempt by argument had been made to refute it. And all the remarks he felt disposed to make upon this part of the subject, would be designed to show the impropriety of depositing for safe-keeping the public money in banks, and with individuals, who were not constitutional or legal officers of the Government, and amenable to the people as such; and the unfitness of the circulating medium furnished by the banks, as a general currency. That banks, established upon sound and correct principles, may furnish a commercial credit, or circulating paper, which might be useful, and highly beneficial, not only to the mercantile, but to other classes of men whose business occasionally requires additional and temporary capital, he was not disposed to deny.

Mr. S. said that before he proceeded to suggest some of the reasons which operated on his mind to influence his vote against the substitute proposed by the Senator from Virginia, [Mr. RIVES,] he would briefly notice some of the prominent objections to the bill made by the Senator from Massachusetts, [Mr. WEBSTER.] The Senator asks if a hostile army should invest the Capitol, and Government were to withdraw from the same, and leave the enemy without opposition, would not the Government shrink from its duty? Would not the public functionaries separate themselves from their duty? I answer, yes. And I ask the honorable Senator if a hostile army should not only invest the Capitol, but should set fire to it and burn it down, and the agents of the people—members of Congress—were to refuse their aid in furnishing the necessary means to rebuild it, would not the public functionaries separate themselves from their duty? And he would ask again: if a hostile army was upon our coast, watching an opportunity to invade our country, and while the faithful and patriotic people had left their homes, and gone to fight the enemy, Americans could be found among us base enough to give signal to the enemy, advising them of the most vulnerable and defenceless points for assault; that if Government were called upon for supplies to sustain our soldiers, while thus in the field defending our country, and Government should withdraw, and the public functionaries should refuse the aid required, would it not be separating themselves from their duty?

The Senator [Mr. WEBSTER] asks why is the Government discharged from taking care of the currency—the paper currency as well as the metallic currency? I answer: because the Government has no control over it. Can the Government punish any man for debasing or counterfeiting it? or can the Government control or interfere with the expansion, contraction, or emission of it, any more than it can with the interests or business of any individual? No one will pretend to this. And though it would seem as if the proposition was too self-evident to need supporting by authority, nevertheless he would read an extract from the opinion of Judge Marshall, in delivering the opinion of the court in the case of McCulloch vs. State of Maryland, 4 Wharton. 424:

"After this declaration it can scarcely be necessary to say, that the existence of State banks can have no possible influence on the question. No trace is to be found in the Constitution of an intention to create a dependance of the Government of the Union on those of the States for the execution of the great powers assigned to it. The means are adequate to its ends; and on these means alone was it expected to rely for the accomplishment of its ends."

"To impose on it the necessity of resorting to means which it cannot control, which another Government may furnish or withhold, would render its course precarious, the result of its measures uncertain, and create a dependence on other Governments, which might disappoint its most important designs, and is incompatible with the language of the Constitution."

The Senator [Mr. WEBSTER] says the bill before us is evidence of such degeneracy in the Government as to carry us back to the days of barbarism, when barbarous and piratical powers kept their money in cells, vaults, and safes. It may seem barbarous to those who are in the habit of receiving their money by tens of thousands, instead of their fifty cents a day for hard labor; but those who earn their money by the sweat of their brow, I presume, do not consider it much evidence of barbarism or piracy to keep safe their money when earned. The same may be said of every man who keeps his money safe, and especially of him who keeps it from the grasp of the banker and speculator, that he is barbarous, and degenerating into a pirate. What will the Senator say of those merchants, many of whom are his particular friends, who keep their money in vaults and safes? And what will the Senator say of his friends, the banks, which always keep their money in cells, vaults, and safes? Are they barbarous? If others are disposed to call them so, he presumed he is not. The Senator [Mr. WEBSTER] again manifests great sympathy for the people. This bill is going to separate the people from the Government, he says. If the Senator believes, as his propagandist, Mr. Hamilton, did, that the British Government was the most perfect Government on earth, Mr. S. said he should suppose he would consider it his duty to separate the Government from the people, as the British Government is wholly separated from the people. The political power in England is lodged wholly in the Government, and not in the people, as it is here. The people there are denied the right or power to reform the Government, however ilily it may be adapted to their wants, and which is never done by them, but by Parliament, and by that only when the people become so clamorous that they cannot be resisted. But when the Senator is so apprehensive that the bill will separate the Government from the people, he only makes the small mistake [Mr. S. said he apprehended] of calling the banks the people. The banks are not yet the people, he believed. That the banks and the people are opposed to each other in regard to the measure, is too evident to require confirmation. The banks are opposed to the bill because, say the gentlemen, it will be their ruin; they can never resume specie payments if the bill passes. Then, if the bill passes, it will separate the Government from the banks, but not from the people. Mr. S. said he desired to know how this bill could separate the Government from the people. The Government is the Government of the people, formed and constituted by them, and is wholly under their control, and may be altered, changed, or annihilated at their pleasure; and if any improper act—one which does not meet their approbation—is done by their servants, the public officers, contrary to their will, they will displace them, and substitute others in their places, as they did when the Senate undertook to impeach the President. Mr. S. said, if the bill is of such a character as to dissatisfy the people, and induce them to recall their agents, and supply their places with others of different principles, he should think it would suit the Opposition the better, as it might be the means of carrying them into power, and putting the Democrats out, who are abusing their trust so much, as to separate the people from their Government.

The Senator [Mr. WEBSTER] asks, without the aid of Government, how can the banks resume specie payments? If they cannot, or will not, what better evidence is wanted of their unworthiness and unfitness to be the depositories of the public money? They clutched all the public money, shut their doors, and now tell the Government, unless it will still have confidence in them, and trust them again with the money of the Government, they cannot pay the Government what they now owe it, nor even individual creditors either. If an individual was to borrow money from his neighbor, shut himself up, and tell his friend he could not, nor never would, pay him what he already owed him, unless he would trust him more, what would be the course of his friend? He would probably say, he would rather lose what he had already let him have, than more with it; and if his disposition was such as to cheat him out of what he had already borrowed of him, it probably would not be changed for the better by a future loan.

Mr. S. said he would now proceed to assign such reasons as suggested themselves to his mind, why the banks should not be made the depositories of the public money. The people of the United States formed for themselves a Government, with such powers as to them seemed most likely to secure to them their social rights; and one important provision in the Constitution of their Government was, that all their officers who participated in the administration of the Government, should act under the solemnities of an oath; and this, in addition to their immediate accountability to the people for the faithful performance of their duty, was considered important, especially in taking care of the public revenue. The people, then, have a right to have their money in the hands of those who are not only officers of the Government, but to have superadded an official oath, for their faithful performance of the duties assigned them. Have the people this constitutional security from the depositories of their money? Certainly not. So far from it, that any men, however profligate and base, may constitute the corporate body, whether citizens of the United States or of foreign Governments, and whose hostility to our free institutions may be deadly, or however corrupt and base they may be; and we are not without recent examples in bank officers of corruption and baseness of the most flagitious character. Have the people ever authorized their agents to place their money in the hands of others than officers of the Government? Certainly not. By what authority, then, is it that their money is placed in the banks, and beyond the control of the Government, for safe keeping, if it is not with their consent? Mr. S. said this he was yet to learn. To make the banks depositories of the public money is as partial and unjust between the banks, and does to that portion of them which are not depositories, as much injustice as it does to individuals who are not interested either in the deposite, or other banks not depositories; and the deposite banks will have the special benefit, first bestowed upon them by the State Legislatures, in authorizing them to loan their credit for six, ten, or fifteen per cent. and the further benefit and privilege added to that conferred by the State Government of receiving, keeping, and banking upon the funds of the General Government, also conferred upon them; and thus the State give them the advantage of loaning their credit, in the shape of money, by which they receive a large per centum. The General Government gives them the use of its money, which adds several per cent. more, at the same time that portion of the people who happen not to be bankers, and who constitute a very great majority, not only receive no portion of these bounties, but are obliged to pay their neighbor bankers, not more meritories, and perhaps not as much so as themselves, for their credit, loaned to them in the shape of paper money, manufactured at their pleasure, and obliged to submit, many times, to the most degrading humiliation, even to persuade the banks so far to condescend to aid them, as to loan them their credit, by giving the most ample and undoubted security.

And, said Mr. S. if a bank made a depository of the public money fails—and it is now quite a common occurrence—whether it be through dishonesty, or unwarranted hazard and speculation, what remedy has the Government except upon the bond taken for the repayment of the money? And no person will often become surety, but such as are connected with the bank; and when that fails, they fail also; the surety may apparently be ample when taken, and entirely worthless when the failure takes place. The Government can institute no inquiry into the conduct of the bank managers; it has no power to call them to account; and however great the fraud, and however great the loss, the Government has no remedy except on the bond, or by some civil action. Conscious of the impenetrable shield afforded them, is not obliquity almost a sure consequence? And, at least, are they not much more likely to be guilty of fraud than the public officer, who has not only his honor at stake, and that of his family, but is civilly liable to the full extent of his present property, and also to all further acquisitions; and is also liable criminally, and to be separated from his family, and all that is dear and valuable in this life, and to become the intimate of thieves, robbers, and all the outcasts and hopeless depredators upon the rights of man. The Government not only sustains the pecuniary loss, without the means of repairing it, but the public sustains infinitely greater injuries, by indirectly becoming the instrument of propagating, engendering, and inflicting crime upon the community, and which fills every social interstice with its baleful effects.

Much pains has been taken to prejudice the people against the Sub-Treasury system, by inducing them to believe that the friends of the system are disposed to break down and destroy all credit, because they propose to have the Government dues paid in the constitutional currency; but they neither make war upon any system of credit, nor upon the banks; they only require the Government to deal in such money only as is known to the Constitution; and how does this trench upon the rights of the banks? They leave them where they found them, under the control of the States, which created them. The States alone have power to continue them, discontinue them, or new organize them, as they may find it for their interest to do; unless the banks have become an independent estate, and are beyond the reach of the Government which created them. And why should the banks complain of this? Have they any more right to demand of the Government its countenance and support, than have individuals who are not incorporated? If they have, upon what ground is it? Have they a right to look to the General Government for protection? The Government has no control over them. If they assert they issue and furnish a circulating medium for the public accommodation, it is without the authority of the Government, and for their sole benefit; they issue bills and circulate them, or withhold them, just as they find it for their interest. No one will claim that they issue or circulate their bills for the public benefit, when it militates against their own interest. If banking was free to every man, under such restrictions as would protect the public from imposition, should the Government give preference to the banks over individuals unincorporated? If any preference was to be given to either, it ought to be given to the individuals, because they would be liable in their persons and property to pay their debts; and but few would become bankers, it is not likely, who had not visible and tangible property sufficient to pay all just demands upon them. If the Government goes to war, the individual comes to its aid; they go into the field and fight the battles; they produce the wealth, pay the taxes, and enrich the country. And will any one claim that if every man was his own banker, and issued bills at his pleasure, and when he found it for his interest, that the Government ought to make them depositaries of its money; and receive all their bills or notes in payment of the public dues? Mr. S. said the officers of the Government formerly received, kept, and paid out the public money with quite as little loss as has occurred since banks became fiscal agents of the Government. Previous to the rechartering of the United States Bank in 1816, the greatest part of the public revenue was collected, kept, and paid out by the officers of the Government. And what makes them more degenerated and less capable now? Has the influence of the banks made them degenerate, or what is it to be attributed to? Or is it to be found only in the imagination of the bankers, whose cupidity has been sharpened by the inordinate interest they have received by means of the public deposites.

The Opposition have been more clamorous upon the subject of exchanges, than almost any thing else. Commerce, they said, must wholly fail, unless Government made some provision to aid the merchants in exchanges. Nothing would regulate them, they said, but a bank, or banks; and therefore Government was bound to take the banks under its protection, to regulate the exchanges. They were told by the friends of the bill, that exchanges were only making provision for balances for or against the country, growing out of over-trade, and they, like all other evils, would regulate themselves, according to the laws of trade, and which appeared very simple and easy to the minds of all except the opposers of the bill, who persisted in saying that they could never be regulated without a bank. But what sound reason can be given, said Mr. S. why the Government should transport money to pay balances due from the merchants of our country, any more than it is bound to transport their produce or merchandise for them, out of which the balances arise. But if Government is bound to transport the produce and manufactures for the merchants, who have their profit for it, why not transport it while in the hands of the producer, the farmer, mechanic, and manufacturer, and give them the benefit of it, who certainly are as much entitled to it as the merchants, who only purchase it of the producer, and transport it for a profit which it yields him, and which is so much deducted from the price of the article when purchased. But before the bill has been fully discussed, exchanges have regulated themselves; they are now in favor of this country several per cent. And how did this happen, so contrary to the predictions of the Opposition? Why, just as they were told it would happen. The merchants have purchased less, and paid up the balances against them, and now there is no necessity for bills to go abroad, because nothing is due there.

The Senator from Indiana, [Mr. SMITH,] with a very happy simile, has illustrated the importance of the currency of a nation, by assimilating the currency to the life blood of an organic living body. That the currency is as essential and important to the body politic, as the blood of a man is to his body, he says; and in this he [Mr. S.] did not disagree with the Senator. That the one, in its proper application, was as important as the other, he was ready to admit.

He would then suppose that instead of the arterial and venous systems of the Senator, the one carrying the blood out from the heart, and the other returning it, moving in harmony, and performing their part in connection with the other great functions and powers of his body, they were entrusted to the care and control of some other person, who performed and moved them, not according to the wants and wishes of the Senator, but were governed wholly by the interest, whim, or caprice of those who had the management of these important organs; or, perhaps if those functionaries should grow a little mawkish, they might so far neglect their trust as to leave him powerless; he thought the Senator, under such unnatural regulations, would be much more imperfect than he now is. If, in making some long speech, his functionaries should neglect their duty, or rather service, or by reason of an adverse interest they might have, should neglect to supply him with the life-sustaining fluid, his speech would be cut short, and he would be obliged to sit down in the midst of it; and why? because his life-bood was at the control of others, to whose interest or will he was compelled to conform. Mr. S. said, if this be a fair comparison, it is not difficult to see that the nation, without the control of its life-blood, would be as impotent and powerless as the man who should be dependent on others for his blood.

What act would tend more directly to consolidate the Union, and break down the independence of the States, than the system of State banking, if the State Governments and General Government were compelled to have a mutual dependance on each other in their banking operations; moved by a self-acting machine, which would pervade every part of community, and would be interwoven with every interest, whether it be in individual transactions, or the concerns of the State or General Government? No scheme was ever devised, in his opinion, which was so well calculated to corrupt and demoralize the people, and subject them to the entire control of the aristocracy of the country; not only the wealth of our country, but the concentrated and united wealth will be directly wielded, as an irresistible power, to control the people in all our elections. What class of men, or what individuals, are there in community, who will not, to a very considerable extent, be subject to their control? The banks thus fortified, by the aid and support of the State Governments, and guarantied by the General Government, will be vested with the power of concreting and secreting the life-blood of the body politic both of the State and General Governments. They can produce a plethora at their pleasure and will, and by that means paralyze and frustrate the functions of the Government; or they can, at their pleasure, as their interest, political desires, or caprice may dictate, cause a depletion, and thus run down and prostrate the powers of the Government. The great body of the people will be made to feel, directly or indirectly, this gigantic power, placed in the hands of that class of people pointed out in the letter of Alexander Hamilton to Mr. Jefferson, before alluded to, (the wealthy,) as being the only firm supporters of Government, wherein he shows his preference for a monarchical Government; and the Federal party have ever since followed in his footsteps, and which they have indicated a resolute determination to build up and support. Not only the people, in their individual capacity, and in their ordinary transactions, will be subject to the control of these soulless and bodiless creatures, but the Governments, both State and General, will be wholly at their mercy, and may be disposed of at their pleasure. It is always said that money is the sinew of war, and that it cannot be carried on without it: if this is so, it will be quite easy to see what condition the country would be in, in case of a war, by recurring to the conduct of the Federal party during the last war with Great Britain; and ninety-five in a hundred of the banks are now in the hands and under the control of the same party, and probably will remain so.

Mr. S. said that we may see the peculiar character of the patriotism of the Federal party, so much boasted of, and how ready they are to manifest it "by being always at their post in the hour of danger," when the country is invaded by a public enemy. He would read an extract or two from their publications during that war, when the country was compelled to draw upon all its resources to save its independence, which is a fair specimen of their patriotism at this time, as well as then. Extract from a Boston paper: "Let no man, who wishes to continue the war by active means, by vote or lending money, dare to prostrate himself at the altar on the fast day; for they are actually as much partakers in the war as the soldier who thrusts the bayonet, and the judgment of God will await them." Extracts from the Boston Gazette, April 14, 1814: "Will Federalists subscribe to the loan? Will they lend money to our national rulers It is impossible: first, because of principle; and, secondly, because of principal and interest. If they lend money now, they make themselves parties to the violation of the Constitution, the cruelly oppressive measures in relation to commerce, and to all the crimes which have occurred in the field and in the cabinet. To what purpose have Federalists exerted themselves to show the wickedness of this war, and to raise the public sentiment against it, and to show the authors of it not only to be unworthy of public confidence, but highly criminal, if now they contribute the sums of money, without which these rulers must be compelled to stop; must be compelled to return to the policy and measures under which this country once was at peace, and in singular prosperity." * * * "Any Federalist who lends money to Government must go and shake hands with James Madison, and claim fellowship with Felix Grundy. Let him no more call himself a Federalist, and a friend to his country. He will be called by others infamous." * * * 'It is very grateful to find that the universal sentiment is, that any man who lends his money to the Government at the present time will forfeit all claim to common honesty and common courtesy among all true friends to the country. God forbid that any Federalist should ever hold up his hand to pay Federalists for money lent to the present rulers; and Federalists can judge whether Democrats will tax their constituents to pay interest to Federalists." The national honor, wealth, nay, its very existence, will be placed in the hands of these corporations, and to them, not Congress, the people will have to apply to know whether they will vindicate the honor of the nation by declaring war against a nation trampling upon her rights, perhaps by the incitement of those very incorporations, to gratify some interest of theirs, or for baser purposes; and if it shall be their pleasure to call a Congress, as they lately have done, to deliberate upon the humble petition of their loyal subjects, they will then, if they condescend to hear it, gratify their subjects or not, as it may suit the convenience or interest of the noblesse of our country. And sir, said Mr. S. the Senator from Virginia [Mr. RIVES] has not hesitated to declare, on this floor, his surprise that the Government had not sent agents to the late bank convention held in New York, to try to negotiate a treaty of amity and peace with the banks. Has this great nation already come to this humiliating and degrading condition? Mr. S. said he had hoped at least the evil day was yet further off. The siren song had been sung; but he trusted the enchantment was not yet too powerful to be resisted, while the Genius of Liberty, in her most fascinating form, was hovering over and adjuring this happy people, for her sake, to resist the lure: he would not permit himself to believe that her last and lingering hope was to be lost in a corrupt system of banking. No sir, said Mr. S. she had resisted successfully thus far all the allurements that had been proffered to seduce her, and he was not now prepared to believe she would sink beneath the influence of this pestiferous bank miasma.

But it is urged by the opponents of the bill, that the Government money in the hands of its public officers, will be too tempting to be resisted; that it will induce peculations; that they will become corrupted by it, and the Treasury will be robbed, and the people suffer great pecuniary losses, as well as loss of moral character; and the nation will suffer degredation and debasement, by the frauds which the Government will be privy to, in improvidently trusting to the care of their agents, selected from among them, for their probity and worth, the public money. Here again, said Mr. S. you see developed Federal principles; the people are incapable of taking care of themselves; a standing army, and sedition law, were necessary to secure their persons, against their worst enemies, themselves; their money can only be secured, and safely kept for them, by that class of men who were said by Colonel Hamilton to be the only firm supporters of Government, the wealthy.

But, Mr. S. said, he desired to know what there was in banks that made men more honest, than when administering a Government of their own choice, and formed by themselves for their own benefit. If we may judge from what has lately transpired in relation to the banks, they are perfect schools of corruption; perjury is but a common occurrence with the bank officers, to cover up, and secrete their frauds committed upon the people; and in confirmation of this, Mr. S. said he would read an extract from a Boston paper:

"We find that the banks, in every quarter of the Union, have become the subject of anxiety to their State Legislatures. In Massachusetts, the out and out bankruptcy of some six or seven of the city banks, has forced an investigation into the arcana of the corporations upon the Federal party. Rantoul, the bold and eloquent champion of Democracy in that Federal Legislature, pressed inquiry with such vigor that it could not be resisted. The opening of the charnel houses has presented a melancholy scene of mortality. It is found that the empty vaults are the mere receptacles of some defunct, worm eaten notes of hand, which, alas! are as inconvertible as the shin-plaster then representing them in exchange, which are but so many poor ghosts "visiting the glimpses of the moon." But the worst is found on the books. A friend writes us from Boston: "Among other disgraceful disclosures concerning the Franklin and Lafayette Banks before the legislative committee, still sitting, it appears that the cashier of the former declared, under oath, that the returns made by the directors to the Government, were sworn to with a knowledge that they were false, and that they kept two sets of books to carry on the deception."

But said Mr. S. if one hundred thousand dollars of money in the hands of the officers of the General Government is corrupting, will it be less so, when added to the money of the bank? If so, upon what principle is it? The gentleman has not condescended to tell us.

Mr. S. said, one objection made to the bill is, that if the public dues are all collected in gold and silver it will distress the banks, because they will be required to keep on hand specie to pay their bills to the amount of the public revenue, as those who are indebted to Government will have their bills, and demand the specie to pay the Government. Well, great concern has been manifested for the people; they were going to suffer if the bill passed. But here it is not difficult to understand who are meant by the people; the banks are meant to be designated as the people. That the banks will complain, no one doubted. The reason is quite obvious: if they are obliged to keep more specie, and issue less bills, their profits, of course, will be less, and nothing but complaint would be expected of them. But will the people, who are not bankers, complain because the banks are obliged to keep, what they promise, specie to pay their bills when demanded? If, then, by collecting the public dues in specie, it will have the effect to compel the banks to be prepared to pay their bills in specie, it is a good feature in the bill. The people will have the benefit of it, and this is what disturbs the opponents of the bill; their people are the banks.

Mr. S. said he should trouble the Senate with but few remarks upon the currency, as it had, to a considerable extent, been involved in the preceding discussion upon the unfitness of banks as depositories of the public money. Money or currency is an attribute of sovereignty. All Governments, said Mr. S. as far as his knowledge extended, had not only found it necessary, but had considered it a cardinal duty, to provide and take care of it, as much, and even more so, than weights and measures. Money is the standard of value; it measures the value of all property, as much as weights ascertain the quantity; and if the standard of value is defective, those who use it suffer as much, and many times much more, than they would by the use of defective weights. Indeed, such importance is attributed to money in political economy, that it is considered the life-blood of the body politic, and the sinews of war. It would, therefore, seem to be of such importance to a nation, that it could not exist without it; and in war, the nation would be as impotent and powerless as its soldiers, who were to fight its battles, would be without sinews and nerves. It is interwoven with all the business and concerns of society; every person is more or less affected by it, and feels a deep interest in it, whether rich or poor, or whether he belongs to one class of people or another; it enters into almost every transaction of life, be its character what it may.

Mr. S. said he thought all would agree that it is important it should spring from a pure source, and be unaffected with moral taint. Is the currency furnished by banks under our present system of this character? and can it be so? If it is not, we ought to see what its defects are, and see whether they can be remedied; and if they cannot, whether further countenance and encouragement shall be given to the system by the General Government. The moral aliment taken up by the absorbent vessels of the body politic, and which nourish and sustain a Republican Government, ought to be pure, and unalloyed with noxious mixtures, or it will surely languish, and ultimately perish under its baleful influence. Mr. S. said it was a fundamental principle in our Government, and intended to be fully carried out, and strictly adhered to in all our institutions and laws, that all men should be placed politically upon equal grounds, and left free to exercise their social rights; and whatever marred this equality might be looked upon as an excrescence or tumor upon the body politic, and a symptom of disease or unhealthiness in its institutions and laws. Titles of nobility, the principle of primogeniture, entailments, perpetuities, and every device to concentrate wealth by law, and make odious distinctions between men equal by nature; the pernicious and deleterious effects of which, upon a free Government, were so well understood by our ancestors, that they not only wholly discarded them, but made such provisions as they deemed effectual to prevent their introduction in future; and to the end that all might be kept equal, as far as equal laws would have the effect, laws of distribution were made, to distribute equally the property of a deceased ancestor among the heirs, in accordance with strict principles of justice, and that perpetuated wealth should not have an undue influence in making and maintaining such distinctions. And what do we find in the principles of banking? Why, sir, two of the most odious principles that could be incorporated into the institutions of a Republican Government—perpetuity and concentration of wealth; both are combined in banking. Although all the original parties to the corporation may be dead, yet the corporation is continued and kept alive, and perpetuated to the end of time, by new members being added. And the wealth of hundreds and thousands is brought together and concentrated, and may be wielded by one or two men, and brought to bear upon any portion of the community, in a political or any other point of view. And it is well known that they often enter the halls of the legislatures, and are brought to bear upon legislative action, and ro mould it into such shape as shall suit their intetest. As lamentable as this is, it is nevertheless true!

Mr. S. said nobody ever denied the right or power of a State until the banks came into existence, nor were there any writers upon the subject learned or wise enough to discover and bring to light a different principle to regulate all such business as affected, and had a bearing on, the public interest and welfare of the people generally, however private it might be in its nature and character, in such manner as to promote the general and public good. Although markets, grist-mills, ferries, provisions, and all other articles sold in market, are private property, notwithstanding they are regulated by the Government, so as to prevent injuries accruing to purchasers by the sellers. But the banks, the illegitimate offspring, to say the least, of improvident Legislatures, have assumed a sovereign power, which overshadows the State sovereignty with the aid of their godfather, the Supreme Court of the United States, to whose paternal sympathies, Mr. S. said, he should ask the indulgence of the Senate hereafter, while he could give them a passing notice.

The banks now take a hostile attitude, convene their congress, hold a secret conclave, and bid defiance to the Government which gave them existence. And here, said Mr. S., he would read an extract from a New Orleans paper, as evidence of the defiance of the banks to the State Governments to interfere with them in any way whatever:

"The Legislature of Louisiana has under way a bill to reform the banks. Its great feature is a superintending board of commissioners, appointed by the Legislature, to limit the circulation to a given amount above the cash on hand, and to report to the country the condition of the banks. Publication of this is to be made monthly. A leading bank paper in New Orleans laughs this to scorn, and says that the banks will submit to no legislative interference with their concerns. The Legislature of Indiana having appointed a committee to inspect the condition of the State bank, the board of directors responded that examinations by committees of Legislatures are authorized neither by the charter, by good policy, nor by the interests of the State."

The contest now between the banks and Governments, both State and General, is for power. It is to ascertain which has got to succumb. If the banks come off victorious, the people have got to submit to take and use their spurious money, and make it the standard of value, though it be ever so capricious, at the pleasure of the banks, and to suit their interest, without regard to the public good. If we are brought to this, it is not difficult to predict the fate of our boasted land of liberty.

Mr. S. said the unequal and unjust operations of banking, and from which the great mania for it arises, may easily be seen by paying a little attention to its principles. The Legislature incorporates and authorizes a company of men to issue their notes, without interest, and loan them to others as cash for their notes, with nearly seven per cent. interest. The one class is empowered to loan its credit, while all others are prohibited loaning their credit, and compelled to pay the bankers for their credit. The one class gives no security for the performance of its promises to pay. The other class gives double and undoubted security for their performance. The deposites of money made in banks by individuals for safe-keeping, on which the banks pay no interest, is often much more than the whole capital of the bank. By the charters of the banks, they are allowed to issue their bills upon the strength of these deposits, to the amount of one hundred and fifty per cent. on all the money deposited, and for which the holders of the bills have not the least security whatever; the deposits being liable to be withdrawn at any time, at the will of the owner. This system of legislation has the same effect upon the whole people, as it would have upon a single family, if the same principle was introduced by the head of it, and made the rule of action in it. For instance, if a man had two sons, one he required to pay him two dollars a week for his board, and the other he paid two dollars a week for boarding with him; or one he paid ten dollars per month for his labor, and the other he required to pay him ten dollars per month for the privilege of laboring with him. How long, he would ask, would this family be kept together upon such principles; which would not be more unequal or unjust in their operations than the principles of banking.

Mr. S. said he was more astonished at the pertinacity of the friends of the State bank system, in pressing with such zeal their claims upon the Government, to place confidence in, and give credit to, a currency furnished by the State banks, and with a professed object only of furnishing a good and sound currency for the people, when scarce a day fails to bring us intelligence of some new and base fraud committed by officers of banks, upon whom there seems to be no adequate check, and, in many instances, attempted to be concealed by perjury of the most frightful character, clearly evincive, to his mind, of the danger of the system, in swindling and defrauding the people with a worthless bank paper, and, at the best, having only one specie dollar in their vaults to pay ten or fifteen paper dollars, which have been issued and imposed upon an unsuspecting and confiding public. When bank charters are granted, they are invariably upon the application, and too often hypocritical petitions, asking for it under a pretence that the public interest requires it, when the sole object is to advance their own interest at the expense of the public; and if there was no other fraud and deception practised upon the people, who look to the banks, as by the terms of the petition they supposed they had a right to, for a sound and healthy paper currency, than the taking from the vaults of the banks, and appropriating to the use of two or three directors, who manage the bank, with little or no security, all the money belonging to it, and using it in large and hazardous speculations, and especially in provisions, by which means they are enabled to monopolise and govern the price of the most substantial articles of consumption, and which is too often the cause of a scarcity in market, it would seem to be sufficient to induce every reflecting man to pause, if his object was what he proposed, to accommodate and benefit the people, before he gave any further encouragement to a system so deceptive, and so unlikely to furnish a sound and accessible paper medium; and as evidence of such practices, he would read an extract from a Louisiana paper, and one from a Pennsylvania paper, a great many of which might be adduced:

"The Legislature of Louisiana commenced the searching operation; and it is discovered at the threshold that the immense discounts there, as at Boston, which have swallowed up the capital of the banks, have been made to little more than two dozen directors! We clip the following from this morning's Baltimore Republican: 'From a long article from the New Orleans Bee, received by last night's express, and which we will give at length to-morrow, we have the startling fact adduced as an evidence of the unjust system of bank favoritism pursued in that city, that of the credits of eight banks which had made a faithful return of their affairs, seven millions of dollars had been distributed to twenty-nine commercial houses! And what adds to the enormity of this fact is, that these twenty-nine houses were composed of bank directors. What a commentary on the principles of American banking, and the much vaunted credit system!" Extract from a Pennsylvania paper: 'The Lumbermen's Bank at Warren, Pennsylvania, has broken, caused, it is believed, by three or four of the stockholders obtaining loans to two hundred thousand dollars, i. e. the whole capital!'"

Mr. S. said he had before alluded to the frightful and unwelcome inroads which had been made upon the Constitution and primary law of our country, by the construction of the Supreme Court of the United States, given to the Constitution at different times, and made upon different parts of it; and what is very singular and worthy of consideration, all such constructions have been made in accordance with the principles of the Federal party, as laid down by Alexander Hamilton, and ever since practised upon, and strictly adhered to, and aimed at, as far as lay in the power of the party. Mr. S. said, if this construction is just, and such a one as to give effect and force to the Constitution, as it was originally understood by the people, for whose benefit it was made, and was now adapted to their exigencies, he perhaps ought not to complain. But it was now too evident to admit of a doubt, in his opinion, that the decisions of the Court, which have given an entirely different character to our Government, and, in its operations under such constructions, has so entirely demonstated its unfitness and want of adaptation to the interests and condition of the people, that little hazrd was run in saying that the people will submit to no such construction of their chartered liberties, however high the source from whence it emanates, or however much they may revere the expounders of the Constitution.

Mr. S. said he proposed now to explain and give his view of the construction given to that part of the Constitution which prohibited the States from passing any law "impairing the obligation of contracts," under which construction, the banks and other corporations of a congenial nature, have come into existence, coalesced, and taken a stand against the Government, and declared themselves independent of the Government, and paramount to its authority. It now remains to be seen whether the people will submit to and confirm this construction; if so, the banks have become the Government; and the Constitution, so sacred in the estimation of the people, a mere guarantee of the bank oligarchy of our country. It is a fundamental principle in every Government, where its powers are properly divided and distributed, that no Legislature, by its acts, can bind subsequent Legislatures, except so far as the State may consider itself bound in good faith to carry the acts of preceding Legislatures into effect. The importance of this principle in a Republican Government will be readily perceived, on adverting to the fact, that the true depositaries of the political power are the people, with whom it at all times rests, and by them can at all times be moulded into such shape as to suit their wants, and give full scope to civil liberty, and to assure its enjoyment by the citizens to the full extent of its capacity.

The legislators are but the agents of the people, with power from them not to contract away, sell, and dispose of this power, but to exercise it temporarily during the existence of their agency only for the benefit of the people, whom they represent. The Parliament of Great Britain can repeal any act passed by a preceding Parliament; and whether the act is public or private, it makes no difference; it can repeal the one as well as the other; and so a franchise granted by the King, as all charters of incorporation are granted by the King, may at any time be taken away, or repealed, by the Parliament. This is admitted by the Supreme Court of the United States, in the same case in which they decide that the Legislature which grants them, cannot take them away; a passage from which Mr. S. said he would read, from the 4th vol. of Wheaton's reports, 643, case of Dartmouth College vs. Woodward: "According to the theory of the British Constitution, their Parliament is omnipotent. To annul corporate rights might give a shock to public opinion, which their Government has chosen to avoid; but its power is not questioned." A State is as sovereign and omnipotent as the British Parliament, except in so far as its power is taken away by the National Constitution.

And here two questions arise upon that part of the Constitution of the General Government which prohibits the States passing any law "impairing the obligation of contracts," which, if decided against the people, gives to the political power of the States a more limited and circumscribed operation than that of Great Britain. The first question to be decided is, is the power exercised by the Legislature, in passing an act of incorporation and granting chartered privileges to a company, political power. The second question is, whether, if it is political power, a Legislature, as such, has power to contract and grant it away absolutely, and beyond the control of the people, to whom it belongs, and for whose benefit it was reserved and kept in store, to be dealt out and applied as their necessities should require. It is admitted by the Supreme Court, in giving its opinion in the case above alluded to, that, if it is political power, and exercised as such by the Legislature in making the grant, that it is only an exercise of sovereign power of the State, which does not come within the prohibiting clause of the Constitution, and not a contract within the purview of the Constitution. And, to settle and decide this question correctly, it becomes necessary to ascertain what political power is.

The Court say, in giving their opinion in the before mentioned case, that, "If the act of incorporation be a grant of political power—if it create a civil institution, to be employed in the administration of the Government, the subject is one in which the Legislature of the State may act, according to its own judgment, unrestrained by any limitation of its powers, imposed by the Constitution of the United States.—4 Wheaton, 630.

Mr. S. said, with great deference to the opinion of the Supreme Court, he would ask, in granting a franchise, what other power than political does or can a Legislature exercise? If it is individual or personal power, any member of community may exercise it; but a Legislature, as such, cannot. Can a Legislature grant a privilege to any individual for his sole and only benefit, and without being the means of advancing the public interest generally? No one will be bold enough to assert this. Will any one pretend that the Legislature has power to grant to any man a privilege which others have not, and are not allowed to have, of tilling his farm in a different and more advantageous manner than others of the same class? And why not? Why, because the power wielded by the Legislature can only be exercised for the benefit of the public, and not for the benefit of individuals; and this would be for the benefit of an individual only. The privileges, then, which the Legislature is authorized to bestow, are for the benefit of the public, the whole people, and not for one or more, to the exclusion of the others, except so far as those upon whom it is conferred may be used as instruments or agents to promote the public interest. The public interest must be the object of it, though individuals may receive a benefit in the operation; or else the Legislature possesses no power to bestow it. If this doctrine is correct, how can the Legislature grant a franchise to individuals to bank, and furnish a circulating medium or currency, which all admit is a sovereign attribute, without doing it for the benefit of the public? And, if it is for the benefit of the public, it is so far a civil institution. And is not this the character given to it when the bank is granted? And do not those who petition and ask for the bank, and the Legislature, all treat it as such? And is it not on that ground that it is granted by the Legislature? And are not those incorporated treated as instruments only to promote the public interest? And, if so, is not the legislative act strictly within the principle, as laid down by the court, in defining political power? If it is not, it is difficult to perceive what political power is. Mr. S. said what he understood political power to be was nothing more than a portion of individual rights and power surrendered to be exercised by the Government for the benefit of the whole, that the remaining part of their rights might be more effectually secured to them; that the legislators were agents of the people only, to conduct the Government machinery for them, which could be operated by political power alone.

In giving a construction to the Constitution, a distinction is taken between a public and a private act of the Legislature, while no one ever contended that a public act was not liable at all times to be repealed, however injuriously it might affect the interest of individuals. At the same time, it is contended that a private act, derived from the same source, conferred by the same power, and though it may affect injuriously, in a far less degree, the interest of those who receive its benefits, yet it cannot be repealed unless a power for that purpose was reserved when the act was passed. And why not? Because, say the advocates for the monopoly construction, that it is a contract of the persons incorporated by the private act with the Legislature; and, therefore no act can be passed impairing the obligation of contracts. Well, let us take a case for illustration, which is not of seldom occurrence in these days of vested rights, and see whether it is so. The Legislature pass an act offering a bounty to all silk-growers, of one dollar for each pound of raw silk they shall raise within twenty years. Under the inducements held out by this law, men go largely into the business, purchase suitable land, purchase and set out mulberry trees, establish expensive cocoonries, and lay out many thousands of dollars. After succeeding well, and after the lapse of a few years, the people find that the profits are so great, that it is supplanting all other kinds of business, or, at least, the profits are altogether disproportioned by means of the bounty to the profits of other business, and the Legislature which act for, and in obedience to the will of the people, repeal the law. Will any body doubt the power of the Legislature to repeal it? At the same time, when the law was passed granting the bounty, a private act was passed by the same Legislature, incorporating a company to manufacture the raw silk into goods of various kinds; and this is found also by the profits it yields to a wealthy company, who, by their chartered rights, have monopolized and engrossed the business, so as to trench upon the rights of industrious, unincorporated individuals, in cutting down and curtailing their means of living. But this offensive monopoly or corporation cannot be reached, because it is a contract with the corporators, selling and disposing of so much of the political power as materially to affect the rights of the citizen, for whose benefit alone, and for whose private rights, the political power was created and reserved, to be used, from time to time, as their interest should require, and in the same manner as when exercised in passing a public act for the same purpose—the benefit of the people. We historically know that the prohibiting clause in the Constitution was intended for no other purpose than to prevent Legislatures from interfering with contracts fairly made between men and men in their private business, and annulling what individuals themselves had agreed to and consummated in a contract. And what mind is there so obtuse as not to be able to discover that by the plastic hand of the Supreme Court, this clause of the Constitution is converted into a machine to despoil the free citizens of this country of their civil liberty, for the attainment of which their ancestors sacrificed their treasure and blood, and transmitted it to them as a sacred heritage, believing it would not be parted with, but with a sacrifice equal with that made to establish it. And what is not less humiliating, it places the citizens of the United States, in the enjoyment of civil liberty, far below the subjects of the King of England; for there it is not denied but an obnoxious franchise may at any time be taken away by Parliament. Mr. S. said, marriage contracts are constantly, not only impaired, but abrogated and cancelled by State Legislatures, and the parties to them wholly released from their obligations to each other by virtue of the marriage contract. And nobody ever denied the right of the Legislature to dissolve the contract. No: it is not denied by the Supreme Court, but is expressly admitted to be consistent with the constitutional provision, prohibiting Legislative enactments "impairing the obligation of contracts." And that every man may put a just estimate upon the opinions of the erudite judges of the Supreme Court, in giving to our sacred Constitution such construction as to build up a formidable moneyed aristocracy, which had already confidence enough in its own strength and power to bid defiance to the Government, and whose career thus far had been marked by oppression, corruption and perjury. Mr. S. said he would read the opinion of the Court, so far as it regarded marriage contracts, in the case of Dartmouth College, vs. Woodward, 4, Wheaton 629, where the doctrine of vested rights was fully discussed, and considered as settled against the rights of the American people. Judge Marshall says, in delivering the opinion of the Court: "It never has been understood to restrict the general right of the Legislature to legislate on the subject of divorces. These acts enable the same tribunal not to impair a marriage contract, but to liberate one of the parties, because it has been broken by the other." Judge Story says, page 695: "A general law regulating divorces from the contract of marriage, like a law regulating remedies in other cases of breaches of contracts, is not necessarily a law impairing the obligations of such a contract. It may be the only effectual mode of enforcing the obligations of the contract on both sides."

Then, said Mr. S. we are thus enlightened by the learning and wisdom of our boasted Supreme Court. The only effectual way of enforcing a marriage contract may be to dissolve it, or to liberate one of the parties, because it has been broken by the other. This, said Mr. S. he must confess was a new way of enforcing the obligations of a contract without impairing it, to cut the ligaments, absolve the parties from all obligation imposed by the marriage contract, leaving the parties where they were before the contract was made. If the true and only reason which can be given, for the exception in the case of marriage contracts, had been given by the court, it would have prostrated the entire fabric, which had been conceived in the imagination of the court, and confirmed the only reasonable construction that can be given to the Constitution; that is, that the marriage contract is of civil institution, consummated by the sovereign act of the State, and for governmental purposes; which was never intended to be interfered with, when that provision was introduced into the Constitution. And such is the character of the banks; they have their origin in the sovereign acts of the State, and for the purpose of promoting the public interest, and not that of individuals; both stand precisely upon the same ground.

The great and fundamental principle in our Government, that every Legislature should be left free to act for the benefit of the people, as the condition of society, and the circumstances of the people, may require, is founded in the fact, that all political power is vested in the people; and that it is to be used and applied as it may be wanted, but not to be disposed of or placed beyond their reach, by any bargains or contracts to be made by their agents, the legislators, is evidenced by the fact, these Legislatures cannot alter, enlarge, or contract the political power as prescribed by the Constitution; but to do this, the people are to be called upon to act in the primary capacity, who have the power to make such alteration as they may see fit.

It is said by the court in the above case, that if a salary is stipulated to be given to an officer of the Government, for a certain time, that this is a contract, and may be enforced. If this is so, and the Legislature possesses the power to make the judges of the courts independent of the people, by contract with them, why make provision in the Constitution for the tenure of the judicial officer, that they shall hold it during good behavior, or for any other term of time? And why do those favorable to this principle, hold on to it with such tenacity, when it is once incorporated in the Constitution? If this principle is correct, it follows, that unless you have guarded against it in your Constitution, all your offices, of every character, may be disposed of for ever, and the people are bound by it, whether they have been betrayed into the hands of a set of tyrants, knaves, or fools. This would harmonise with the principles of that Government which was the idol of Colonel Hamilton, and which, with all its faults, he thought the most perfect Government on earth —that is, the British Government. There the political power is all vested in the Parliament, and none in the people: of course the Parliament can dispose of it at its pleasure. Were the people in that country ever called upon in their primary capacity to alter their Constitution, to extend or abridge their political power? Certainly not; and why? Because the people have nothing to do with it; it was all usurped, and taken away from them by the Government; the people, in their estimation, being incapable of using it. We are brought to the conclusion, then, that Legislatures, as such, have no power to convert and dispose of the political power, but to use it temporarily during their agency, and so by the next Legislature succeeding them, to be used in the same manner. Their agency is of the same character, so far as it regards the political power, as that of an individual employed in the business of another to do his work on the farm, in the mechanic's shop, or in the manufacturing establishment. The employment does not give the agent the power to dispose of the property. It is said by the court in the same case, these Legislatures may dispose of land belonging to the State, and therefore may dispose of offices, franchises, etc. This does not follow. Land is tangible and transferrable property, and the nature and object of it is to be sold and transferred, and Legislatures are always considered the proper agents for that purpose.

Mr. S. said that a United States Bank was not lost sight of by the Opposition; they were cherishing the hope that one would be chartered, and become the fiscal agent of the Government. He should not at this, or any other time, take into consideration the expediency of such a measure, until Congress should admit its constitutionality, which he was not prepared to believe would take place very soon.

Mr. S. said he was wholly satisfied, that no power either was, or intended to be, vested in Congress to establish a bank, and to maintain that position, such remarks as he should be indulged in making on the subject, would be directed. It has been said, that the constitutionality of a bank ought now to be considered no longer doubtful, inasmuch as President Washington, after the Constitution was adopted, gave his sanction to it, by confirming the act of Congress, granting the first charter of a bank. But we know historically, and a recurrence to the journals of Congress will show it, that General Washington hesitated long before he would give his assent to the charter; and we have the best of reasons for believing that it was the extreme anxiety he felt for the welfare of his country at that critical juncture, that induced him to sign the act at the time; and how far, if at all, he was influenced by the powerful and delusive reasoning of Hamilton, who was bent on taking the first opportunity to engraft new powers by construction on the Constitution, is not known. But for want of money to discharge the debts of the Government, which had been contracted in establishing our independence, he believed the people would be so far dissatisfied, under the then extreme embarrassment of the country, with the necessary axes and burthens which they would have to bear, that the chartering of the bank would be productive of the least danger to the Government. And it was therefore a choice of evils, and not a belief in the full and perfect constitutionality of the act, that induced him to sign the act granting the charter. Mr. Madison was clear in the opinion that the bank was unconstitutional, and he ought to have known whether those who gave existence to the instrument at that time so understood it, and he did know that they understood that no power was vested in Congress to establish a bank; and we historically know the fact, as well as we know that General Washington was President of the United States. And if there was a fact to be proved now, without looking into the Constitution to know, by construction, whether the power was to be vested in Congress, would any one say that such power was intended to be given? No one, he was confident; and yet we are gravely set to work to ascertain whether that wise and intelligent body of men who penned the Constitution did not intend to incorporate in that instrument that power. We are well assured that Mr. Madison only yielded his opinion to what he supposed to be the voice of the people, (a cardinal principle never to be overlooked by the Democracy,) who was probably moved at that juncture by the same impulse that General Washington was when he gave his assent to it; that is, necessity or a choice of evils, and not by the consideration of its strict constitutionality. General Washington's opinion was finally in favor of the bank, Mr. Madison's opinion was once in favor of and once against it, and General Jackson's opinion was against it; two decisions were in favor of and two against it. From that source, therefore, no aid is to be derived by precedent or by force of opinion. But Congress is not bound by precedent, or constrained to act upon it. So far from it, it is bound to respect the will of the people when it is called upon by them to act in its legislative capacity; and it is, upon every principle, at liberty to construe the Constitution as it is understood by it, independent of the opinions of preceding Congresses, which undoubtedly put such construction upon it, as it supposed was just and proper at that time. Nor is Congress bound to follow the construction given to it by the Supreme Court: they are co-ordinate branches of the Government; each branch is independent of the other in its construction of the Constitution, as it is in all other official acts; and each branch of the Government is bound by oath to construe it as it is understood by it. Although party considerations probably had no influence with the court in giving the construction to the Constitution, yet no one expects well settled political principles to slumber in the mind of any patriot, however erroneous they may be, without being awakened, when, in the exercise of an official duty, he believes one course taken by him will prejudice the interests of his country, while the other, if taken, will advance its interests; and such high and honorable motives may be ascribed to those high judicial functionaries, while those opposed to them in political principles, with the same sincerity and honorable motives, may be permitted to impugn the correctness of their construction, without doing injustice to the feelings of either, or infringing or invading their rights.

Mr. S. said, as important as all readily admit the currency of a nation to be, there seems to be too much difficulty to determine in what part of the Constitution the power lies, to entitle it to much credit, to incorporate a banking company, with power to manufacture paper money at their pleasure, and to suit their private interest. Some have attempted to locate it in that part of the Constitution which authorizes Congress to "coin money, regulate the value thereof, and of foreign coin," etc. There is an obvious distinction between such means as are incidental to the express power which follows as a corollary from it, and such as may be arbitrarily assumed as convenient to execute the express power, or brought to its aid under a pretext of necessity. The power of coining money implies the power of establishing a Mint. The power of levying and collecting taxes implies the power of regulating the mode of assessment and collection, and appointing proper officers to accomplish the same; but to coin money, etc. does not imply the power of establishing a banking corporation to make paper money, which is no where recognised in the Constitution, but was expressly rejected when the Constitution was framed. Such a construction would be more forced than to say it implies a power to incorporate a company of miners; because Congress is empowered to coin money, inasmuch as the manner in which it shall be done is not expressed; and to search after the hidden treasures of the earth, and with power to coin all the money, and regulate the value thereof, and thereby to place that important power, expressly granted to Congress, and to be exercised by it alone, beyond the control of the people, and even beyond the control of Congress; to be carried on by a few individuals, as shall suit their private interests, disregarding entirely that of the people; and the entire welfare of the public, in relation to the constitutional currency, made to depend upon the whim, caprice, interest, or political plans of these few individuals, to whom this power is delegated by Congress. Others, with more speciousness, have attempted to find an implied power to establish a bank, growing out of the express power granted to Congress "to regulate commerce with foreign nations, and among the several States, and with the Indian tribes." Mr. S. said it would, in his opinion, do much less violence to the phraseology used in constituting this power, and the general sense expressed by it, than it does to attempt to imply the power from the express power to coin money, &c. To regulate commerce, signifies to subject commerce, already in existence by the creation of others, to rules or restrictions. To create a bank, requires capital, and requires that capital to be actively engaged; and if Congress may so regulate commerce, engage actively in it, employ capital, and carry it on, where is the limit to it? When it incorporates a banking company to furnish the capital to merchants and others engaged in business, what stretch of power beyond this does it require to enable the Government, with this same capital, to buy ships, and employ hands on board of them, and to purchase cargoes to load the ships with, and thus become competitors with individuals in all the business of our country: send our ships to the Indies, and engage in the whaling business, and all other profitable business of the world; establish manufactories, as wares are subjects of merchandise. And why not manufacture all articles from which a profit may be derived, as well as one article only, paper money, which is as much an article of trade as cloths, and varies nearly or quite as much in its value? But if the Government does not choose to enter actively into business itself, it can incorporate a company, and give it the benefit of the trade; the great body of the people will be no more deprived of their natural or social rights, or deprived of the profits of business which appropriately belong to them, than they are in banking, nor will the profits be larger or more valuable to the citizens. To be consistent, Mr. S. said, he thought the Government was as much bound to do this as to incorporate a banking company. It has incorporated, or proposes to, one company to manufacture the currency, and, on the same principle, it ought to incorporate another company to merchandise, and another to manufacture the goods, another, with as much propriety and justice, to raise the produce on our farms. One is no more unreasonable and no more unauthorized that the other.

Mr. S. said he was sure no Senator could reasonably claim, that if Congress has the power to separate the incident from the principle, to separate the implied power, growing out of the express power, and dispose of these to individuals, and cheat the people and Congress of the power, and place it beyond the control of either; that Congress has not the same power to dispose of the principal, or express power, that it has to dispose of the incident, or implied power. There is nothing in the nature of an implied power, that gives Congress any more power over it, to dispose of it, than there is in an express power. If they are powers derived from the same source, it is no matter whether they are express or implied; they are to be exercised in the same way, and for the same purpose. There can be no doubt, then, said Mr. S. if he was correct, but if Congress has the power to incorporate a company to carry out the implied powers, it has the same right to incorporate a company to carry into effect the express powers. Well, admitting this to be correct, what would be the condition of the people and their Government? Their agents, selected for their fidelity to manage the Government for them, have bartered it away, and transferred the power conferred on them for that purpose, and by the barter and transfer have given their new agents the character of master, instead of servant, which was the appropriate character when elected by the people. Congress, then, will have granted the power to coin money, and to a corporation; the power to regulate commerce, construed to mean to carry on commerce to another company; to declare war to another company, and to furnish materials for carrying it on, to another company; to fix the standard of weights and measures to another company, and to build our ships etc. to another company.

If Congress possesses the same power to incorporate a company to manufacture weights and measures, that it does to incorporate a company to manufacture the currency, what more impropriety or injustice would there be to the people? The people would not suffer as much by it, even if the weights and measures were to increase and diminish with the interest of the manufacturer, when he bought and sold as much as the bank bills do; because much more property can be disposed of, passed from hand to hand without weighing or measuring, than there can be without money. And what would the people think, and what would they say to their servants, if they were to incorporate a company of men, with the exclusive privilege of manufacturing all the weights and measures of the country, and of using them in their own way; and at their pleasure to dispose of them, or withhold them; and to make them larger when they bought, and smaller when they sold; compelling the people to depend on the company for them, and must either buy of them at their prices and on their terms, or go without? The effect on the interest of the people, if the exclusive right being given to an incorporated company to manufacture the currency, in accordance with their own interest is the same, and more deleterious if possible.

To raise and support armies, would be necesarily implied under the power to declare war; war could not be carried on without this power, it is a means of accomplishing an end; that is to maintain war; but the means, as well as the end are here expressed. If the convention which formed the Constitution, had intended to have given such means as banking to accomplish an end, as is contended for, so remote as the end and the means are from each other, would it not have been much more likely to express the means to be employed than in some others, between which there was much more affinity, and when it must have been implied by necessity, and when the means were absolutely necessary to accomplish the end? The power vested in Congress "to make all laws which shall be necessary and proper for carrying into execution the foregoing powers, and all other powers vested by the Constitution in the Government of the United States, or in any department or office thereof," has some times been selected, as the source from whence the authority is derived to establish a bank. This clause of the Constitution, Mr. S. said, did not enlarge the powers already granted; it neither did, or was intended to add to their powers. Congress would have possessed this power, necessarily, as much without this clause as with it; it is declaratory merely; to make all such laws as should be necessary to give full force and effect to the Constitution would be a necessary consequence; for without the right to enjoy the benefit of the constitutional power, as they are given, the Constitution would be wholly useless. But if we do not pervert the language made use of to indicate the laws to be made under the above power, it is quite certain that no authority will be found in that part of the Constitution to establish a bank. What do we understand by the words "necessary and proper?" Why, sir, not only that the law to be made shall be adapted, fit, proper, and apposite, but that it shall be necessary, that is, the law is indispensable; that cannot be otherwise, without preventing the purpose intended; and though we may admit that the word, necessary, is sometimes, though seldom, used in a more relaxed sense, this is the general sense in which it is used. If, then, a bank is indispensable to the regulation of commerce, there might seem to be some excuse for exercising the power. But no one will pretend that commerce cannot be regulated without a bank; and, therefore, a bank is not necessary, or, in other words, indispensable; nor is it, in its nature, a regulator of commerce, but an auxiliary to commerce.

But what may be supposed to have been understood by the convention when the Constitution was framed, by "making all laws necessary," &c. what would be understood now, by all men of common sense? Why, sir, every man would suppose that it meant a common and ordinary law; such an one, as is required to be published and placed in your statute book among the general and public laws, and such as all citizens are bound to take notice of; and which are at all times under the control of the people, subject to be altered, modified, or repealed, as their interest should require; not a private contract with one or more individuals, which derives no force or efficacy from being published, but is perfected like every other contract between two or more individuals, affecting nobody but the contracting parties, and which the public, by the construction of the court, has no interest in, or concern with; and which is designed to empower the individuals incorporated to accumulate wealth and riches, while all others are strictly prohibited and forbidden the enjoyment of the same privileges, and not only so, but compelled to contribute their proportion towards enriching these specially privileged above all the rest. Suggest to the mind of any man that a law was to be made for any purpose, and would the idea flash upon his mind that that law was to be a contract in which the public generally was not concerned? Certainly not.

It is possible we may derive some aid in giving a correct construction to the word necessary, as used in the Constitution, by recurring to some ordinary transaction among individuals, where a right is implied, and limited by necessity. We shall then be likely to get the idea ordinarily designated by the word We will suppose the following case, and see whether such construction as has been given in similar cases, and as probably would be again should it occur, will not shed some light on this constitutional provision: One man sells a piece of land to another, surrounded entirely and enclosed by his own land, without giving any express right in the deed to the grantee to cross his land to go there, which he had conveyed. To occupy and enjoy the land, it is necessary that the grantee should have ingress and egress; and, without it, the conveyance would be wholly nugatory, and could not be enjoyed by him, any more than it could if he did not own it. Mr S said there would be an implied right to pass over the grantor's land, as being necessary to the enjoyment of the land, and to give effect to the deed. But suppose the land, when conveyed, was open and accessible on one side, but very inconvenient, and the distance to get on to it would be several miles, while to cross the grantor's land would be very convenient, and the distance but a few rods: would any one suppose the grantee could have a right to pass over the grantor's land? Certainly not. And why not? Because the land could be enjoyed, though imperfectly and to a great disadvantage, as it was conveyed. It will, therefore, be seen, that if this position is correct; that if means, though imperfect, are given to the enjoyment of the express power, that every means may not be resorted to as necessary to give the greatest degree of enjoyment that the subject is capable of; but it must be taken with its imperfections, and no implication necessarily arises to make it more perfect. Mr. S. said he desired to learn by what principle or power it is that Congress delegates the power to others; and, independent of these, from whom, and to whom, the power to grant a bank, if such exists, emanates? Is there any other instance, and if so, where is it, in which the power delegated by the people, to be exercised for their benefit, without express power given for that purpose, that the power so delegated can be again delegated? He knew of none. Executive officers, under authority given for that purpose, may call to their aid others to assist them in executing the laws; but can legislative officers, or agents of the people, transfer their powers, which are personal trusts, and discharge themselves from the responsibility created by the acceptance of the trust from the people, to whose personal ability and known fitness alone, they looked for a faithful performance of it? But for the purpose of seeing what the principle would lead to, when fully carried out in practice, admit there is no doubt but Congress has the power to incorporate a banking company, and make it independent of the people and of the Government; and this to be done by their legislative powers, received at the hands of the people. It will probably not be denied that, if the legislators can dispose of part of their power, they can upon the same principle, dispose of the whole. Suppose, then, that some important measure is designed to be carried in Congress, and the people select their representatives with that view; but the representatives think proper to barter away their trusts to others, whom the people know nothing about, and are adverse to them in their views of the subject, to settle and legislate upon which the representatives had been particularly elected; but by this subterfuge, the people are cheated and defrauded out of their rights. And whether the business to be performed by the representatives is ordinary or extraordinary, the principle is the same, and the fraud is as great upon the people as far as it affects their interest and rights.

Suppose the judges of the courts, who are appointed to the important station for their talents, learning, and peculiar fitness for the place, delegate their powers to others, without regard to the choice or rights of the people, and create a new court at their pleasure. Is there any thing more revolting in this, or would it be more unexpected, or unjust to the people, than for the Legislatures to delegate their powers, and create an odious monopoly, and an oppressive banking institution, subverting the fundamental principles of their Government, and reducing them to the domination of a power, the people had freely spilt their blood to avert?

INDEPENDENT TREASURY BILL.

SPEECH OF MR. BROWN,
OF NORTH CAROLINA,

In Senate, February 23, 1838—Upon the bill "to impose additional duties as depositaries, upon certain public officers, to appoint Receivers General of public money, and to regulate the safekeeping, transfer, and disbursement of the public moneys of the United States."

Mr. BROWN said, when the important measure, which was then before them, had, on a former occasion, been presented for their consideration, he had then availed himself of the indulgence of the Senate, to submit the reasons, which influenced his course, in regard to it. The debate, on the occasion that he referred to, had been distinguished, as well by the decorum and dignity, with which it had been conducted, as by that exhibition of high intellectual powers, which it had called forth, on both sides of the question. In rising, to address them again, he was very sensible of his inadequacy to do justice to a subject so weighty in its consequences, and of such vast extent, that it more and more expanded on the "mind's eye," as we progressed in its investigation. A subject, involving, in his opinion, an issue of no less importance, than the continuance of the right of the people of this country to self-government, and the maintenance of our republican institutions. With this solemn conviction on his mind, feeble as he deemed his own abilities, he was emboldened to enter the lists of debate, to grapple with the strong, and to do battle, under a banner consecrated by the principles of free government, with what skill he might, and with what power he could.

He should do injustice to his own feelings, if he omitted to express the satisfaction, which he had derived, from listening to the able and eloquent address of the Senator from Ohio, [Mr. ALLEN], in support of the measure before them. It was a noble defence of a noble cause, and one which reflected not less honor on the ancient State of North Carolina, which gave him birth, than the young, powerful, and vigorous Commonwealth, which he now so honorably represents, in this body. I tender him, for it, the homage of my sincere thanks; and feel confident, if the citizens of his native State could have heard his able defence of their long-cherished principles, that it would have met from the great body of them, a warm and hearty response.

If, said Mr. B. the present Administration, and its friends, had loved place more, and Rome less; if they had looked more to considerations of a character, merely selfish, and less to the high and honorable dictates of elevated public duty; if they had have bowed down in abject homage to the banking interests of the country, and had consented to acknowledge their mastery over the Government, and the public will itself, then, most probably, many denunciations, that had been heard against them, would have been spared, and their path would have been less beset with difficulties, than at present. In great emergencies, the path which patriotism and public duty point to, is often difficult and rugged to tread, while that of a contrary character is more inviting, from its smooth and more alluring track. Those who were now acting as the public agents, in administering the Government, had chosen, in this great crisis, the more stern and rugged, but the more honorable, path of patriotism and official duty. They were endeavoring to raise the standard of patriotism and love of country, above the mere mercenary considerations of banks and banking interests. Their measures tended to reinstate that ancient and noble spirit of liberty, which, when its principles were endangered, scorned to calculate consequences by the sordid rule of dollars and cents. He honored sentiments such as these. He would stand by those who supported them, and was ready to share the same political fate with them, whatever it might be. The country would stand by them, unless the period had arrived when liberty had fallen from her "high estate," and the more sordid considerations of gain had triumphed over the more noble principles of our nature.

Two great political parties, said Mr. B.—one of them, occasionally, assuming different names—had divided the people of this country, from the period when the convention which framed the present Federal Constitution had assembled. Some of the leading members of that convention, who were subsequently called Federalists, entertained strong doubts of the capacity of men to govern themselves, and were in favor of conferring powers on the Federal Government, entirely at variance with a popular form, and which would have made it essentially a monarchy.

Ever distrusting either the honesty or intelligence of the people, or both, they believed that they could be governed either by fraud or force alone. The Republican party, which constituted the other great division, believed in the entire competency of men to govern themselves. They believed that the great majority of the people possessed a native sense of justice, which made them honest, and that they had intelligence enough to carry out into practice its virtuous impulses, in the management of public affairs. These leading characteristics, then, existing between the two great parties, and separating them by a line plain and broad, had been perceptible on all the important public questions which had, from that time to this, agitated the country. On the one hand, doubts and distrust of the people; on the other, confidence and an entire belief that they not only wished to do right, but had intelligence enough to know and pursue what was right.

No sooner had the Federal Constitution gone into operation, than the leading members of the Federal party, with that tact, address, and activity, which had ever distinguished it in all its mutations, and under every variety of name, sought to gain for the Government, in its practical administration, all that power which they had failed to impart to it in its written Constitution. In support of what he had said, as to the views and designs entertained by the leading members of that party, he begged permission to read a passage from the memoirs of Mr. Jefferson, in which he comments on the tendency and effect of the financial system proposed by Gen. Hamilton in seventeen hundred and ninety-one, who was then Secretary of the Treasury. He says on that subject:

"I know well, and so must be understood, that nothing like a majority in Congress had yielded to this corruption. Far from it; but a division, not very unequal, had already taken place in the honest part of that body, between the parties styled Republican and Federal. The latter, being monarchists in principle, adhered to Hamilton, of course, as their leader in that principle; and this mercenary phalanx added to them, insured him always a majority in both houses; so that the whole action of the Legislature was now under the direction of the Treasury. Still the machine was not complete. The effect of the funding system and of the assumption would be temporary, it would be lost, with the loss of the individual members whom it had enriched, and some engine of influence more permanent must be contrived, while these myrmidons were yet in place, to carry it through all opposition. This engine was the Bank of the United States. All that history is known, so I shall say nothing about it. While the Government remained at Philadelphia, a selection of members of both Houses were constantly kept as directors, who, on every question interesting to that institution, or to the views of the Federal head, voted at the will of that head, and together with the stockholding members, could always make the Federal vote that of the majority. By this combination, legislative expositions were given to the Constitution, and all the administrative laws were shaped to the model of England, and so passed. And from this influence we were not relieved until the removal from the precints of the bank to Washington."

Here, said Mr. B. we have sketched, with a pencil of light, the motives and causes which gave rise to that first fatal departure of our Government from the principles and theory of its written Constitution, and which, so far as the machinery of the entire paper system could influence its action, had been verging nearer and nearer the British model spoken of ever since its origin, unless when checked in its tendency by the resistance of Republican administrations. The liberties of the country, and its free institutions, were now literally groaning beneath the accumulated weight of banking monopolies. The prediction, so exultingly uttered by the younger Pitt, many years ago, that the funding and paper system would prove fatal to our Republic, seems to be on the point of being realized. The measure proposed by the friends of the Administration, is the only one which can reclaim our original constitutional rights, stay the march of this mighty inundation of bank power and influence, and save the free institutions of the country from being overwhelmed, in its rapid and almost resistless progress. The main objection, which had been urged by those opposed to it, partook of that distinctive character, jealousy and distrust of the people, which he had shown as belonging to one of the political parties in this country, in its origin, and in all its subsequent changes. It was an objection, which, by denying the existence of sufficient honesty and intelligence to the citizens of this country to execute its financial affairs, without the intervention of banking corporations, went to the competency of the people to govern themselves. The great argument on which the capacity of the people to govern themselves rests, is their supposed honesty and intelligence. If public officers cannot be selected from the great mass of our citizens, who are both faithful and capable, then it would seem to follow, as a necessary consequence, from this argument, mainly relied on by gentlemen in opposition, that the country was destitute of those virtues, and of that intelligence, indispensable to enable its citizens to govern themselves. It could not fail, therefore, to attract our attention, that this main objection had its origin in the earliest division of parties in this country, founded on a distrust of the people, and had, on all the great leading questions of policy and construction of the Constitution, been the point at which the two parties had almost uniformly separated.

It is an objection, not only at variance with the foundation principles of our Government, which, in its theory, supposes that its citizens are sufficiently honest and capable to carry out, in official trusts, all the powers and duties with which it is charged, but it is a direct insult to the moral sense of the country, by declaring, in effect, that the standard of individual honor, and honesty, is below that of banking corporations, whose course of action is mainly influenced by motives of cupidity and self-interest.

Mr. B. had heard, with no little surprise, the measure, contemplated in the bill, denounced as fraught with more danger than any which had been, at any time, proposed under our Government, and as being more odious than the alien and sedition law. This kind of assault had become too common to produce much impression, at this time of day. It had been the fate of almost every great measure, no matter how much recommended by considerations of public good, to encounter the same harsh language; and many of those very measures which had then been met, by much the same style of denunciation, stood now as enduring monuments of the public safety, and the public good. Nothing was easier than the use of epithets; but the proof that they are justly applied, is often more difficult.

The measure thus denounced was, said Mr. B. the system of the Constitution itself. Whatever difference of opinion may now exist, as to its policy, yet, in justice to the Constitution under which we live, in justice to its patriotic framers, it would be more becoming to be less liberal in such abuse, as it is, in effect, but a denunciation of the Constitution, and arraignment of the wisdom of those who framed it.

The bill, now under consideration, for the collecting, safe-keeping, and disbursing of the public revenue, was, in substance, but a re-enactment of the principles of the first law, passed on this subject, in seventeen hundred and eighty-nine, and immediately after the Constitution had gone into operation, and differed only in the circumstance, that the present bill is one more in detail, and more specific, in its provisions. In fact, a law, similar to this in principle, was among the first and earliest fruits put forth by the Federal Constitution. How, and under what auspices, the Government then just put into operation had afterwards taken, a new departure, with the British form of Government as its model, and the paper system, as the great auxiliary to effect the designs of those who admired it, he had already abundantly attempted to show.

It could not, remarked Mr. B. be believed, for a single moment, either from any thing on the face of the Constitution, or from any thing said or written, in the debates and essays which preceded its adoption, that the agency of banking corporations, in managing the financial affairs of the Government, ever was intended, or thought of, by its framers, for a moment. In the Constitution, not a word is said about corporations of this kind, nor is the most remote allusion, either expressly or by implication, made to them. How utterly absurd is it now to say, that a power, the most tremendous in its effects—as great in its consequences, as that to make peace and war, which has shown itself endowed with strength, not only sufficient to shake the frame of society, and throw the times sadly out of joint, but to cause the Government itself to totter to its base.—is given, by implication, in some clause of the Constitution, which those who claim it are unable to agree on, among themselves? Is it not an impeachment of the intelligence of those who framed that instrument, if banking corporations are so indispensably necessary and vital, to the management of the fiscal affairs of Government, as we are now daily and hourly told, is the case, that the power to create and employ them for that purpose, was not expressly given in some of its provisions?

The collecting, safe-keeping, and disbursing the public money, is, in each and all of its successive grades, from beginning to end, the performance of an official act and duty, under the authority of the Constitution of the United States. The kind of public agents who evidently were intended, by the framers of the Constitution, and who are expressly designated in its provisions, to execute the several kinds of official trusts, are "officers of the United States," in the language of the Constitution. Unless we adopt the solecism, that a banking corporation means an "officer," in the sense in which it is there used, it may be well doubted, whether the Government has authority to employ them as fiscal agents, because it is clearly the exercise of an official power, which the Constitution limits, according to every sound and fair rule of construction, to be executed through the agency of its own "officers."

The appointing power is clearly an Executive function, under the limitations and restrictions imposed on it by the Constitution. The second section of that instrument is the source, and only source, from which the authority of the President, to make official appointments, is derived, to that branch of the Government, and is as follows:

"He shall have power, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, to make treaties, provided two-thirds of the Senators present concur; and he shall nominate, and by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, shall appoint, ambassadors, other ministers, and consuls, judges of the Supreme Court, and all other officers of the United States, whose appointments are not herein otherwise provided for, and which shall be established by law. But the Congress may, by law, vest the appointment of such inferior officers, as they think proper, in the President alone, in the courts of law, or in the heads of departments."

Here, then, we have the extent and breadth of the Executive authority to make appointments, and, under it, "officers" constitute the only class of public agents he is authorized to appoint, to execute public trusts. If that sound and universally admitted rule of construction be correct, in expounding the Constitution, that when a power is, in express terms, conferred in that instrument, it is, in effect, a negative of all other power not given, then it follows that the provision of the Constitution, which he had cited, by designating "officers" as the official agents to be appointed by the President, to carry into effect the laws, necessarily excludes from the range of his selection banking corporations to perform official duties, because, ex vi termini, they cannot, in the sense of the Constitution, be considered as "officers." The receiving, safe-keeping, and disbursing the public money, is clearly the performance of an official duty, by whatsoever agency performed. To the Executive branch of the Government belongs, and alone belongs, under certain restrictions, the power of appointing official agents, to perform public trusts. Can he, therefore, appoint any other than that class of public agents recognised by the Constitution?

That the framers of the Constitution never once thought of banking corporations for such agency, and intended for their revenue and finance laws to be executed by any other class of agents, except through the officers of the Government, he believed, was not only most apparent from that instrument itself, but that opinion was strongly fortified by the doctrines expressed in the able and orthodox numbers written in defence of that instrument by Madison, Hamilton, and Jay. In those, of the numbers referred to, which treat of the taxing and financial powers conferred on the Government, by the Constitution, no other description of agents is mentioned, or alluded to, who were to carry into effect those trusts, but officers. Such was not only then the construction of the Constitution, by its friends, but its opponents also, who were ever on the alert to find objections, and to magnify its powers, for the purpose of preventing its adoption, and, on no occasion, so far as the essays and debates of those times inform us, conjectured that banking corporations were to be employed as a part of the fiscal machinery of the Government. If it had, for a moment, been suspected, by that great master-spirit, in the Virginia convention, of those who opposed its adoption, that the Government was to possess the power thus to enlist in its aid powerful moneyed corporations, either of its own creation, or those created under State authority, his stirring and eloquent denunciations of the dangers which it threatened to the public liberty, would, in all probability, have effected its rejection, and we should not, perhaps, have now been deliberating here under its sanction. Mr. B. was aware that the great principles which he now touched, on this subject, had not been much in fashion for many years past, and that much of the practice, under the Government, since it had gone into operation, was in opposition to them. He considered them as the foundation principles of our Government, which had, for years, been partially obscured from public observation, under the rubbish and antiquated abuses of the British paper machinery, that had been introduced in this country, at a very early period, after the Government had gone into operation. The more that the obscurity which surrounds them is removed, by discussion and investigation, the more bright and valuable these great principles become. Like a rich and inexhaustible mine, the more it is explored, the more its valuable treasures reward the researches of the laborer.

Another consideration, not less entitled to weight, in a constitutional point of view, against depositing the public money with the banks, is, that, when done, it is with the perfect understanding, on the part of the Government, that the money deposited is to form a fund, to make discounts to individuals on. Such, unquestionably, has heretofore been one among the leading inducements of those who have favored this policy, in addition to the other objects, of keeping and disbursing the public revenue, contemplated by it. Equally certain was it, that the banks themselves, who received it, did it with the perfect understanding, on their part, that they were at liberty so to make use of it, and which was, doubtless, the strongest, if not the only motive, inducing them to take it. Now he could not see any authority in the Constitution, granting to Congress power to lend the public money, or to authorize others to lend it. If Congress could authorize the banks to make loans of the public money, they could, in virtue of the same power, authorize the Secretary of the Treasury to open a loan office with the public funds, and thus enable an officer, who chose to use them for corrupt purposes, to lend them out among favorites, or those who might proffer the greatest political subservience. The Constitution gives to Congress the power to raise money, to effect certain specified purposes, which are enumerated in that instrument. The power to raise money, for the purpose of lending it, is nowhere given, and, consequently, is not one of the legitimate purposes to which it may be applied. The conclusion, then, is very fairly to be drawn, that the deposite of the public money in banking corporations, to be used in that way, is an application of the public money not warranted by the Constitution, and, most generally, proving alike disastrous to the individuals borrowing it, the banks which lend it, and the Government which thus permits its revenue to be used.

Mr. B. said that the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. WEBSTER,] had, with his usual ability, endeavored, but most unsuccessfully, as he believed, to maintain the proposition, that the Administration, in bringing forward the present measure, had abandoned all control over the question of the currency, and, in doing so, were refusing to fulfil a most important constitutional duty. He differed, most materially, with that gentleman, both as to the signification of the term "currency," when used in relation to Federal legislation, and, also, as to the effects of the measure on that question, if carried into practice. He contended that the term currency, when used in reference to paper money, was, in that sense, utterly unknown to the Constitution, and the attempt so perseveringly made to interpolate it into that instrument, was but an effort to transplant into this country, the doctrines and notions derived from the political economists of England, who used the word currency as applicable, as well to paper money there, as to other kinds of money, because their Government, possessing unlimited power, had, by its laws, so treated and recognised it. A term, therefore, which, under the broad powers of British legislation, was made to comprehend every kind of paper money, could not, with propriety or accuracy, be used here, to explain away the well defined powers of our own limited Constitution. The word currency was nowhere to be found in any provision of that instrument, but the word "money" often occurred in it. What it meant, and that the Government of the United States was intended to be a hard money Government, the words of the Constitution, plain and explicit in themselves, and the cotemporaneous writings and circumstances of that day, proved, beyond all manner of doubt.

The Constitution gives to the Federal Government the power "to coin money, regulate the value thereof, and of foreign coin." By the words used, we are left in no doubt as to the signification of the word "money," as here used, and that it was intended to establish a hard money currency by the framers of the Constitution. The term "money" being used in this sense, in that part of the Constitution just quoted, and which is the first place in that instrument in which it occurs, it necessarily has the same signification affixed to it, in all the clauses of the Constitution that it subsequently occurs in. The Constitution having conferred, in express terms, the entire control over the hard money currency of the country, as a consequence, which clearly results from that grant of power, had denied to the Government authority to establish any other kind of money, as a currency; for no rule has been more universally conceded, by men of all parties, than that, in construing the provisions of a Constitution of limited and delegated powers, when a power in relation to any one subject is expressly granted, that all other power in respect to it, not granted, is, in effect, denied. By this rule, then, which is an admitted one for testing the meaning of the Constitution, the Government of the United States is denied the power to establish, or to authorize, the establishing of, any thing else, as money, except that which it is expressly empowered to do, and is, consequently, without the power to create a paper currency.

If, however, any doubt still remained, as to the power of the Government to establish a paper currency, that part of the Constitution giving it power to "provide for the punishment of counterfeiting the securities and current coin of the United States," must effectually remove it, and settle the question against such power. According to the rule which he had laid down already, in construing the Constitution, that the granting, by express provision, a power in relation to any one subject, was, in effect, a denial of any other, or further power, in respect to it, than that granted, it followed that no authority existed in the Federal Government to punish for any other description of counterfeiting than that mentioned in the provision he had cited, and, by consequence, that the Government has no right to pass a law to punish the counterfeiting of notes, either of a bank of its own creation, or of State banks. Now, if the Constitution gave no authority to Congress to pass laws to punish the counterfeiting of bank notes, (and that it did not, was, he believed, the opinion of some of the most eminent statesmen in our country,) could it be believed, for a single moment, that it ever was the intention of its framers to give the Government the power to establish a paper currency, or any other than the "current coin," as a circulating medium, which it empowers Congress to punish the counterfeiting of? If this interpretation of the Constitution be right, is it not absurd, in the highest degree, to suppose that it ever was intended that the Federal Government should have power to establish a paper currency? a currency which, if it had the right to create at all, would necessarily be receivable in payment of all the public dues, would become a medium of circulation throughout the country, and, from every consideration of individual, as well as public interest, would require protection by law from being counterfeited. That the Constitution authorized the passage of no law to protect it, was, to his mind, an unanswerable argument that it never was intended that the Government should authorize the issue of bank notes, otherwise it would have been mentioned in the same provision that gives the power to punish the counterfeiting of "the current coin."

Having touched on that branch of the question, having relation to the power of the Government to create, under its own authority, a paper currency, the other branch of it, whether the framers of the Constitution ever intended paper, of any description, to be receivable at all, in payment of the public dues, may well admit of great question. The receiving of notes issued by State banks, and over which the Government of the United States has no control whatsoever, possessing not even the power to punish for counterfeiting them, is an anomaly in Government finance, and is, perhaps, unknown in the history of any other country. The power to protect its revenue from frauds, is one of the most essential attributes of all well-regulated Governments. To protect the money which it receives, as revenue, from being counterfeited, is one of the most important means of preventing such frauds, yet the Government, if it receives the paper of the State banks, is entirely powerless to its protection, in that respect. Whether it was intended, when the Constitution was formed that the Government should receive paper money of any kind, in payment of public dues, he repeated, admitted of great doubt.

Looking beyond the arguments drawn from a fair interpretation of the Constitution itself, the history of the times, preceding its adoption, might, with safety, be appealed to, in confirmation of such opinion. One of the great, and almost overpowering, difficulties which the old Congress, under the Articles of Confederation, had to contend with, was the depreciated paper money of that day. If he did not err in his recollection, the letters of Gen. Washington, addressed to the Continental Congress, teemed with complaints of the embarrassments which he experienced in defending the country, in the war of the Revolution, occasioned by depreciated paper money. To check this evil was afterwards among the most powerful considerations urged in behalf of adopting the present Federal Constitution.

In the forty-fourth number of the essays, to which he had before referred, written in favor of its adoption, the writer of that number, (who was Mr. Madison,) after treating on the propriety of conferring on the Government the power of regulating the coins, and the necessity of prohibiting the emission of bills of credit by the States, dwells on the "pestilent effects of paper money on the necessary confidence between man and man, on the necessary confidence in the public councils, on the industry and morals of the people, and on the character of Republican Government;" thus confirming, by these strong expressions, as to the pernicious tendency of the paper system, the belief that the framers of the Constitution never intended to recognise it, in any shape, as a constitutional currency. It was, also, a part of the history of the times, to which he had referred, that, in no particular, was the system of policy, at that time prevailing in England, more odious to the people of this country, than on account of the abuses practised, under the system of exclusive privileges and monopolies, which were fostered by that Government. Can it, then, be believed, that the patriotic men, who had just successfully carried the country through the war of independence, intended to adopt, in the Constitution formed by them, one of the most odious features in the policy of the country, against which they had successfully contended, by placing the Government under the control of irresponsible banking corporations, as to the receipt of its dues, and the management of its fiscal affairs? He repeated, that the circumstances in which the Constitution originated, the concurrent history of the times, and the obvious meaning of the instrument itself, all went to repudiate the construction, now sought to be given, to the powers of the Government, on this question. It was the Senator from Massachusetts, and his political friends, who were for abandoning all control over the true constitutional currency of the country. It was the Senator, and his political friends, who were for destroying the only true standard of value, driving the Government from its "moorings," and embarking the vessel of State, freighted with the best hopes and dearest interests of the nation, on the deceitful and tempestuous waves of the paper system.

Mr. B. said that it was his most sincere and solemn conviction, that the great question now at issue, involved in it the liberty and independence of the country. It is a question of no less importance, than whether the people shall continue to govern themselves, or whether they shall quietly resign themselves to be governed by bank monopolies. What, sir, said he, do we hear from all quarters, in and out of Congress, in speeches, and in newspapers, devoted to the support of the banks? Why, that the revenue of the Government must be given up to them, or that the Administration must be expelled from power. It is demanded, in language bold and insolent, and the price of refusal, is threatened expulsion from power. Is it not with this view, and to attain this end, that the banks refuse to resume specie payments? Is it not for the purpose of placing the will of the nation, and, through it, that of the Congress of the United States, in a kind of moral and political duress, that this measure, so important to the restoration of confidence, and of general prosperity in every branch of business, is so wantonly and unnecessarily delayed? Is it not, by this course of measures, intended to bring the whole force and energies of the moneyed power to bear on the decision of the country, and of the constituted authorities, in relation to this subject? It was a matter which ought to attract the earnest attention of the people of this country, that, for the last four or five years, no sooner had Congress assembled to deliberate on the affairs of the country, at each session, than the cries of distress and pecuniary embarrassment were echoed and re-echoed from one part of the nation to the other, by the partisan presses of the banks, and of the Opposition. This could not be a mere casual coincidence, for it had happened too frequently, and been repeated too often, to be the mere effect of accident. It indicated clearly, to his mind, that there was a power secretly and perseveringly at work, in this country, to establish its own supremacy over the public will, and to control the regular operations of the Government. Entertaining these views on the subject, he should consider that he would be guilty of a treasonable dereliction of duty to the public liberties and interests, if he were not to resist such an attempt, as far as he could.

While the banks occupied the hostile and menacing attitude towards the Government and the people, which they did at present, he, for one, even if true policy required that the revenues of the Government should be deposited with them, which he denied, would resist their bold and dangerous pretensions. While they were thundering at the doors of the Capitol, and their partisans were arrogantly demanding a surrender of the public treasures, to be placed in their keeping, he would enter into no parley with them, nor make any terms. It was the duty of the friends of free Government to take a firm and determined stand at the Thermopylæ of the Constitution, and to defend the passes to it against the hosts and legions that are marching on it, under the banners of the moneyed power.

That the banks, or that portion of them who were controlled by the United States Bank of Pennsylvania, were delaying a resumption of specie payments, with a view to act on the public mind, on the great question now at issue, he could not permit himself to doubt. The period when the sound portion of them could resume with safety, had almost universally been agreed to be, by the ablest financiers of the country, that at which the exchanges between this country and England should fall down to par. Bills on England, according to the latest prices current, in the city of New York, had not only fallen to par, but, agreeably to a specie standard, were estimated, at that time, to be four per cent. in our favor, an occurrence almost without example in our commercial history. The effect of this state of things, then, is effectually to prevent the exportation of specie from our own country, the demand for which formerly to send abroad was the chief pretext of the banks for suspending payments. The effect of this favorable state of exchanges, is not only to prevent specie from being carried abroad, but to induce the importation of large sums of the precious metals, from foreign nations, into this country. That this state of things afforded the proper occasion for a resumption by the banks, and that they had no right, and could not, with propriety, make any anticipated action of Congress the pretext for a postponement, he begged leave to read two extracts from the report of the delegates of the banks of the city of New York to the Bank Convention, which assembled in November last. The delegates, whose names were signed to this report, were composed of men from both the great political parties, and were eminent for their commercial experience and information. Among them was the name of Albert Gallatin, who, though understood to be opposed to the Administration, was yet, by all, admitted to be a most able financier.

And first, as to the pretext of postponing on account of awaiting the favorable action of Congress. The report says:

> When we see such extensive, general, and, we may say, intolerable, evils, flowing from a general suspension of specie payments by the banks, it is monstrous to suppose that, if they are able to resume, and sustain such payments, they should have any discretionary right to decide, or even to discuss, the question, whether a more or less protracted suspension is consistent with their own views of "the condition and circumstances of the country." There would be no limit to such supposed discretion. Thus, for instance, should the hope of a favorable action of Congress on the currency be still alleged as a motive for delay, would not this be tantamount to a protracted suspension for an indefinite period of time?
> The banks are bound, by the strongest legal and moral obligations, to resume specie payments whenever they are able to maintain such payments. It is the paramount duty to which every other consideration must yield. Their ability to perform that duty, is the only question which they have a right to discuss, and which they are bound to examine with the utmost care and candor.

And again, on the question of exchanges, and that they were, in November last, highly favorable to a resumption, even at that time. The following language is used:

> At the very time when the convention was deliberating, the exchange on London, which had been as high as 121, had fallen to 114, nominal: and the true par being a fraction above 109½ nominal, the exchange was in fact but four per cent. above par in city bank paper. But that paper was itself at five per cent. below specie; and the rate of exchange was, therefore, one per cent. below specie par. In other words, any given quantity of New York bank notes could purchase bills on London, exceeding by one per cent. the corresponding amount in specie which the same quantity of bank notes could purchase. Ninety-nine gold sovereigns cost as much as a bill on London of one hundred pounds sterling. Under such circumstances, specie could not be exported without a loss, and accordingly the exportation had altogether ceased. It is well known that, within a week after the adjournment of the convention, a further fall had reduced the rate of exchange to 111½ nominal; that is to say, to 2½ per cent. below the true specie par; and within less than 2 per cent. of being at par with New York bank notes. But, reverting to the time when the convention was sitting, the requisite alteration was no longer a matter of conjecture; and the fact that the exchange had fallen below the true specie par, and that the exportation of specie had ceased, had already taken place.
>
> Apprehensions were nevertheless expressed, of the effect which large importations of grain and merchandise might hereafter have on the foreign exchanges, and of an expected drain of specie for the China trade. It appeared to us that if, after the principal acknowledged cause of the suspension, and which presented the greatest obstacle to the resumption, had actually ceased to operate, we were permitted to allege conjectures and contingencies, as a proper ground for protracting the suspension, there was no time at which some plausible reasons of a similar character might not be adduced, and the resumption be indefinitely postponed.
>
> With respect to the danger of excessive importations, it might indeed be apprehended that whenever the pressure of the foreign debt was removed, the commercial community might, with its characteristic energetic spirit of enterprise, resume its business too soon, and on too large a scale. And it is, on that account, highly important that the banks should seize eagerly that eventful moment, and, as it may be called, the turn of the tide, for an immediate resumption, before new undertakings may raise new obstacles to the accomplishment of that object.
> The danger of unfavorable exchanges, and of an extraordinary exportation of specie, being now out of question, what other causes could impair the ability of the banks, generally, or in some sections of the country, to resume specie payments within a very short period?

Here, then, said Mr. B. the ground is distinctly taken, that the banks, under their solemn obligations to the country, to resume specie payments, have no discretionary right to look to, or even to discuss, any thing beyond the question of their ability to resume and maintain them. These able and experienced merchants and financiers had not discovered, with the Senator from Virginia, [Mr. RIVES,] and the Senator from New York, [Mr. TALLMADGE,] that it was necessary for the Government to extend "a helping hand" to the banks, preparatory to a resumption. What right had they to call on the Government to re-establish them in the public confidence, before they had shown that they had used every proper exertion to entitle themselves to it? With what justice or propriety could they call on Hercules, to aid them in getting out of their present difficulties, before they had put their own shoulders to the wheel? Why had they not availed themselves of the rapid specie current, which had been, for some time past, and was now, setting in the direction of this country, from Europe, and invested some of their enormous profits in it, to enable them to resume? Or was it now to become the doctrine, that, to keep up what had been falsely called the credit system, the Government was to do every thing, and the banks nothing, and that the country is to submit to all the sacrifices incident to a suspension of specie payments, while the banks are to make none to relieve it from such a calamity?

The charge that the Administration had made war against the banks, and the credit system of the country, Mr. B. considered utterly groundless and untenable. The very reverse was the fact. The Government, after having filled the coffers of many of those institutions with its specie funds, had, in the eloquent language of the Senator from Ohio, [Mr. ALLEN,] been struck down in a single night, by the determination of the banks of the city of New York, to suspend specie payments, and its operations paralyzed, from inability to command its revenues. In doing this, they had trampled under foot the most sacred stipulations in their charters, and assumed a power which none but sovereignty itself is capable of exerting, that of suspending the laws of the land. The Bank of England, with all its strength and power, had not dared thus to outrage public sentiment, when it suspended specie payments in 1796, but had paid a deference to that, and the laws under which it existed, by first applying for, and obtaining, an order of council to that effect. The plea of necessity was no justification for the suspension of law, and that in a time of profound peace. So sacred is this principle in a Republic, that no necessity, however strong, can justify a departure from it, unless in an extreme case, in a state of war, when the paramount consideration of the public safety might make it necessary.

The dispensing power, even by the sovereigns of England, had been resorted to only in the most arbitrary reigns. It had ever been considered an odious exercise of power by them, to turn aside the law from its ordinary operation, and had, among other offences, occasioned the loss of the crown to the Stuart family. When corporations assumed the exercise of this high power, by which consequences so disastrous to the country had happened, the charge which had been made against the Administration, of making war upon them, and wishing to violate their rights, came with a very ill grace from those by whom it was preferred.

When individuals violate the laws, they are punished, and the penalty for their offences is generally enforced; but when a great moneyed corporation sets them at defiance, it almost brings reproach and denunciation on the individual who ventures to speak of their accountability to the laws of the land.

> "Plate sin with gold,
> And the strong lance of justice hurtless breaks;
> Arm it in rags, and a pigmy's straw doth pierce it."

In a Government professing to be Republican, this should be otherwise; and the most powerful corporations, as well as the humblest individual, should be practically amenable to the laws.

He would now notice a charge, which it was becoming quite fashionable, in a certain quarter, to make against the supporters of the policy of the present Administration, and particularly in reference to the present question. It was by no means unusual to hear the names of Agrarians, Loco Focos, and such other epithets as often decorate the vocabulary of a certain political party, applied to those who think it their duty to support the present measure. If it was meant by this to convey the idea, that the great body of those who supported it, were in favor of violating the rights of property, or of the sacred principles of justice, in reference to individual rights, then he should not hesitate to speak of it, as it deserved, and as a gross libel on the great body of the Democracy of the country. If there be any class, whose doctrines favor a violation of the rights of property among us, it is to be found among those who are the advocates of dangerous monopolies and privileges. If there be any class of politicians among us, whose doctrines favor the interests of the few, at the expense of the many, it is that class, who, under the pretext of supporting what is most erroneously called the credit system, encourage a fraudulent system of banking. That such a system is the readiest way to defraud men of their honest earnings, and is but a system of legalized plunder, there can be no doubt. Of an honest system of banking, he did not speak, which, however, is very rare; but he spoke of that system which had been long prevalent in many parts of this country. He repeated, that those who were opposed to this system of monopolies and privileges, were the real advocates of the rights of property and of social order, which were more in danger of being violated and overthrown by the grasping spirit and demoralizing influence of monopolies, than from any other cause.

The spirit of monopoly is but true to its interests, when it denounced all, who are opposed to its unhallowed designs, as levellers, and as enemies of property and social order. It is here, as in England, where the privileged orders brand those who seek to effect a reform of ancient abuses, as levellers and enemies of property, with the exception that those who endeavor to imitate them in these denunciations, in this country, afford but a poor specimen of any thing like even a mimicry of their English models, much less of the substance and reality of an aristocracy, and in this country, can never fail to inspire, while our free government exists, but one emotion, and that the very opposite of respect. Mr. B. said, that the same men, who, in this country, were found indulging in these kinds of epithets against those who advocated the doctrines of the present Administration on this question, would most probably, if on the other side of the Atlantic, be found advocating there the pretensions of privileged classes, and titled orders.

If there were any, in the ranks of the friends of the Administration, who had ever, in any way, advocated the doctrines now sought to be imputed to the party generally, he had yet to know them. But even suppose that a few were to be found in their ranks, absurd enough to entertain such opinions, which he did not believe, why, it would only prove what we all know already, that there are a few, among all parties, who possess notions of every variety of absurdity. Would this, therefore, be a ground on which to impute such opinions to the same party, generally? Why, if it were, how would the old Federal party stand? It is now no longer a matter of doubt, but that some of them were monarchists in principle. How would the present Opposition stand? Some of their partizans, as he should presently show, had attacked the very principles on which popular Government rests. According to the rule, by which it is sought to impute to the great body of the friends of the Administration, the doctrines of a few, and to make them answerable for them, it might, with equal fairness, be alleged, that the Opposition advocated doctrines tending to monarchy. He, however, was far, very far, from imputing to them, as a party, such doctrines; and, on the contrary, had entire confidence, that the great body of them were governed by motives of patriotism. He had, in repelling the charge made on his party, only given this as an illustration of the injustice of charging a whole party with the absurdities of a few, who might happen to be among them.

Who, he would ask, were the supporters mainly of the present Administration? They were to be found mostly among that class of citizens, engaged in the peaceful and honorable pursuits of agriculture. Men who were ever ready to fly to the support of the standard of the law, not only from motives of patriotism, but because all that was most dear to them, was under the protection of the law. The friends of the Administration had as strong motives, not only from love of country, but from motives of interest, to resist attacks on the rights of property, as the Opposition. He believed they would lose quite as much, by the prevalence of agrarian principles, as would be lost on the other side. Not, perhaps, so much of that kind of wealth which is often imaginary, consisting in stocks and funds, and which not unfrequently, by its fluctuations and uncertainty, by broken banks or otherwise, takes wings in the course of a few hours, and leaves its possessor "poor indeed;" but more, he believed, in the aggregate, of that solid, substantial interest in the soil of the country, which is identical with patriotism itself. Where, on the contrary, were the opponents of the Aministration to be mostly found? Chiefly, he believed, in cities and towns; and, although he did not doubt, but that many among that kind of population, were as patriotic and devoted to the cause of the country, and the great principles of civil liberty, as those of any other, yet a very large portion of them were necessarily mere dependants on the smiles and favors of that class, and of those interests, which controlled the machinery of the paper system, in all its ramifications, from brokers and stockjobbers, up to banking monopolies themselves.

It had been said, in the course of the debate, that the banking system could exist nowhere but in a free Government, and that it was necessary to the advancement of civilization, and to the existence of free goverment. He denied both the facts and the conclusions drawn from them. He asserted, and would maintain, the very reverse to be true, and more especially in regard to the question of free government. He had, from a very early period of his life, doubted whether banking institutions were at all compatible with the existence of a truly republican form of government, and whether they would not eventually, if not greatly checked, overthrow it entirely. The facts that were daily transpiring in this country, and the daring and insolent pretensions that were now openly set up by those interests, as they had increased and grown stronger, confirmed him more and more in that opinion. That doctrines, alarming to the people of this country, and threatening a change in substance, if not in the form, of our Government, were rapidly gaining ground, he entertained the firmest conviction. During the greater part of the existence of the late Administration, and since the present one has come into power, almost the entire Opposition press, as well as many of those of the same party in high public stations, have been in the habit of indirectly assaulting the capacity of the people for self-government, by sarcasms and attacks on their intelligence. Doctrines are now boldly announced on this subject, which, but a few years since, were scarcely heard in whispers, and that would then have startled the public mind.

He had recently seen an essay, over the signature of "Sidney," republished from the Commercial Advertiser, one of the leading Opposition papers, edited in the city of New York, which he considered as signally indicative of the "signs of the times," and as showing the tendency of the anti-republican sentiments to which he had alluded. However averse he was generally to introducing topics into debate having relation to newspapers, he felt that he should stand excused, as well from the high character which the editor ascribes to the writer of the article in question, as from the examples of gentlemen in Opposition, some of whom have occasionally introduced to our attention, articles from the leading Administration paper of this city. The editor of the Commercial Advertiser, in publishing the celebrated essay in question, and which, as I learn, produced, at the time, a sentiment of strong indignation among the Republicans of that city, speaks in the highest terms of the character of the individual who wrote it, and as coming from the pen of one whose "age and wisdom have given us here, a chapter of invaluable warning and advice." He proposed to read one or two extracts from this "chapter of invaluable warning and advice," and it would be seen that it is a bold and direct assault on our popular form of Government, and is, in effect, the advocacy of a change in the system, which shall give power to the few, and take it from the people. The writer of the essay alluded to says:

> The framers of the Constitution supposed that an intelligent people, Republican in principle, would be guided by their own interest to consult the public interest, and that they would select the best men in the community to make and execute the laws. It was not supposed that a majority of the people could mistake their true interest, nor voluntarily take any steps which should endanger their own liberties and the public safety.
> In these opinions, our patriotic statesmen were most wofully mistaken. However true it may be that the people of any State or nation sincerely desire the best good of the whole community, or that it is always their will and intention that the affairs of the public should be conducted with integrity and wisdom, yet, hitherto, the means of carrying that will into effect have not been discovered, or found practicable, in any free Government; at least not in any degree approaching to the perfection intended by the framers of the Constitution. There always have been disturbing causes in the community, which have given a wrong direction to the public will or national councils. Even when no evil purposes exist to pervert the public mind, the people may be uninformed or misinformed, and make a bad choice of rulers; but where competitions for honors and office produce high excitement, it cannot be supposed that the people will escape delusion. True policy requires that men should never confide in those who flatter them, yet the fact is, they do always confide in them. Men who court and flatter the people, always do it for their personal or private interest, under the disguise of the public interest; and the people, in supporting them, mean to promote the public interest, when they are sacrificing the public good to the exaltation of their favorites. They are always deceived. This fact, which is as true in this country as it has been in every Republic since men emerged from the rude state of savages, proves incontestibly that a large part of men have not the intelligence or discernment which is necessary to guide them to the pursuit of their best interest in government.
> The people, it is true, when they feel calamity, may change their rulers; but the remedy comes too late. Sound policy forbids to wait for the miseries of a nation to produce a change of councils; it forbids to suffer the evil, before a guard is provided against the wickedness or weakness which may produce it. A form of government which has no better corrective of public disorders than this, is a burlesque on the reason and intelligence of men; it is as incompatible with wisdom as it is with public prosperity and happiness.

And again, the writer uses the following language:

> It is wonderful to observe how little the mass of our population attend to the causes of our public evils. Public speakers, orators, writers in newspapers, are perpetually clamoring about the derangement of commerce and the currency, and wondering how such general distress can have fallen upon the country, under a Constitution which is lauded as the admiration of the world. But there is nothing wonderful or strange in these events. It is in vain that men attempt to disguise the truth; the fact, beyond all debate, is, that the disorders in our political affairs are the genuine and natural consequences of defects in the Constitution, and of the false and visionary opinions which Mr. Jefferson and his disciples have been proclaiming for forty years. And if the citizens of this country expect a radical cure for these evils in a change of men in our councils, and an upright, impartial, and wise administration, with a system of just and stable laws, without essential alterations in the Constitution, they will be wofully disappointed."

Here, then, said Mr. B. we have a direct assault on the intelligence of the people, and on our present form of Government. It derives an importance far beyond an ordinary newspaper essay, from the distinction and character ascribed by its editor to its author. It is but one of the many proofs of the existence of this anti-republican spirit, which has grown with the growth, and strengthened with the strength, of the paper system in this country.

He would now return to the discussion of the topic already alluded to, the influence of the paper system on free Government, and its alleged necessity to the progress of civilization. When gentlemen referred us to England, as an example of what the paper system had done for free Government, their ideas of free Government and his were greatly at variance. He doubted whether the great mass of any people on earth were more ground down by privileged orders, monopolies, and an oppressive system of taxation, than in England. He doubted whether there was any people, where the laboring classes had so much of their earnings taken from them, and so little left to themselves and families to subsist on.

This was the very essence of despotism; the free-enjoyment of the fruits of one's labor being among the greatest blessings of government. Was that Government, he would ask, free that permitted an established church to wring from its citizens, whether they were of its faith or not, millions to pamper its clergy in pride and luxury? Was that Government free, which, to gratify cupidity and ambition, had desolated Ireland and India in blood and carnage? And again, he would ask, was that Government a fit model to be appealed to, on questions of freedom, whose citizens were not permitted to hold meetings on public affairs, without first obtaining permission from magistrates, or being liable to be shot down and dispersed by a military force?

The comparative influence of the paper system, and of a currency mostly metallic, on the general prosperity and moral condition of nations, was strikingly exhibited by looking at the state of things in England and France. In England, pauperism exists to a much greater extent than in the latter country, it being estimated that nearly one-third of her population are in that condition. A judicious English writer, in a late publication on France, computed that in England and Wales, with a population of not more than half that of France, more than double the amount of crime is annually committed. That this may be, in part, the effect of other causes, is probable; but that it is mainly the effect of the much greater prevalence of the paper system, and of other monopolies in England, he had no doubt. Their tendency being to raise the few, at the expense of the many, and consequently to degrade and impoverish the mass of the population. France has very much diminished the oppressions practised by her church orders before the revolution; has abolished hereditary peerages, and in every respect greatly elevated and improved the condition of her people. If a greater degree of happiness among the mass of a country's population, smaller burthens on its labor, and a more general diffusion of prosperity through all ranks, afford proofs of greater freedom, then she may undoubtedly claim superiority over England in that respect. Descended, as most of the people of this country were, from the latter; subject, to a great extent, to the same customs, and speaking the same language, it was easy to account for this prejudice in favor of her institutions, which was, he feared, too much on the increase. In his opinion, the Republican institutions of America had more to fear from that dangerous partiality to her institutions, which was constantly insinuating itself through the channels of her commerce, her law, and her literature, than from all other causes combined. And not among the least dangerous symptoms of the operation of these causes, is the almost constant reference to her as an example of freedom. He had no feelings of unkindness or dislike to England; and while he could see much in her character to admire, he could see but little in her form of Government, or its administration, that deserved to be copied. A distinguished writer of this country, [Mr. Cooper,] who had resided some time in England, in a late work on that country, while he asserts the existence of the most settled hate among the higher classes there to our free institutions, rebukes, in a truly American spirit, the feelings of subserviency towards her which too many of our citizens are in the habit of manifesting, and particularly those who are aspirants for literary fame.

In the Republics of Switzerland, which had maintained their freedom longer and more steadily than any other people of Europe, he believed a metallic currency had chiefly prevailed. When gentlemen asserted that the hard money system had existed in certain despotic Governments in Europe, they forget to inform us that the banking system exists also under the Government of the Russian Autocrat, the most decidedly despotic of any of the great powers in Europe. So far from the fact, that banking institutions have existed only in free countries, he doubted whether they had ever existed in any country at all, whose institutions deserved the name of being called free, except in the United States, where they were rapidly preparing the way, if not checked, for an essential change in the Government. He challenged any one to produce a single example of a country in Europe, where banks had existed, which was not, either in form or in essence, a monarchy or an aristocracy, whatever names they may have assumed.

On the question of the paper money system, as being necessary to civilization, he would only refer to the ancient republics, and more especially to the republics of Greece. Among them, he believed, a gold and silver currency had prevailed, almost entirely; and, in all the more noble arts of civilization, what people had ever excelled them, or, in many respects, equalled them? In sculpture, architecture, poetry, and eloquence, the highest fruits of civilization, their great examples, even at this day, stood "unimitated, because inimitable." In modern times, what country had excelled France, in all the noble arts of peace and war, nine-tenths of whose circulation is said to consist of gold and silver; the paper system existing there, to a very shall and limited extent, in comparison to her great resources. In America, from the year seventeen hundred and ninety, to eighteen hundred and six, was precisely that period, when our advance in wealth and improvement was greater, perhaps, than at any time since, and when gold and silver constituted the chief currency. It was true, that the old United States Bank was, most of that time, in existence, and a few State banks, but that their notes, he believed, were in their circulation, confined mostly to the commercial cities, and constituted but a small portion of the currency among the people of the country, most of which was in hard money. This establishes the important fact, that the period in our history, as a nation, which was precisely that of our greatest improvement in wealth and prosperity, was the period when we had the least bank paper, and the most gold and silver currency, in proportion to the amount of money in circulation. That circumstance must forever put to flight the absurd idea, that the present credit system, as the banking system, which is now so universally in operation, is falsely called, is necessary to the prosperity of the country. Opinions in opposition to the paper system, now so much derided by those in favor of it, were not new. On the contrary, they were the doctrines of some of the most illustrious Republican statesmen which this or any other country has ever produced; and in all the great qualities, which entitle men to respect and reverence, they would not, to say the least of it, suffer by a comparison with any of the members of that party, from whom these reproaches now come.

It had been insisted on, in the course of this debate, by many gentlemen opposed to the present bill, that this country was mainly indebted for her great prosperity to the paper system, and that, without it, it would have been far in the rear of its present advanced condition. Mr. B. said he should feel humiliated, as a citizen of this free Republic, if he were to admit that banking monopolies were the great sources of her prosperity. Gentlemen, in their great and eager anxiety to ascribe all the honor of these results to the paper system, had passed by our noble institutions, based, as they were, on equal rights; had passed by our wide-spreading and fertile soil, which, by its abundant reward of labor, invited industry; and they seemed to forget, that the great secret of our success, as a people, is, that labor is lightly burdened in all its branches, and its fruits secured, by our admirable form of Government, to every citizen earning them, from the highest down to the humblest. Gentlemen, in maintaining these doctrines, labor to despoil industry of the credit due to it; enterprise of its achievements, and our noble institutions of the honors which belong to them; and with a zeal little deserved, offer them up at the shrine of the paper system—the god of their idolatry. It was, in his humble opinion, a false god, and not one of the true political faith.

Great apprehensions are affected to be entertained for the safety of the entire banking system, by some of those opposed to this measure. The imagination had been copiously drawn upon, to prove that the whole system would fall into ruins, and bring universal distress on the country, if the present measure succeeds. He could assure those who entertained such opinions, if they were serious in urging them, that they might dismiss all their apprehensions for the safety of the system. In the present condition of the banking system in this country, in its wide-spread influence, in the deep and thorough root it has taken, it would be almost as hopeless and as vain a task for its overthrow to be undertaken, as the attempt would be to move the lofty Alleghanies from their base. No, no, sir, said Mr. B. the danger does not lie on that side. The true danger is, not that the system will be overthrown, but that the evil will more and more spread, and overshadow the whole land by its mighty influence. Like the corroding cancer, in its effects on the natural system, it is more likely to eat its way through the body politic, and destroy its victim, than to be itself destroyed, even by the most potent medicine.

But even if there were any grounds for apprehending the overthrow of the system, of which there was not the slightest, he should be far from regarding it as a great calamity, either in a political, moral, or commercial point of view. Notwithstanding the alarms that were constantly expressed, as to the distress and embarrassment that would attend the introduction of a general metallic currency, he ventured to express the opinion, and was convinced of its entire truth, that it would not, if it were by a gradual process, through a series of six years for instance, began and completed, produce as great changes in the value of property, and as much embarrassment, as follow one of those single revulsions, which take place periodically every twelve or fifteen years in every country where the paper system exists. For instance, in the disasters of 1818 and 1837, occasioned by the banks, who can doubt but they produced a greater sacrifice of individual fortune than a system gradually introducing an entire metallic currency would have done? The loss, when once encountered, and it would be, in his opinion, far less than is generally supposed, would end with a single shock, and would be followed by certainty and stability, in every branch of business and trade. Not so is it with the paper system. It is followed by another, and yet another, and is but a succession of shocks to private credit and public prosperity. It would be a matter of curious inquiry to estimate, as near as practicable, the difference between the probable losses occasioned to a nation by these periodical disasters of the paper system, for the space of a century, and those occasioned by the more stable and uniform currency of gold and silver.

He would notice, briefly, a most gross delusion, which it was attempted to propagate and impose on the people of this country, in relation to the quantity of the precious metals, estimated to be now in possession of the different nations of the world. It was no unusual thing to see statements in the newspapers of this country, opposed to a further increase of metallic currency, declaring that there was not, among all nations together, a sufficient quantity of gold and silver to supply the people of the United States with a currency exclusively of that kind. Assertions equally in opposition to well ascertained facts on this subject, but not altogether so grossly erroneous as that he had just noticed, had been made in the progress of this debate. Mr. B. said, that much imputation and ridicule had been cast on those who were endeavoring to reform the currency, by the liberal use of the epithets imposture, humbugs, and such other classical phrases, not very much to his taste, and in using which, he but followed the example set in a certain quarter. But he would say, that those who had endeavored to make the erroneous impressions, in relation to the quantity of gold and silver, to which he had alluded, had by far excelled and outstripped all others, in the practices of which they accused them, and were entitled to the highest distinctions over all competitors, for their achievements in the arts of humbugging. He proposed to dispel what, he would again repeat, was a most gross delusion on this subject, by referring to the information furnished from sources entitled to the greatest respect and authority, on questions of finance and currency. Mr. Gallatin, in his able treatise on these questions, published in 1830, estimates the whole amount of gold and silver coin possessed, at that time, by the different nations of the world, at the enormous amount of between four and five thousand millions of dollars.

Agreeably to the same high authority, there was then in circulation, from hand to hand, in England alone, the sum of one hundred and fifty millions of specie, besides the amount possessed by her banks.

It appears from a table appended to the annual report to Congress of the Secretary of the Treasury, made in 1834, that France alone had, at that time, five hundred and twenty-seven millions of dollars in specie in circulation. This document is based on authentic data, derived from the best authorities of that country. In his last annual report, the Secretary of the Treasury estimates our whole circulation in paper, throughout the United States, to have been, on the first of January, 1837, one hundred and fifty-one or two millions of dollars; and in his annual report of 1836, he estimates the amount of specie then in circulation to have been twenty-eight millions of dollars, besides that possessed by the banks. The amount of paper money in circulation has been, since that period, greatly reduced by the curtailments of the banks, and the amount of specie in circulation has, no doubt, been likewise much lessened. He would, however, select the two years he had just named as affording, the one the largest paper circulation which had ever taken place in this country, and the other the largest specie circulation known in it, perhaps, in any one year. By adding the two together, they will make the entire circulation, in paper and coin, about that period, in the whole United States, one hundred and eighty millions of dollars, a sum not much larger than the amount of specie in circulation, from hand to hand, in England, and very little more than one-third as large as the entire specie currency of France.

Without pretending to be skilled in questions of finance, it may, said Mr. B. be very safely assumed, that two hundred millions of dollars would furnish a very ample amount of currency for the whole people of the United States, as he had just shown that the maximum amount of money, of all kinds, which had been in circulation, at any one time, in this country, did not exceed one hundred and eighty millions of dollars, and that at a period so recent that our population has since undergone but little increase.

It did not require as large an amount of currency in this country, in proportion to our population, as it did in some of the older and wealthier States of Europe, for the additional reason that the revenue of the Government here, is small in proportion to many of the wealthy nations there. In France and England, for instance, in each of which the revenue of Government is very large, and which circumstance creates a very great demand for money, beyond the wants of trade and commerce, the quantity of currency required to meet it, must necessarily be greater, in proportion to population, than in a country like ours, where the Government demand is comparatively small.

These facts afforded a complete refutation of the groundless assertions, so frequently made, in reference to this subject; and showed, as he thought, most conclusively, that, by a most impolitic course of legislation in this country, both by the States and the Federal Government, that we had been, as a nation, most unjustly deprived of our due share of the precious metals, and possessed a smaller share of them, in proportion to our commerce and resources, than any one of the great commercial nations in Europe. While gentlemen were so eloquent in their denunciations of what they, erroneously, called one currency for the people and another for the Government, was it not worthy of their serious attention and consideration, that the effect of the doctrines and system, which they now contended for, was, to aid in giving a better currency to the subjects of the monarchs of Europe, and a baser and inferior one to the citizens of our own country, by the effectual banishment of gold and silver from the United States?

Mr. B. said, in bringing forward the facts and arguments adduced by him, in relation to gold and silver, he repeated that it was not with the most remote expectation, that a currency of that kind, would ever entirely supersede the paper system here, for he regarded the alarms that were expressed for the fate of that system, as ridiculous and absurd. The apprehension much more justly to be entertained is, he would again repeat, not that the system will be overthrown, for it has ample power to take care of itself, but that it will be utterly unavailing to keep it within salutary limits. He believed that the measure now proposed, to separate the fiscal action of the Government entirely from the banks, and to return, by a slow and gradual process, to the collection of its revenues in gold and silver, to be accomplished in a period of six years, as provided in the bill, was the only practicable means now left to the country, to restore a larger portion of metallic currency, to bring within more moderate limits, the present expanded paper system, and to rescue the liberties and institutions of the nation, from its now almost irresistible influence. If the Federal Government now abandons this high constitutional duty, the opportunity is forever lost, and it will be equivalent to a sentence of banishment from our shores of our due proportion of the precious metals. It would not only be better for the Government and the people, which in this country constituted but the same thing, but it would be a benefit to the banks themselves, by placing them on their own proper intrinsic credit, (which was the only true credit system,) and removing them from the influence of politics, and the temptations to over-issues, induced by their having possession of the public revenues. The Government demand for specie would compel the banks to be careful, and avoid over-issues, which would afford an admirable check, now so much needed by them. On the other hand, the Government demand for specie, by bringing more of it from abroad, and throwing it constantly in circulation, through the means of its expenditures would strengthen the banks, by affording a more abundant supply of the metals, for them to supply themselves with. The effect of the measure, then, on the paper system of this country, according to this view, would be to prevent a fradulent system of banking, and to promote a more honest one, and was, therefore, a measure eminently for the good of the people at large.

Never was an argument more delusive, if argument it deserved to be called, than that which so erroneously assumed that the measure proposed was for the benefit of the Government, at the expense of the interests of the people. It was, as he thought he had already shown, a measure eminently for their benefit, by affording the only means now left to restore to circulation among them a larger proportion of sound currency, and which they had a right to demand of the Government, as one of the highest duties which it owes to them. The idea that it would operate unjustly on the people, for its dues to be received in the currency provided in the bill, was equally groundless and fallacious. Whatever advantage was gained to the Government, in thus collecting it, would, in the disbursement and expenditure of the money, (for it would necessarily pay out the same money which it received,) be fully returned to the people in that way. The loss and the gain to them, therefore, being equal, in the process of receiving and paying out the money by the Government, the advantage and disadvantage would, of course, be equal. The objection that it would benefit the office holders, is entitled to little weight. They receive but a very small proportion of the amount collected by the Government, the great sources of public expenditure being to carry on the different branches of the public service, and the great measures of policy with which the Government is charged. Therefore, whatever sums are paid by it, either to its officers, or on account of appropriations, to carry on its measures of policy, must, of necessity, return to general circulation, and, therefore, confers, in that way, a coextensive public benefit.

He had heard, with very deep regret, expressions almost constantly used here in debate, drawing a distinction between the people and their Government. It was perfectly fair and proper, in those who deemed it their duty to do so, to criticise and arraign the acts of the Administration; but when gentlemen spoke of a distinction between the Government and the people of this country, he considered the doctrine as dangerous, disorganizing, and tending, by diffusing hostility towards it, to subvert our institutions. He must be allowed to say, that those who used it were forgetful of the nature of our Government, and that it and the people were, in a political point of view, but the same thing. It was but the creature of their will, and, being of their will, is, according to its principles, under their control and direction.

He never was more entirely convinced of the utter absurdity of any proposition, than he was of that which gentlemen undertook to maintain, that the proposed measure would bring more of power and patronage to the Executive branch of the Government, than would be produced by continuing a connection with the banks. It was but another proof that, in politics, as well as in religion, there is no error, however great and absurd, "that does not find some sober brow to bless it, and approve it with a text." It was, in his opinion, one of the highest excellences of the system, that its tendency would be directly the reverse of that thus ascribed to it. By a connection of the fiscal affairs of the Government either with a National Bank or the State banks, it is indirectly giving it control and influence over not only the whole banking capital, but, through it, over the whole moneyed power, of the country. From the power which the Executive branch of the Government would necessarily have, under any law directing the deposite of the public moneys with the banks, to select from among their number for that purpose, subservience to Executive views, would, from the very nature of things, exist to a considerable extent. With an Administration in power which was of Federal politics, these monopolies would be certain to be in strong sympathy. Would it not, then, be dangerous to the liberties of this country, to place again in the hands of the Executive an engine of such tremendous power? Would it not be placing in the hands of a reckless and ambitious Administration, if such an one should unfortunately ever be elevated to power, the means of enabling them to defy the public will, and to perpetuate their own party ascendancy? When the strength and influence of the moneyed power had already become so great as to constitute it, in fact, a fourth estate under our Government, and seeking, as it was, to absorb the powers of the others, did not considerations of wisdom and caution, admonish us to pause, before we again gave it so dangerous a political reorganization, as would practically result from its reunion with the Government? That its pretensions had alarmingly increased, was most manifest in the proceedings of its friends, going on, in and out of Congress, in relation to restoring to the banks the custody of the public revenue. It was formerly considered a mere matter of favor, for the Government to deposite its revenues with the banks, and one which was to be done, or not, at its option. It is now no longer considered in that light; and the possession of its revenues is called for, in a voice, dictatorial and commanding, or expulsion from power is the threatened consequence! This circumstance marked, more distinctly, its growing pretensions, than did any thing else. He insisted on it, that there could be no comparison, between the extent of influence derived from a control over the moneyed power, which a reunion with the Government and banks would place in the hands of the Executive, and that given by the very small additional number of officers, contemplated by the present bill.

That the influence of banking institutions, when looking to Government for favors, was dangerous, was proven by the facts exhibited in the report of a committee of the Senate, made in 1834, appointed to investigate the affairs of the Bank of the United States. That report exhibited the startling fact, that near a half million of dollars had been loaned to members of Congress during the pendency of important questions before Congress, affecting its own continuance and interests. In addition to the heavy amount loaned to members of Congress, was the large amount loaned to editors of leading political influence. The press and the legislative halls being two of the strongest points in our political system, for the defence of the whole, corruption, whenever it makes an assault on it, will always endeavor, by attempting to make a successful lodgment, first to overcome those points that are of most importance, in aiding its designs. It is in this view, that there is so much danger in a connection between the Government and the banks. The influence of the latter is subtle, insinuating, and often imperceptible to the public eye. It often assumes the garb and disguise of disinterested patriotism, when the individual who is operated on by its secret power is but the slave of its selfish will, while loud in professions of the public good. In this respect it is an influence infinitely more dangerous to the public liberty than the Executive patronage which we hear so much denounced; for the Executive, in bestowing official honors and appointments, makes known to the country the objects of his favor, from the very nature of the case, while the recipients of bank favors are, in a great degree, concealed from the public eye.

Another objection, entitled to weighty consideration, connected with the subject of the increase of patronage, which a reunion of the banks with the Government will give to the latter, is that which was so ably and forcibly urged by the Senator from South Carolina, [Mr. CALHOUN,] and, in the course of his observation on which, he clearly proved that the tendency of it is to array the banking interest against the tax-payers, and in favor of the tax-consumers. If the public moneys are deposited with the banks, it will make it their interest that the revenue should be increased, for the plain reason, that they will receive a larger sum of the public money on deposite. They would, therefore, have a direct interest in stimulating the taxing power of the Government to excessive action, in order to profit by it.

In the progress of the present discussion, the charge had been gravely made against the late

President of the United States, of having made an unnecessary and unprovoked war on the late Bank of the United States; and that, by having occasioned its destruction, he had brought on the country the late pecuniary and commercial embarrassments, which it has suffered. Mr. B. joined issue, as to both allegations, and denied that they were true in point of fact. In the first annual message of President Jackson, he called the attention of Congress and of the nation, to the question of the renewal of its charter, and expressed doubts, both as to its constitutionality and expediency. This, he had done, not only in the exercise of his unquestionable right, as Chief Magistrate, but in obedience to a high constitutional duty, requiring that high officer to lay before Congress, from time to time, information on the condition of public affairs. The Bank of the United States had no claim, either founded on justice or on any other consideration, to a renewal of its charter. It was purely a question for the decision of the Legislative and the Executive branches of the Government, and any attempt by that corporation, to call that decision into question, was insolent and dictatorial, and was, in itself, a war on that branch of the Government, whose course of action it thus arraigned. The opinions of the late President, on that subject, were not the result of change or caprice, but they were in entire accordance with his published opinions, in relation to the constitutionality of a National Bank, which he had entertained from a very early period of his public life. He was a member of Congress shortly after the Government went into operation, and acted uniformly with the Republican party of that day, a part of whose creed was, that the Government of the United States had no right to create a bank. This opposition, then, to the renewal of the charter of the late bank, which is now, by some, sought to be imputed to personal hostility to that institution, was but the result of old and long cherished political principles. For having ventured to express them, he was assailed by that institution with the bitterest missiles of the press, and its funds and money abundantly lavished, (a part of which belonged to the Government,) to carry on the war. In the spring of 1832, it applied to Congress for a recharter, selecting the year to do so in which the Presidential election came on, and thus, in effect, held over the head of the Executive branch of the Government its mighty influence and supposed popularity with the nation, to intimidate him in his course, and extort from him an assent to the bill proposing to renew its charter. With characteristic firmness, he resisted this bold assault on his independence as Chief Magistrate, and negatived the bill. In this memorable act, he was borne out most triumphantly by the public voice. This was the extent of his offending; and, for resisting this bold defiance, was his conduct now so much arraigned. As well might the discomfitted and defeated legions who attacked his army at New Orleans, have charged him afterwards with having made an offensive war on them. In one case, he had stood on the soil of his country, to defend it from invasion. In the other, he stood on the principles of the Constitution, to guard it from encroachment.

The scenes which he had witnessed here, at the session of 1834, after the removal of the deposites—the violent attempt, made by the partisans of the bank to produce excitement against the then Administration, and all who supported it—the bold and daring efforts made to overawe the Executive branch of the Government, and the free deliberations of Congress, had convinced him of the dangerous and monstrous power of great moneyed corporations. But for that invincible firmness possessed by the late President of the United States, and the high degree of public confidence which he enjoyed, his Administration would undoubtedly have fallen under such a powerful antagonist. He believed that no other man in this country, acting as President, could have withstood the tempest, but that they would have been whelmed beneath its fury. He, therefore, placed but little faith in the opinions of gentlemen, when they spoke of the weakness, and harmless power, of moneyed corporations! It was the weakness of the lion when sleeping; but who, when waked into action, overpowers and destroys his victim!

As to the second branch of the charge, which imputed the pecuniary disasters of the country to the policy which had been pursued in relation to the late bank, the subject had been so fully and ably examined, at the late called session, in the speeches of many Senators, who supported the Administration, and the causes traced so directly to the successive contractions and expansions, resorted to by the United States Bank, as was believed, for the purposes of operating on public opinion, to effect its recharter, that it would be but a repetition of the arguments then used, to enter on it again. But that these movements of the bank first led to the commencement of those gambling speculations, which were, in their disastrous progress, afterwards aided by other causes, he could have no doubt.

He thought the reproach endeavored to be cast on the friends of the Administration, came from gentlemen with no very good grace, when they taunted them with having failed to furnish, what they called, "the better currency." Had gentlemen themselves done all in their power to produce a sound state of the currency? Had they, in good faith, given their support to such measures of the Administration as were of a character to effect that object? On the contrary, had they not, by their acts, as well as speeches, made war "on the better currency," which was gold and silver? Had it not been considered, by them, a sort of offence against the credit system, that the Administration should have encouraged the importation of specie from abroad, to place us more on an equality with other nations, in that respect? Yes, every dollar of hard money brought from Europe to this country, had been considered, and treated, by them, as a sort of unlawful intruder, deserving to be expelled! Every dollar of hard money was to be driven from circulation, by the issue of that pestilence to the currency—every species of small notes, down to the lowest denomination of cent bills! When it was known that the Opposition had favored and supported this course of policy, so destructive to the attainment of "the better currency," it did not become them to throw out reproaches on that subject. The great moneyed power of the late Bank of the United States, their political ally, had, he believed, been wielded to defeat the purposes of the friends of the Administration, in relation to the currency, by producing all the confusion and derangement which it was able to effect. He repeated, therefore, that these reproaches would continue to come with a very ill grace, from that quarter, until gentlemen showed that they had done all in their power, in good faith, to aid the policy of the Administration, by pursuing a course of measures favorable to the suppression of small notes, and a greater circulation of gold and silver currency.

In relation to the question of a National Bank, now no longer kept in the back ground, in the debate by its friends, as was formerly the case, there was another objection to it, in addition to many others, which had been repeatedly urged in debate, that had not been adverted to, that was entitled to great consideration, in his opinion. Springing, as such an institution has heretofore, and, if hereafter adopted, must again, from that broad and undefined field of construction, which makes the Constitution mean any thing that ingenious men may choose to make it, all its sympathies would necessarily incline it to support all that class of measures, claiming the same lineage. It will, therefore, be the natural ally of the tariff, of internal improvement, and all other kindred measures, derived from construction. Conscious of the doubtful tenure by which it would exist under the Constitution, its interests and safety would both lead it to create as many allies as it could, of the same character, for mutual support and protection. Here, then, would exist a great moneyed power, whose interests would lead it to urge the Government beyond its sphere of constitutional action, and to build up other great interests of doubtful power, in order to guarantee its own permanency.

It had, said Mr. B. occurred to him, as a circumstance by no means unimportant, as related to the question of a National Bank, and as one highly interesting to the Southern States particularly, that both the prices of their great staples, and those of property generally, had, since the removal of the deposites, and the going down of the Bank of the United States, been higher, so far as he was able to inform himself, than they had through any series of the same number of years, during the existence of the National Bank. Nor was this estimate made by the standard of bank notes, which were, perhaps, generally, at this time, at some three or four per cent. discount; but, allowing for the difference between notes and specie, would hold good. It was certain that, during nearly the whole time of the existence of the charter of the National Bank, the whole planting interest of the Southern States was, with the exception of a few prosperous years, almost entirely prostrated. That the tariff had a highly pernicious effect on those interests he did not doubt, nor did he doubt that the operations of the National Bank had likewise greatly aggravated the injury. He believed, at this time, that the Southern States enjoyed more real, substantial prosperity, as a whole, than they had done at any time since the Revolution. That there was some scarcity of money, and, in places, some commercial distress, he admitted; but he believed the great mass of the planters were more really prosperous than at any former time.

The Senator from Kentucky, [Mr. CLAY] and the Senator from Virginia, [Mr. RIVES] had, by a very ingenious process of reasoning, endeavored to construct, on what he viewed as a very harmless and necessary clause in the bill, an immense Government bank, which each endowed, according to his fancy, with every dangerous power to do mischief to the country. This charge against the bill, he thought, was without the semblance of an argument to support it. It was a discovery, for which a patent right was deserved by those who had made it. The section of the bill on which this objection is grounded, was framed to answer two purposes, and those two alone. It simply authorized the Secretary of the Treasury to transfer, by his draft, money from one public depository to another, to prevent too great an accumulation at any one point, and to have the public funds in readiness at such places as they were wanted for the public expenditures. It proposed, then, to give the Secretary two powers, which were indispensable to the safety of the public funds, and the fiscal action of the Government. The power to transfer the funds from one depository to another, in case they accumulated to too great an amount, is only a measure of precaution for their safety, and looks to that object alone. The power to transfer from one point to another, to meet public expenditures, is a power absolutely necessary to the fiscal operations of the Government, and without which it could not move. It was a power that was not now, for the first time, to be given, but existed, to the same extent, in the deposite act of 1836, and which, he believed, was voted for by most individuals, of both political parties.

Mr. B. would now proceed to say a few words on the subject of the amendment proposed by the Senator from Virginia, [Mr. RIVES,] and could not abstain from the expression of his regret, that that distinguished gentleman had deemed it his duty to denounce, in such harsh terms, the original bill. While he was disposed to accord to every one an entire right to pursue the dictates of his own judgment, yet, in reference to the language of that gentleman, he must be allowed to say, that "a friendly eye could never see such faults."

The amendment proposed, to which he had just alluded, would, if carried into effect, become a measure of vastly more Executive patronage than the original bill would confer. Its leading feature was, to give the Secretary of the Treasury power to select a number, not exceeding twenty-five, from among the State banks, to act as public depositories, and they, under the supervision of the Secretary of the Treasury, to have the power to determine what notes, of the eight hundred banks throughout the United States, shall be received in payment of the public dues. If this was not, in name, a great national bank, it unquestionably possessed all the essential machinery to make it one. It had the ominous number of twenty-five in it, corresponding, in that respect, to the number of branches of the late Bank of the United States; and it gave the banks, which it authorized to be selected, an almost absolute control over the remaining eight hundred, by the power which the possession of the public moneys would give them, and by their authority to decide on the receivability of their notes, in payment of the Government dues. And all of this bank agency and machinery to be put in motion by the Secretary of the Treasury! It effectually organizes the whole moneyed power of the country into one compact system, and places this tremendous engine of political power in the hands of the Executive branch of the Government!

The Senator from Kentucky [Mr. CLAY], though he does not seem precisely pleased with the plan proposed by the Senator from Virginia, as a place of permanent residence, yet expresses his willingness to "stop at it as a good half-way house." How long he proposes to abide there, he does not inform us; but his generous hospitality will no doubt induce him, in return for the civilities received while there, to invite the Senator from Virginia to accompany him to the end of his journey, and there partake with him of a great national entertainment. The Senator from Virginia, in making his political survey of public sentiment, in the different States of the Union, had invaded the limits of the State which he in part had the honor to represent; and conjectures, from the elections held there in August last, for members of the House of Representatives, that the majority of the State is against the present Administration. Mr. B. said, without undertaking to decide what public sentiment was, in that State, in reference to the policy of the Administration, he could, at least, assure that gentleman, that he had formed an opinion respecting it, on grounds which were very fallible. It was true, that a majority of the members of the other branch of Congress, elected from the State of North Carolina, at the last election, were in opposition to the Administration, but it was equally true that a majority of them, in 1834, were likewise against the Administration, and that it had continued to be the case from that time to the present period, with this difference, that the Opposition had gained one more member in the last elections than they before had. It would, therefore, be seen that the Opposition were, in 1834, represented by a majority of members from North Carolina, and that at the elections of 1835, the same relative number was again returned. Never, said Mr. B. had the great political questions of the day been more directly carried to the polls, in the State of North Carolina, than on the question of his own re-election; and, on no occasion, had the friends of the Administration succeeded by a more decisive majority elected to the Legislature, the great question of the removal of the deposites then being before the people. According to the modern Whig logic on the subject of instruction, which assumes every rule to instruct representatives but the right one, it would have been his duty, because a majority of Opposition members then represented North Carolina, and were re-elected at the next year's elections, to have considered himself instructed then, and to have resigned his seat, or have united with the Opposition, although just re-elected by so large a majority. His colleague, who so ably and honorably fills a seat in this body, was likewise elected to it when a majority of the members, in the other end of the Capitol, from North Carolina, were opposed to the Administration. Mr. B. said, in no State in the Union were the great body of the people more inclined to re-elect their Representatives, even sometimes of opposite politics, than were the people of North Carolina. In their elections, politics were not always made the only test, as he believed they were not in some of the recent elections in that State.

There had been no public meetings, as far as he was informed, in North Carolina, on the important questions now before the Senate, except in the single county of Warren—a county long celebrated for its sterling Republican sentiments, and whose citizens had long been the friends and neighbors of that illustrious friend of civil liberty, the late NATHANIEL MACON. A more spontaneous and unanimous expression of sentiment never was given, by the people of any one county, in favor of a measure, than, he learned, had, on that occasion, been declared, by their resolutions, in support of the present great measure proposed by the Administration.

In relation to the right of instruction, he would say now, as he had on other occasions, that none respected it more than himself, and none would more readily yield obedience to it; or, if he could not, consistently with his views of the Constitution, carry out such instructions as the Legislature of his State might choose, at any time, to give him, he should consider himself bound to return his trust to those who bestowed it, that their wishes might be represented by others, of like sentiments with their own. He had never considered himself, on any principle as to the right of instruction, bound to go in quest of public opinion, in discharging his duty here, on the great questions that come before him. In the absence of instructions from his Legislature, he made it a rule to pursue the dictates of his own judgment; but when resolutions should reach him, if any such should be, at any time, passed, they would either be obeyed, or a resignation of his seat, in the Senate, would be the only other alternative. In relation to the great right of instruction to Senators, no other rule had ever been contended for by the Republican party, than that which he had suggested.

He congratulated Senators, in opposition, who now expressed so much exultation, at the instructions lately given to some of the friends of the Administion, on their improved doctrines, on the subject of that great Republican principle. The ready obedience which had been paid them by the Senators instructed, was not a mere profession, but it formed an essential part of the political creed of the party to which they belonged. How great was the contrast, and how striking was the degree of respect paid to their consitituents, in the conduct of the friends of the Administration now, who are instructed by their Legislatures, and that of Opposition members, some years since, under similar circumstances! In the one case, it was obedience, respectfully given; in the other, disobedience, sometimes accompanied with reflections on those who gave them. This essential difference, on a great question of popular liberty, cannot fail to attract public attention, in deciding the question as to which of the two great parties is hereafter to administer the Government.

Mr. B. must again repeat the opinion, that the issue now made up, before the country, and which it was called on now to decide, was substantially one, involving the important question, whether the people or the banks were to rule, and whether the nation was to continue to govern itself, or to transfer its power, in effect, to irresponsible moneyed corporations. If the Administration is put down in this contest, he should consider it as tantamount to a declaration to the world, that the voice of freedom is extinct in our Republic, and that the national spirit has ingloriously succumbed at the sordid shrine of the moneyed power. The most renowned republics in ancient times, had most successfully maintained their liberties, so long as they had taken for their guide the principles of an elevated patriotism. So long as this spirit had prevailed among them, they had maintained their independence; but when they were overtaken by the debasing feelings of avarice, and had yielded to their influence, their declension was rapid, till they had fallen into the arms of some tyrannical master, because they were unfit, longer, to govern themselves. The true way, not only to preserve liberty, but to preserve property, is for a nation to act on the high and honorable principles of our nature. Yielding great principles to mere momentary events, from selfish motives, and a fear of meeting consequences, is, in most cases, in the end, but the sacrifice of permanent future good to a mere temporary benefit, and is, when considered as a mere question of interest, a great error. When the Romans, in the last days of their degeneracy, were invaded by barbarian adventurers, and endeavored to purchase peace by paying them large sums of money, they but invited their return, with increased strength, to sack and overrun their country. For the American people now to submit to the demands of the banks and their partisans, is to render their rights and interests, hereafter, more insecure, by thus inviting new demands on them. Now is the time—not by any violation of their rights—to resist and weaken that great power, by the measure now proposed.

If, sir, said Mr. B. the banking interest prevails in the contest, the unavoidable consequence will be to bring the high tariff and old Federal parties into power. Individuals of that party, who have been under the ban of public opinion, for their political misdeeds, for years past, will begin to look for their restoration to power with as much anxiety, as did the royal French emigrants for the restoration of the Bourbons to the throne of France. Even the survivors of the old Hartford Convention may become inspired with new hopes; and Abolition will no doubt join in doing honor to the occasion, with increased hopes of accomplishing its fatal purposes.

He now considered it his duty to notice some remarks which had fallen from the Senator from New York, [Mr. TALLMADGE,] having allusion to the future prospects of the present Administration, in regard to public sentiment. In remarking on the results of the late elections, in the State of New York, that gentleman has, in emphatic language, warned the present Chief Magistrate, unless he changed his course, to beware of the Ides of November, 1840, [Mr. TALLMADGE, having obtained permission to explain, said that he had referred to the next Fall elections.] Mr. B. resumed, and said that although he had misunderstood the Senator as to dates, yet his remark did not, with the less force, apply to the great issue, which was now making up on the next Presidential election, and was to be considered to be intended as a warning to the President of the United States, to beware of the fate which, it is intimated, then awaits him. In reply, he could only say, that if the State of New York, great in resources, great in intelligence, and equally distinguished for her high and patriotic bearing, in every difficult crisis, gave way and yielded in the present great contest, that her sons would be forgetful of the principles, and of the revered Republican names, which had so highly adorned her annals. That it would mark the extinction of that sacred spirit of liberty and of valor, which had won for her the never-fading honors of Saratoga, where the tide of war in the Revolution was first successfully turned against a proud and powerful invading army.

Mr. B. said that the period which marked the greatest degeneracy of the Roman empire, before its final dissolution, was that in which the office of Emperor was set up to sale by the prætorian bands, and the successful candidate borne to the imperial throne on the shields of a mercenary soldiery. If, at this early day, and in the youth of our Republic, the present Chief Magistrate is to be driven from power, for the high and honorable stand that he has taken, in behalf of the rights of the people and the Constitution, it will mark a degeneracy in our country, equally rapid and ominous of the fate of its free institutions. Borne to the Presidential office by the prætorian bands of the banks, his successor would be but the honored tool of the moneyed power, which had triumphed over the Constitution.

It had, said Mr. B. been the fate of the ancient Republics of Greece, to lose their liberties at the fatal battle of Cheronea. The Republic of Rome had lost its liberties at the equally disastrous battle of Pharsalia; but the heroic deeds of the brave men who fell in the struggles for them, in both countries, yet lived in fame, and the pen of the historian had immortalized them. But what would be the sentence of the future historian of this country, who should record that our young Republic had been ingloriously conquered by the moneyed power, and had thus yielded up all the laurels which its fortitude, wisdom, and valor, on all great occasions, have won for it? He did not, however, indulge in gloomy anticipations, as to the result of the decision of the people, on the great questions now at issue. On the contrary, he saw nothing, either in the times, or in the circumstances of the times, to discourage the friends of free Government; but every thing, in looking to the past history of our country, and its capacity to rise superior to difficulty, to presage victory, and cheer its friends with the bright promise of ultimate triumph and certain success.

THE INDEPENDENT TREASURY BILL.

SPEECH OF MR. NORVELL, OF MICHIGAN,

In Senate, March 6, 1838—Upon the bill to "impose additional duties, as depositaries, upon certain public officers, to appoint Receivers General of public money, and to regulate the safe-keeping, transfer, and disbursement, of the public moneys of the United States."

Mr. NORVELL rose, and addressed the Senate:

I concur, Mr. President, said he, with the Senator from Maryland [Mr. MERRICK] in the opinion, that, at this crisis in our public affairs, the country expects every man to do his duty. I intend to perform mine, to the best of my very humble ability. The Senator laments that appeals have been made to party feelings on this side of the Senate; to parties which have long been extinct. Sir, the Senator from Maryland, on this point, is mistaken. Whatever changes of name they may assume; however variable individuals may prove in their politics, the old parties in this country have not only not become extinct, but never can be extinguished. Their principles remain the same. It is the Aristocracy perpetually warring with the Democracy, which originated the two parties into which the people of the United States have always been divided, and which will continue to distinguish their history to the end of time. I regret, sir, that the name of Democracy has lately lost its charms, its magic influence, over my friend from Maryland. The fact is a sad presage of his future political career. The Senator says, that the American people are crying to us for bread, and we give them vinegar; we plunge them into wo.

Sir, I have heard no such cries. Clamors, indeed, have reached us from Wall street and kindred scenes of speculation and panic. A few petitions from two or three other cities have been presented to us. But the great body of the American people, the agricultural, useful, and productive mass of the nation, have sent no protests to this body against a measure eminently fitted to protect their interests, and to purify the currency of the country.

The Senator inquires whether we know who our masters are? I tell him, sir, that I have no master. In one sense, we are the public servants. We are placed in stations in which we are required to serve our country. But we are the equals, the friends, not the slaves, of our constituents. I learned, in my early years, from the great fountains of British liberty, and the lesson has been confirmed in the school of American Democracy, that > "Man knows no master save creative Heaven,

> And that which common good ordains."

Sir, I, too, lament that upon the great measure before the Senate, too much party spirit has been indulged in. But whence has it proceeded? Where did it originate? It began, sir, on the other side of the Senate. A remorseless party warfare upon this measure, and on the Administration, commenced on that side at the extra session; and, cheered by what they suppose to be a favorable indication of public sentiment, they have renewed and prosecuted it with fresh vigor at the present session. The remarks of the honorable Senator himself, after deprecating its influence in his speech of yesterday, afford a fit illustration of the party spirit in which, contrary to his own professions, this grave subject has been treated on that side of the Senate.

Mr. President, the bill before the Senate contains two propositions. The first is, that the Government will discontinue the use of banks as its fiscal agents and depositories. The second is, that it will gradually discontinue the reception of any thing but gold and silver in the payment of the public revenues. The details of the bill, although of minor importance, properly designate the public officers who shall receive, keep, and pay out the public moneys, on Treasury drafts, made in pursuance of law. They provide minute and effectual guards and penalties to protect the safety of the funds of the nation in the hands of these officers.

These, sir, are the clear and simple provisions of the bill. They are shrouded in no mystery. They admit of no equivocal construction. The darkness in which they have been enveloped, has been thrown over them by the diversified and contradictory commentaries of Senators over the way.

The discontinuance of banks as public depositories, is but a recurrence to the early Constitutional administration of the financial affairs of this Government. The Federal Constitution recognises the existence of no bank, either State or National. It contemplates the agency of no bank in the management of our financial affairs. It does authorize the appointment of officers for the collection, safe-keeping, and disbursement of the public revenue.

Banks were an after-thought with the first Secretary of the Treasury of the United States. He proposed a National Bank, but not as a fiscal agent and depository of the public moneys. The merchants, the men of wealth, the speculators, joined him in support of a National Bank. The measure was opposed by the Secretary of State, the great Apostle of Republican liberty, and by the representatives of the agricultural and producing interests of the nation. These were borne down by the antagonistical interests. The bank was established. Yet, sir, collectors, receivers, commissioners of loans, and other receiving and disbursing officers were created; and they had, to a great extent, the custody of the public moneys during the existence of the old National Bank. We heard nothing then of the danger of trusting the public officers with the receipt and disbursement of the national revenue. We heard nothing of the superior virtue and safety of banks as fiscal agents and depositories of the public money.

It is certain, then, that in dispensing with the use of banks, as our fiscal agents, we adopt no untried experiment. We simply go back to the constitutional provision on the subject. We rely upon the officers of the General Government for the transaction of the financial and other business of that Government.

We are told, sir, that the proposed system is to involve the nation in a vast annual expense; and that it will largely increase the patronage of the Executive. The honorable Senator from Virginia [Mr. RIVES] ventured to suggest, upon authority which he deemed good, that the expense of this Independent Treasury would amount to six hundred thousand dollars per annum. Sir, it is difficult to answer declarations so fanciful and adventurous, except by a direct denial. The bill creates but four or five new officers, and authorizes the appointment of some additional clerks. The collectors of customs, the land office receivers, the postmasters, already in existence, are to perform the duties required to be performed by this bill, without any additional compensation. To these are added a few receivers general, and perhaps fifteen or twenty clerks. The most extravagant estimate cannot make the annual expense more than fifty or sixty thousand dollars per annum. The transfer of the public deposites from the banks to the public officers, will be an extensive reduction of Executive patronage. It takes from the President the means of influence over seventy or eighty powerful banking institutions, their officers, their clerks, their directors and stockholders, and adds no increase of the means of influence over the existing officers of the Government. The bill is an honorable and a manly surrender by the President of extensive patronage, to promote the public welfare, and to protect the purity of the free institutions and administration of the country. Instead of that patronage, he obtains the power to nominate four receivers general, with salaries too small, I fear, to secure talents and character adequate to the proper discharge of their duties. In this view of the subject, the President has exercised a degree of self-denial which has no parallel, except in the administration of Mr. Jefferson. Sir, the conduct of the President of the United States, on this subject, is characteristic of the man. Since his accession to the Executive chair, he has shown no disposition to increase Executive patronage. He has evinced a marked respect to the Constitution of his country; a deep devotion to its welfare; a moderation and temper admirably fitted to the discreet and enlightened administration of the affairs of the Government. And how the honorable Senator from Kentucky, while professing respect for the man, could indulge himself in an expression of detestation for such a Chief Magistrate, I am at a loss to understand, unless an explanation may be found in the party feeling and the Presidential ambition of the distinguished Senator. The average expense paid to the deposite banks for their agency in receiving and disbursing the public moneys, would amount, on the most moderate calculation, to three or four hundred thousand dollars per annum. They would have the constant use of six or eight millions of dollars; and that, at six per cent. would be equal to about half a million a year. The Independent Treasury system will, therefore, diminish both the Executive patronage and the expenses of the Government.

It will, in my judgment, have another still more valuable effect. By exacting a solid and substantial currency in the collection of the public revenue, and in the disbursement of the public moneys, it will keep the general currency of the country in a sound condition. It will restrain the spirit of speculation and extravagance in trade. It will prevent the accumulation of large surpluses in the Treasury. It will render necessary a more economical and republican system of public expenditure. It will lighten the burdens of the people. It will compel the solvent banks to resume specie payments; and it will coerce the insolvent banks to wind up their affairs and close their doors. Instead of realizing the fallacious assertion, that this Sub-Treasury system will give one currency to the Government, and a worse currency to the people, it will have the effect of securing to both a substantial currency; and it will put an extinguisher upon the dishonest system of banking upon mere paper capital, without a specie basis. With a gold and silver basis, banking is a source of advantage and prosperity to any commercial country. Without them, banking is a pestilence to such a country. It is not true, sir, that we are waging war upon the valuable institutions of the country. It is not true that we make war upon all banks, so lately dignified into the character of institutions of the States. We are opposed to the mere paper corporations called banks, when they have no solid capital. We consider and know them, in that condition, to be a great public and private evil. But we are in favor of banks conducted on sound principles, respecting the law, keeping up to their charter obligations, and redeeming their plighted faith to the public.

But, sir, we are told, that in separating the Government from the banks, we separate it from the people. They who hazard this declaration, cannot themselves believe it. How can the Government be separated from the people? It derives its existence from the people. It depends upon the affections, the sympathies, and confidence of the people, for the duration of its power. It is preposterous to charge us with the design to separate the Government from the people. The charge presupposes us to be fools and madmen. It presupposes another absurdity. It presupposes the banks and the people to be identical. We all know that this assumption is fallacious. It has no platform to stand upon. The banks are established by a very small number of the people. They are sought to be established by men who want credit, by the few who have capital, and by a small number of the merchants, by brokers and speculators. A small portion of the stock only is held by persons desirous of realizing moderate and regular incomes, from what they suppose to be good and safe investments. The widow and the orphan may occasionally have their money placed in banks, and are sometimes stockholders in them. But the great mass of the people, the productive classes, the bone and sinew of the country, have no stock in banks, no interest in them, no identity with them. They feel their operations, chiefly from the sudden expansion and contraction of loans; from equally sudden changes in the circulating medium of the country; from the scarcity or superabundance of money, which is often suddenly produced by the management of the banks; by the gross abuses which creep into them. The prices of produce are affected by like means. The banks are identical with the people only while they strictly obey the law; only while they promptly redeem their bills, when called upon, with gold and silver; only while they lend money with prudence, and in moderation, to honest and deserving men, for laudable purposes, and not to brokers and shavers in politics or business. Sir, the shocking abuse of the banking privilege which pervades the land; the conversion of banks into monopolies for the accommodation of a few presidents, directors, and their connections, which we daily witness; the suspension of specie payments without adequate cause; the continuance of that suspension, when all cause has apparently ceased, have rendered these institutions, in the estimation of the mass of the people, sources of mischief and extensive public injury, and it is only by a radical change of their conduct that they can ever regain the public confidence. Senators over the way tell us that we must give our confidence in advance to these institutions, before they can resume specie payments, or be restored to general public confidence. Sir, the honorable Senator from Virginia makes too heavy a draft upon the faith of this body in the local banks, when he asks us to place the public funds in them, after their recent breach of all faith, their violation of all law, their outrages upon the moneys of the nation, as well as upon the deposites of individuals, committed to their safe-keeping. Let them show themselves worthy of confidence, by a prompt obedience to the violated laws of their country, by an immediate resumption of specie payments, before they suggest the idea of a restoration of the public faith in their solvency and integrity. Sir, I am no enemy to banks or banking founded upon correct and solid principles. I am the open, avowed, declared enemy of all banks and banking based upon any other principles. I am opposed to the excesses, the enormous abuses, of the banking system, as developed within a few months past; and I am surprised, I am mortified, sir, that the honorable Senator from Virginia, [Mr. RIVES,] the distinguished disciple of Jefferson and Madison, should have identified his political reputation with these delinquent State banks. I am grieved, sir, that he should have hazarded his high destinies, to which so many republican friends had looked with anxious hopes, in sustaining institutions, the very best of which have a monopolizing and aristocratic tendency. Sir, one of the latest of the sentiments uttered by that illustrious republican statesman, under whose eye the honorable Senator was brought up, at whose feet he learned the lessons of Democratic wisdom, was, that though the course of the aristocracy of this country was changed, their principles remained the same. "They now," said he, "look to a single and splendid Government, founded on banks and other moneyed corporations, which would be to them the next best blessing to the monarchy of their first aim, and perhaps the surest stepping stone to it." Sir, does not the honorable Senator see the inevitable tendency of banks to create and nurse a spirit of aristocracy, the meanest of all aristocracies—that founded on money and wealth—in this country? Does he not perceive that the union of the banks with this Government, their excesses in the use of its money, lead, beyond all dispute, to "a single and splendid Government, founded upon banks?" Does he not perceive that State banks as they are, they are looking to this Government as the anchor of their hopes and interests; that they are seeking a close alliance with it as their only salvation; that, in this alliance, they would be ready to sustain the Government in every extravagance and splendor in which it might choose to indulge? Let me implore the honorable Senator to review his course; to retrace his steps; to direct his eminent talents to the preservation of the purity of his country's political institutions, and not to devote them to the cause of banks and bank monopolies, or to the pernicious purpose of identifying them with republican Government.

The honorable Senator from Indiana [Mr. TIPTON] said the other day, that he was opposed to the Sub-Treasury, because it was a condemned measure; condemned by the House of Representatives, and condemned by the people. It is true, sir, that it was at the extra session laid upon the table of the House by a small majority. It is equally true that but few of the Republican members of that body voted to make that disposition of the bill; and it is probable that those few so voted, not because they condemned the measure, but because they had doubts, and were not prepared to give a direct vote upon the bill. That the measure has been condemned by the people, the honorable Senator will permit me to doubt. The elections in Ohio and Indiana last fall did not change the political character of those States from what it was the year before. Then they gave large majorities to the Opposition candidate for the Presidency. The Sub-Treasury bill had then nowhere been suggested. I do not believe that the people of Ohio and Indiana have since given any more decisive evidence of hostility to the existing Administration, than they manifested at the Presidential election. The election in Maine could not have been affected, to any great extent, by the proposition of the Sub-Treasury. That proposition did not reach that State in time to produce any great effect. Kentucky, sir, is my native State. My affection for her is not to be impaired. She has, under the lead of the Senator over the way, [Mr. CLAY,] long been in the Opposition. I can excuse, I can even admire her, for the partiality which she has, with so much constancy, manifested towards him. But I could neither excuse nor admire her for any devotion which she might exhibit towards any man who was opposed to the cause of the country in the second war of independence, in which she so prodigally and generously shed her best blood. It becomes her native-born children to > "Be to her faults a little blind,

> And to her virtues very kind."

She has few faults, sir: she has many and noble virtues. But her late election took place before the Sub-Treasury was proposed, and the result of that election cannot be cited as any special condemnation by her people of that measure. I admit, however, that they are opposed to it at this time.

The Michigan and New York elections have taken place since the President recommended the establishment of an Independent Treasury system. In Michigan, the election resulted in favor of the Administration from which that measure proceeded. The Senator from New York [Mr. TALLMADGE] must excuse me: I do not mean to poach upon his manor; but he will excuse me if I adopt the opinions of the President, in preference to those of the honorable Senator, in relation to the last fall elections, both in New York and elsewhere. The Senator said, the other day, that he had seen with pain the allegation, in the President's Message, of bank interference, or bank influence, in the recent election of the State of New York. The charge had humiliated him. He felt that the honor of his native State had been wounded, and that the wound had been inflicted by one of her own sons; and, in the true spirit of knight-errantry, he proceeded to repel this "unmerited aspersion" of the President upon his native State. Sir, listening intently, as I did, to the indignant accents which fell from the lips of the honorable Senator, I could hardly believe that I had heard correctly the language which he had uttered. I had read the message of the President with attention, and had heard it read at the table by the Secretary. I thought that the New York election had not been specially mentioned in it, but that the President—modestly and cautiously assigning a reason for supposing that the national sentiment had not been expressed against the Independent Treasury plan, and that he might, therefore, without offending the nation, renew its recommendation—had alluded to the fall elections, in general terms, all over the country, as influenced by local and other considerations, as well as by those which pertained to this measure. To test the accuracy of my recollection, at the conclusion of the speech of the Senator, I re-examined the Executive Message, and was confirmed in the correctness of my memory in relation to its contents. The President does not name New York. The whole passage is of a general nature, and plainly shows that the President had in view, when he penned it, all the States in which elections had just been held. Pennsylvania, Michigan, and other States, as well as New York, were evidently in his mind; and the honorable Senator had no more right than we had to take exception to the allusions of the President. But, in truth, sir, the Message on this point is unexceptionable. It strongly indicates the deference which the Chief Magistrate feels, and is always inclined to yield, to the expression of the popular will. And were I disposed to select a passage from the Message, which, more than any other, illustrates the Republican principles and frankness of the President, this very passage is the one that I would select. It is short: I will read it, sir.

"The national will is the supreme law of the Republic; and, on all subjects within the limits of his constitutional powers, should be faithfully obeyed by the public servant. Since the measure in question was submitted to your consideration, most of you have enjoyed the advantage of personal communication with your constituents. For one State only has an election been held for the Federal Government; but the early day at which it took place deprives the measure under consideration of much of the support it might otherwise have derived from the result. Local elections for State officers have, however, been held in several of the States, at which the expediency of the plan proposed by the Executive has been more or less discussed. You will, I am confident, yield to their results the respect due to every expression of the public voice. Desiring, however, to arrive at truth and a just view of the subject in all its bearings, you will at the same time remember that questions of far deeper and more immediate local interest than the fiscal plans of the National Treasury were involved in those elections. Above all, we cannot overlook the striking fact, that there were at the time in those States more than one hundred and sixty millions of bank capital, of which large portions were subject to actual forfeiture, other large portions upheld only by special and limited legislative indulgencies, and most of it, if not all, to a greater or less extent, dependent for a continuance of its corporate existence upon the will of the State Legislatures to be then chosen. Apprised of this circumstance, you will judge whether it is not most probable that the peculiar condition of that vast interest in these respects, the extent to which it has been spread through all the ramifications of society, its direct connection with the then pending elections, and the feelings it was calculated to infuse into the canvass, have exercised a far greater influence over the result, than any which could possibly have been produced by a conflict of opinion in respect to a question in the administration of the General Government, more remote and far less important in its bearings upon that interest."

Sir, more impressive truths, uttered in more general and unoffending language, never proceeded from the pen of man, than the just reflections embraced in this passage of the Executive Message. And the Senator from New York, taking counsel from his resentments, rather than from his usual good sense, must have been anxious to travel out of his way, for the purpose of assailing the President, when he ventured to criticise with so much severity this part of the annual communication to Congress.

Upon the hint of the Senator from New York on this subject, another honorable Senator, [Mr. CLAY,] renowned for his daring courage and dexterity in debate, lashed himself into a passion, and declared that the President, for his allusion to the New York elections, deserved a resolution of reprehension, if not impeachment, at the hands of this body. Sir, it would have been well for that honorable Senator, before he indulged in such denunciations, to have remembered that his friends hold him up as the competitor of the present Chief Magistrate for the Presidency; that if it were wrong in the President to make allusions to the elections in the States, it was equally indelicate for that Senator to indulge in such allusions; and he will recollect how often he has invoked this body not only to bear in mind the results of certain State elections which he named, but to wait till they heard from Tennessee, from Pennsylvania, from Virginia, what their Legislatures would say on this Sub-Treasury scheme, before they acted upon it. Sir, the President had as much right as the honorable Senator to speak of the State elections. I know of no legal, no just moral inhibition, against the utterance of their sentiments on the subject by either of them.

Nothing, then, appears to me to have occurred to justify the conclusion to which the Senator from Indiana has come, that the people of the United States have condemned this measure. Sir, it has been condemned by interested banks; by brokers; by speculators in politics, as well as in property; by merchants, who seek every where, but in their own improvident acts, for the causes of their disasters, and every where, but in their own prudence and wisdom, for a remedy for the ills which transiently afflict them. It is a fact also, as intimated by the distinguished Senator from New York, [Mr. WRIGHT] that the most extraordinary and persevering exertions have been made, here and elsewhere, to make up the public judgment against this measure, even before it was debated. It has been denounced, in advance, as a measure fraught with tremendous consequences, worse than all the calamities of a war with the most potent nation on earth. The denunciation has been daily repeated by the honorable Senator from Kentucky, and by some of his party friends, until, I doubt not, they have begun to credit it themselves. But, sir, in despite of the disposition of parties to receive the declarations of their leaders with implicit faith, this measure is gaining ground with the American people; and the more it is discussed, the more generally will it come to be viewed as a measure indispensable to the security of the public money, the stability of business and the currency, and the purity and safety of our free Republican institutions.

Some years ago, in another place, warmed by the circumstances and associations around him, the Senator from Kentucky pronounced the measures of the late President to be worse than war, pestilence, and famine. And what, sir, was the real fact? The country was never more prosperous and happy than it was under the whole of the administration of that illustrious Chief Magistrate. No epoch in its history was ever more blessed. The only unhappy people were those who aspired to the honors and emoluments of public station, without success!

The honorable Senator from Kentucky predicts that this measure will lead to consolidation. On the contrary, sir, it separates this Government from the moneyed institutions of the States. It takes from it all the means of undue influence over them. It establishes a Treasury of its own, with no power to use or disburse the public funds, except in pursuance of appropriations made by law; and it arrays against it in all the States a powerful moneyed interest adverse to the Treasury system; an interest which has commenced war upon the system before it is established; an interest too well calculated, I fear, to impair the vigor and efficient action of this Government.

I am glad to find in the honorable Senator returning symptoms of regard to the reserved rights of the States. I had apprehended that he had changed his early principles on this subject. The high tariff system, of which he was the able champion, embraced within its scope all the interests of society, individual, State and National. It struck directly, not through the medium of the State Governments, but immediately, as if we had been a consolidated empire, at the pockets, the business, the property, of every man, woman and child in the country. The great system of internal improvement, upon a national scale, was supported, if not projected, by that honorable Senator. That system would have given boundless enlargement to the patronage and power of the General Government in all the States, menacing not only danger to the public liberty, but the absorption of all the resources of the Treasury, the States and the people. To these, sir, let us add a national bank, the persevering advocacy of which has so long distinguished the Senator from Kentucky. I intend to revive no war upon the late Bank of the United States. I speak of any national bank, when I say that such an institution, operating, under the mantle of this Government, upon all the pecuniary interests of the country, has a consolidating tendency, and would require constant vigilance to avert or weaken that tendency. Sir, I can discover in the measure before us no symptoms of consolidation to compare with the tremendous features of the system to which I have just adverted, and which threatened to extinguish all the reserved powers and rights of the States, if not to subject all the interests of the people to the unlimited control of the General Government.

The honorable Senator from Indiana [Mr. TIPTON] alleges that this bill is a conflict between the friends of a hard money currency and the friends of a mixed currency. The Senator is mistaken. It is a conflict between the friends of a specie currency, or its equivalent, and the friends of an irresponsible, unredeemable, and unredeemed paper currency. The supporters of the measure before the Senate are for a policy which will bring all banks up to the specie standard. Its opponents are for a surrender of the Government and the currency into the hands of paper banks, and for making both the Government and the people subservient to bank interests. I do not say, sir, that such is their design. I do say that such, in my judgment, is the effect of the course which they take.

The Senator from Indiana alleges the Specie Circular to have been one of the principal causes of compelling the Western banks to close their vaults. Sir, I speak from personal knowledge when I declare that this was not the case in my quarter of the West. The Western banks, so far as Michigan at least was concerned, would not have suspended specie payments if the suspension by the New York banks had not compelled them to follow the example. The banks were certainly pressed. They were pressed by their excesses in business, not by the Treasury Circular. They were pressed in consequence of undue loans to speculators, to favored individuals—in too many instances to their own officers and directors.

The honorable Senator from Kentucky [Mr. CLAY] has affirmed, that it was the deliberate purpose of the late Administration to establish a Government bank, under the exclusive control and direction of the Executive department. In proof of this, he has read passages from some of the messages of President Jackson. I have examined these messages. They do not sustain the charge of the honorable Senator. In the first annual communication of the late President, he manifested his doubt of the constitutionality of the then Bank of the United States; but, he added, "if such an institution is deemed essential to the fiscal operations of the Government," he submitted "to the wisdom of the Legislature whether a national one, founded upon the credit of the Government and its revenues, might not be devised, which would avoid all constitutional difficulties, and, at the same time, secure all the advantages to the Government and the country that were expected to result from the present bank." In these remarks, the President does not express the opinion that a bank is essential to the fiscal operations of the Government; but if Congress should be of opinion that it is, he suggests such a bank, founded upon the credit and revenues of the Government, as would avoid all constitutional difficulties, and, at the same time, secure all the advantages to the country which were realized from the then existing National Bank. The very phraseology employed by the late President shows his own doubts upon the necessity of any national bank; nor is one word to be found in this or any other message from his pen, which intimates that such a bank, if founded upon the credit and revenues of the Government, should be placed under the control or direction of the Executive department. In his second annual message, he suggests, as a matter of compromise and inquiry, "whether it be not possible to secure the advantages afforded by the present bank, through the agency of a Bank of the United States, so modified in its principles and structure as to obviate constitutional and other objections;" and he further suggests the practicability of such a bank as a branch of the Treasury Department, but with no power to discount, no exclusive subjection to the control of the Executive. In the third message of the late President, he drops the subject of any National Bank, simply alluding to his previous messages in relation to the then Bank of the United States, and leaving the whole subject "to the investigation of an enlightened people and their representatives." In his veto message, the late President asks: "If we must have such a corporation, why should not the Government sell out the whole stock, and thus secure to the people the full market value of the privileges granted?" Why should these privileges be given as an exclusive monopoly to a few favored individuals? Still, his language again distinctly implies a doubt of any necessity for such an institution. He admits, in this message, that a bank might be incorporated which would not infringe our own powers, or the reserved rights of the States; he admits that, if called upon, the Executive would have furnished such a project; but he does not say that he would have recommended a Government bank, under the control and direction of the Executive department.

At the veto message, the honorable Senator from Kentucky discontinued his quotations from the late President on this subject. Had he pursued them to a later date, he would have disclosed to this body and to the people, what it might not have suited his argument to disclose, that General Jackson had, upon long experience and mature deliberation, come to the conclusion, that any Bank of the United States was neither necessary nor constitutional. In his sixth annual message, he fervently hopes that, "admonished by the evils and distresses inflicted by such an institution, those who have favored the establishment of a substitute for the present bank, will be induced to abandon it," as any inconvenience would be preferable to this concentration of the whole moneyed power of the Republic, in any form, or under any restrictions. In his seventh annual message, the late President declares, that "the experience of another year has confirmed the utter fallacy of the idea, that the Bank of the United States was necessary as a fiscal agent of the Government," and that such a bank is "one of the fruits of a system at war with the genius of all our institutions." In the eighth and last annual message of the illustrious chieftain, he impressively remarks, that "the lessons taught by the Bank of the United States cannot well be lost upon the American people. They will take care never again to place so tremendous a power in irresponsible hands; and it will be fortunate if they seriously consider the consequences which are likely to result, on a smaller scale, from the facility with which corporate powers are granted by their State Governments." Finally, in the farewell address of the late President, he solemnly declares that "the powers enumerated in the Constitution do not confer on Congress the right to establish such a corporation as the Bank of the United States, and the evil consequences which followed may warn us of the danger of departing from the true rule of construction, and of permitting temporary circumstances, or the hope of better promoting the public welfare, to influence, in any degree, our decisions upon the extent of the authority of the General Government. Let us abide by the Constitution as it is written, or amend it in the constitutional mode, if it is found defective."

It will, from this connected view of the opinions of the late President, appear that, while during his first term he entertained a vague and doubtful idea that some bank might be constitutionally established, his opinions during the second term lent no countenance to that idea. He entirely repudiated both the necessity and constitutionality of any bank established by this Government; and he retired from that public life, which he had adorned with so much public virtue and firmness, warning his countrymen to abide by the Constitution, on this very subject, as it is written.

The Senator has, therefore, completely failed to establish his position, that it was the settled purpose of the late Administration to establish a Government bank, under the direction and control of the Executive department.

Having failed, sir, to establish this position, he has still more signally miscarried in his effort to fix upon the present Administration the same purpose. If the present Executive has succeeded to the principles and policy of the late President, and does stand pledged to carry them out, I have conclusively shown that a Government bank, under the control of the Executive department, constituted no part of those principles or that policy. But we are not left to conjecture or inference upon this point. The present President of the United States came into power with the declaration upon his lips, that he deemed any Bank of the United States to be unconstitutional. In his September message he reiterated the kindred declaration, that "again to create a National Bank, as a fiscal agent, would be to disregard the popular will, twice solemnly and unequivocally expressed." In his recent message he has again reiterated the same sentiment; and we have all along had his own distinct intimation that he would sign no bill establishing any National Bank.

But, says the honorable Senator from Kentucky, the bill before the Senate is intended to execute the purpose of establishing a Government Bank upon the ruins of the Bank of the United States and the State banks. Sir, this position of the Senator is sustained by his mere assertion alone. The bill affords upon its face the most decisive evidence of the fallacy of the assertion. There is not a bank feature in the bill, any more than is there in the counting-house of a merchant, who has a till or a vault to keep his money or his papers in. I leave the gratuitous assumption of the Senator on this point to the people, who are as capable of reading and understanding a bill as we are.

The Senator charges the late and present Administrations with a design to overthrow the State banks. Nothing is to be found in any message of either the late or present President to justify this accusation. The late Administration, both in word and action, exerted all its efforts to sustain the State banks. They were its pets. Sir, these banks have overthrown themselves, as far as they have been overthrown, by their own improvidence, their avidity for gain, and perhaps their anxiety to accommodate. The system of State bank deposites was continued by this Administration until that system put an end to itself. The recommendations of the present Executive are not now, and never have been, adverse to the State banks, properly conducted. They are adverse to their excesses and their abuses. The Administration, having failed in their zealous and liberal attempts to render the State banks safe depositories of the national revenue, have been driven to suggest a more safe mode of public deposites; one more under the control of Congress and the Executive; one which prevents the public moneys from being used for speculating purposes, and at the same time leaves the State banks to the exclusive control of their directors and the Governments of the several States. The Independent Treasury system, while it will bring the sound State banks up to the right standard and principle of useful and safe banking, will, I have no doubt, hasten the day of final settlement, to which the unsound institutions must come; and the sooner they arrive at that period, the better for the people, the country, and the currency of the country. The bill before the Senate will not overthrow the State bank system. It will correct and keep it in check; it will give it more stability, and thus secure to it more of the public confidence.

The substitute of the honorable Senator from Virginia [Mr. RIVES] proposes the restoration of the system of State bank deposites, which has just been tried, and signally failed. The modifications which he suggests render the system, in my judgment, infinitely worse than that which was its model. The Senator limits the number of deposite banks to twenty-five. Why he has fixed upon that number, it is difficult for me to perceive. We have twenty-six States and two Territories in the Union. But let that pass. The limited number proposed is a monopoly of public favor, which will create discontent and dissatisfaction, engender bad feelings and exciting rivalry, and produce a constant succession of agitations, which will not only reach the Executive mansion, but these halls. Instability and change in banking operations will necessarily follow. But, sir, the honorable Senator introduces a new feature into the Constitution of this Government. Heretofore, Congress have never been called on to approve, by joint resolution, the selection of deposite banks, or the appointment of public agents. An innovation fraught with more mischief could not, in my opinion, have been proposed to this body. Sir, what will be the inevitable effect? The Secretary of the Treasury will select the deposite banks. He will send them to the two Houses for their approbation. The disappointed bank applicants will besiege these halls to effect a rejection of the nominated institutions, and to substitute their own. A scene of electioneering, deception, perjury, and perhaps worse, will open upon us. Senators from the same State will differ as to the soundness, safety, and ability of the selected banks. The two Houses may differ. Individual members may be tampered with. The golden apple of discord may be thrown within these sacred walls, dedicated to the enactment of salutary laws for the promotion of the public welfare. Who, sir, can contemplate such a state of things without trembling for the consequences upon the purity of the legislative department of this Government? Sir, if it were possible for this substitute to be adopted, the dangerous feature to which I have called your attention ought certainly never to receive the sanction of this body.

Sir, the honorable Senator from Virginia [Mr. RIVES] told the Senate, in a speech delivered here four years ago, that the Bank of the United States had wantonly inflicted distress upon the country, with the obvious design of influencing and controlling your proceedings. If that was the case then, it is much more obvious at this time, that whatever pressure may have caused the suspension of specie payments in May last, no pressure now exists to justify the continuance of the suspension. The design is to control your proceedings. In truth, sir, I have heard and believe, that some of the leading banks, which now refuse to unite in the resumption of specie payments, have determined to persevere in that course, until they coerce this Government into an abandonment of the plan of divorcing itself from the banks as its fiscal agents and depositories. I acquit the banks in the city of New York of that purpose. They have determined to resume. It remains to be seen, Mr. President, whether Congress or the Legislatures of the States are to be corrupted and driven into a base surrender of the political powers of the country, its liberties and independence, into the hands of irresponsible banks? Sir, he must have closed his eyes to passing transactions, who has not lately witnessed the fearful strides of this moneyed power to dominion over the whole legislation of the country. He must have been purposely blind, who has not seen its disastrous influence in obtaining legislative instructions to honorable Senators here, to vote against a measure intended to effect a separation of Bank and State, and essential to the protection of American legislation from the contaminating impurities of bank operations. I deeply regret, sir, to find the honorable Senator from Virginia, of whose purity and patriotism I have never doubted, drawn into an apparent support of bank interests, at the expense, as I think, of the Republican institutions of the nation. The Senator, four years ago, had the firmness to stand up against all the bank clamor and menaces of the day, "and to regard the cause of the Constitution and public liberty as dearer to the American people than the transitory state of the money market." Sir, I quote the language of the honorable Senator on that trying occasion, when I express the hope, that we shall now follow his noble example then. "If we yield to the panic with which we are now assailed, and restore to the banks the deposites which they have justly forfeited," the triumph of these institutions will be complete, and their domination in the politics of the country virtually established. They will alike "overshadow the Government and the people." I thank the honorable Senator for teaching me that phrase. These corporations penetrate every part of the Union, and act in solid phalanx to sustain themselves and each other, and to break down the Government to their purposes. Restrained within their proper bounds; permitted to exercise no influence in the politics and measures of the Government; the connection with them dissolved, they will attend to their appropriate banking duties; they will keep their issues within the possibility of redemption; they will afford moderate facilities and accommodations to their fellow-citizens; their paper will have a value corresponding with that which it professes to represent; and the country, and the institutions of the country, will not find in them an interest adverse and hostile to them. "Sir," said the Senator, on a former occasion, "of all the reforms, social, political, or economical, required by the great interests of the country, that which is most urgently demanded, and which promises, in its accomplishment, the largest results of utility, security, and public benefit, is, beyond comparison, the restoration of the Government to what it was intended by the framers of the Constitution to be, a hard money Government." It is, Mr. President, this reform which we are now striving, to a certain extent, to accomplish; and I am sorry that the honorable Senator from Virginia has so far changed his views, as that we have lost his co-operation towards its accomplishment. That which the Senator then thought more deeply interesting than any other reform to the safety and prosperity of the country, the requirement of the public dues in specie, he now, unfortunately for his friends, considers Utopian and impossible. That which he then thought "an object worthy to engage the most anxious labors of the patriot and statesman," he now denounces as pernicious and fatal to the public interests. He then conjured honorable Senators, with whom he is now co-operating against the hard money system, to leave the Bank of the United States to its fate, and to bring forward their powerful aid in an effort to restore the Government to its true constitutional character and destination —"that of a simple, solid, hard money Government." Now, when we are making the effort to restore the Government to its true constitutional character and destination, the Senator has volunteered against us; has withdrawn from us the aid of his powerful talents; has lent them to the enemies of the "simple, solid, hard money Government," and charges us with "fostering a popular prejudice against banks, as a fund for political speculation, at the expense of all the sober realities of life, and the practical, pervading, and home-bred interests of the country." Sir, I invite the Senator from Virginia to a reperusal of his speech on the removal of the deposites. I appeal from the Senator as he now is, to the Senator as he then was. I regret that the Senator has so often produced the authority of Edmund Burke in support of his views. The name and the fate of that talented man are of evil omen. He commenced his public career as a patriot, of free, liberal, firm, Whig principles. He ended an apostate, a champion of the divine right of kings and queens, and a pensioner upon the administration of his enemies. Sir, the pure mind of the Virginia Senator, educated, as he was, at the feet of the great Gamaliel of Republican learning and liberty, should revolt from deriving its supports, its principles or illustrations, on any occasion, from such a source as Edmund Burke. Another passage of British history is worthy of his profound consideration. Need I name the coalition between Charles James Fox and Lord North, which fixed a lasting stigma upon the character of the illustrious English Commoner? Let the honorable Senator ponder on what may be recorded of these our times by the future historian!

Mr. President, the honorable Senator from Kentucky [Mr. CLAY] has lately taken frequent occasion to remind the majority of this body of their obedience to Executive commands, of their being the household troops, and of prostrating themselves at the feet of the Executive. Such language is disrespectful to the Senate. I do not believe that the Senator intended to insult us. But let me remind him of the period when, in another part of this building, he was the able and eloquent Republican supporter of the administration of James Madison. Let me remind him that he and the majority acting with him were then denounced, by some of his present allies, in language similar to that in which he has permitted himself to indulge towards the Republican majority of this body at this time. Let me tell him of the indignant rebukes which such language called down upon their heads from his lips; and that reminiscence will bring home to him what we ought to feel, and what, I trust, some of us do feel, at his reproaches, even if we have too tamely forborne to give utterance to the indignation which they were so well calculated to excite. In the elevated position which the Senator occupies; in view of that, still more elevated, to which he aspires, I submit that it does not become him to use words which imply as little respect for himself, as to many of those with whom he is associated in legislation.

We have heard much here of pension agents, and of their use of the public money as a compensation for their trouble. Why, sir, this is no new thing. The National Bank performed the duties of pension agents. Did it do so for nothing? No, sir. It performed these and other duties in consideration of the use of the public deposites committed to its charge. Its average annual compensation was at least half a million of dollars.

Much complaint is made, too, concerning the high rates of domestic exchanges. This is no novelty in our pecuniary history. Several times during the existence of the Bank of the United States, the domestic exchanges were in an equally disordered condition. And if my memory serves me, in 1819, in 1825, and when the national debt was about to be finally extinguished, that bank was on the verge of a suspension of specie payments. At the two former periods it was saved by the aid of the Government. At the latter period the bank, to sustain and strengthen itself, induced the European holders of our public debt to retain its evidences in their hands some months, the bank agreeing to pay the interest to them for the time, in consideration of the postponement of their presentation, by which it was enabled to protect itself by the use of the public money so much longer. These facts go to show the importance of separating the Government from all banks, in reference to the safety of the public moneys, and to the general stability of the banking operations and currency of the country.

Sir, the honorable Senators over the way disagree as to the purposes which they ascribe to the Administration and to us. Some of them say that we are for a hard money currency alone. The Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. DAVIS] declares that we mean no such thing; that we are for a Government paper currency. We are not bound, sir, to defend ourselves against these contradictory accusations. Let us do what we may, they are determined to disapprove of this or any other similar measure.

"They do not like it, Doctor Fell,
The reason why they cannot tell;
But this, I'm sure, I know full well,
They do not like it, Doctor Fell."

The bill has been charged with effecting a union of the purse and sword in the same hands. Mr. President, the boldness with which asseverations of this kind are made, in the presence of an enlightened assembly, are truly marvellous. The ministerial custody of the public money has always been committed to the Executive Department of the Government. At all times, under all administrations, whether deposited in banks, or remaining in the hands of receivers and collectors, the Executive or the Treasury Department has had, by law, the general care of the revenue of the nation, when paid in. The measure before us does not, in the slightest degree, vary this principle, which exists now, and existed in the palmy days of the Republic, when Thomas Jefferson was its Chief Executive Magistrate. Nominally, the public money is always in the charge of the Executive. But, according to the bill before us, as under all previous systems, no money can be drawn from the Treasury, except in pursuance of an appropriation by law. The allegation is unfounded, that by this bill the purse and the sword are united in the same hands. The Executive cannot touch any money without an appropriation by Congress. Sir, I have never, in my whole life, seen a measure treated with the want of candor, the misrepresentation, the hardihood of assertion, which the bill before the Senate has experienced from some of its adversaries, from its first inception to the present moment. The purse was never more completely separated from the sword, never more effectually in the hands of Congress, than it will be under the provisions of this bill.

Sir, the honorable Senator from Masschusetts [Mr. WEBSTER] charges the Administration with shrinking from responsibility, with retreating from manly contest, in relation to the subjects of the currency and the public money. I had supposed that if any measure ever proposed by an Executive were marked by a manly sense of responsibility, by a disposition to shrink from no duty, this was that measure. It has been denounced by the Opposition as a bold and daring innovation upon established notions. Is this a shrinking, evasive, unmanly characteristic? But if the honorable Senator means that the Administration shrinks from the responsibility of proposing the establishment of a general paper currency, he is correct. The Administration do shrink from any violation of the Constitution. Sir, you are nowhere authorized by that instrument to establish a national paper currency. Gold and silver, the precious metals, are the only money recognised in the Constitution; and in the use of bank paper at all, this Government has heretofore yielded to circumstances, to a state of things, beyond and without the Constitution, which they could not entirely control. The Senator has been called the great champion of the Constitution. Sir, he is an able lawyer. But he is the great violator of the Constitution, when he requires this Government to establish a national paper currency. Failing to adduce any feasible provision in that instrument to justify such a measure, the Senator appeals to that common sense, of which I wish he had infused a little more into his late speech on this floor, assailing this measure as a system of safes, and vaults, and cells, and caverns, to show that the power, yet undiscovered in the Constitution, ought to be exercised. Sir, I trust that this great confederate Republic may long be saved from such champions of its Constitution as are perpetually seeking in it for some pretext to justify the exercise of a power not granted to this Government. In the speech of the Senator, not much that is tangible, bearing upon the intrinsic merits of this bill, is to be found. It is general declamation. The measure is assailed, not for what it does contain, but for what it does not contain. The Senator undertakes to tell us what public sentiment is, on this subject, in this nation. His predictions may be verified; but if they be, it will be the first time in his political life that he has judged or acted according to the general sentiment of the nation. At one time, he found himself in a majority of this body; but it was in that ill-fated coalition, which here, in this hall, sustained itself so long in defiance of public opinion, and which, now in a minority, is, if we may judge from recent indications over the way, rapidly crumbling to its final dissolution.

In relation to that principle in the bill, which proposes a gradual return to the exclusive reception of gold and silver in payment of the public dues, I incline to the opinion that it will prove salutary. It does not, however, immediately go into effect; and if, by the next session of Congress, it should be found that the banks have resumed specie payments, and have been restored to a sound and safe condition, we may, if it should be deemed expedient, modify or postpone this provision still further at that time. We need not be too tenacious upon this point. The great object, in proposing and supporting this measure, is the divorce of the Government from the banks. That object attained, the Government will cease to be subject to the dangerous power, the importuning influence, the fluctuating operations of the banks. The banks themselves will rely upon their own proper resources, the custom of the merchants, and the confidence of the people, for their support, their business and profits. The people will cease to be perpetually agitated by the fluctuations produced, in a great degree, by the connection between bank and State, between the bank operations and the politics of the country. And our free, civil, and political institutions will no longer be endangered or overshadowed by the combined moneyed and banking power which pervades every part of the Union.

Mr. President, one word more, and I have done. If the bill before the Senate should be rejected, I am well satisfied that no other measure on this subject can, at this time, succeed in this body. The vague and indefinite notions of a special deposite system—special deposites of bank paper, as well as of specie—are only so many crude conceptions of financial and political quackery. They will, I trust, find no sanction here. I concur in the suggestion, advanced on this floor, that we have the alternative of remaining as we are; and that, in my judgment, is the next best alternative to the measure now under discussion.

SPEECH OF MR. CALHOUN,

OF SOUTH CAROLINA,

In Senate, Saturday, March 10, 1838—In reply to Mr. CLAY, on Mr. WRIGHT'S bill.

I rise to fulfil a promise I made some time since to notice at my leisure the reply of the Senator from Kentucky farthest from me [Mr. CLAY] to my remarks, when I first addressed the Senate on the subject now under discussion.

On comparing with care the reply with the remarks, I am at a loss to determine whether it is the most remarkable for its omissions or misstatements. Instead of leaving not a hair in the head of my arguments, as the Senator threatened, (to use his not very dignified expression,) he has not even attempted to answer a large, and not the least weighty, portion; and of that which he has, there is not one fairly stated, or fairly answered. I speak literally, and without exaggeration; nor would it be difficult to establish to the letter what I assert, if I could reconcile it to myself to consume the time of the Senate in establishing a long series of negative propositions, in which they could take but little interest, however important they may be regarded by the Senator and myself. To avoid so idle a consumption of the time, I propose to present a few instances of his misstatements, from which the rest may be inferred; and, that I may not be suspected of having selected them, I shall take them in the order in which they stand in his reply.

The Senate will recollect that when the Senator from Virginia farthest from me [Mr. RIVES] introduced his substitute, he accompanied it with the remark, that it was his first choice, and the second choice of those who are allied with him on this occasion. In noticing this remark, I stated, that if I might judge from appearances, which could scarcely deceive one, the Senator might have said, not only the second, but, under existing circumstances, it was their first choice, and that, despairing of a bank for the present, they would support his substitute. Assuming this inference to be correct, I stated that the question was narrowed down, in fact, to the bill and substitute, of which one or the other must be selected. The Senator from Kentucky, in his reply, omitted all these qualifications, and represented me as making the absolute assertion that, in the nature of the case, there was no other alternative but the bill or the substitute, and then gravely pointed out two others—to do nothing, or adopt a National Bank; as if I could possibly be ignorant of what was so obvious. After he had thus replied, not to what I really said, but his own misstatement of it, as if to make compensation, he proceeded in the same breath to confirm the truth of what I did say by giving his support to the substitute, which he called a half-way house, where he could spend some pleasant hours. Nothing is more easy than to win such victories.

Having inferred, as has turned out to be the fact, that there was no other alternative at present but the bill and substitute, I next showed the embarrassment to which the gentlemen opposite to me would be involved, from having, four years ago, on the question of the removal of the deposites, denounced a league of State banks, similar to that proposed to be revived by the substitute. After enlarging on this point, I remarked that, if I might be permitted to state my opinion, the gentlemen had taken a course unfortunate for themselves and the country: unfortunate for them; for, let what would come, they would be responsible. If the bill was lost, theirs would be the responsibility; if the substitute was carried, on them the responsibility would fall; and if nothing was done, they would be held responsible; and unfortunate for the country, because it had prevented the decision of the question at the extra session, which could not have failed to put an early termination to the present commercial and pecuniary embarrassment. This the Senator, in his reply, met by stating that I had called on him and his friends to follow my lead; and thus regarding it, he made it the pretext of some ill-natured personal remarks, which I shall notice hereafter. I never dreamed of making such a call; and what I said cannot be tortured, by the force of construction, to bear a meaning having the least semblance to it.

After making these preliminary remarks, I took up the substitute, and showed that it proposed to make a bargain with the banks. I then stated the particulars and the conditions of the proposed bargain; that its object was to enable the banks to pay their debts, and for that purpose it proposed to confer important privileges; to give them the use of the public funds from the time of deposite to disbursement, and to have their notes received as cash in the dues of the Government. I then asked if we had a right to make such a bargain? The Senator, leaving out all these particulars, represented me as saying that the Government had no right to make a bargain with the banks; and then undertakes to involve me in an inconsistency, in supporting the bill, because it proposes to bargain with the banks for the use of their vaults, as a place of safe-keeping for the public money; as if there was a possible analogy between the two cases. Nothing is more easy than to refute the most demonstrative argument in this way. Drop an essential part of the premises, and the most irresistible conclusion of course falls.

In the same summary and easy mode of replying to my arguments, the Senator perverted my denial that the Government had a right to receive bank notes as cash, into the assertion that it had no right to receive any thing but cash; and then accuses me with inconsistency, because I voted, at the extra session, for the bill authorizing the receipt of Treasury notes in the dues of the Government; as if any one ever doubted that it could receive its own paper, or securities, in payment of its debts. Such are the misstatements of the Senator, taken in their regular order, as they stand in his reply; and they present a fair specimen of what he chooses to consider an answer to my argument. There is not one less unfairly stated, or unfairly met, than the instances I have cited.

The Senator presented two difficulties in reply to what I said against receiving bank notes by the Government, which demand a passing notice before I dismiss this part of the subject. He objected, first, that it was contrary to the provision of the bill itself, which authorizes the receipts of the notes of specie-paying banks for a limited time. To answer this objection, it will be necessary to advert to the object of the provision. By the provisions of the joint resolution of 1816, the notes of specie-paying banks are made receivable in the dues of the Government; and, of course, on the resumption of specie payments, bank notes would again be received by the Government as heretofore, without limitation as to time, unless some provision be adopted to prevent it. In a word, the Government, though separated in fact at present from the banks, is not legally separated; and the object of the provision is to effect the separation as well in law as it is in fact. This it proposes to do by a gradual repeal of the joint resolution of 1816, in order to prevent, as far as possible, any injurious effects to the community or the banks. The Senator, in making his objection, overlooks the broad distinction between the doing and undoing of an unconstitutional act. There are some unconstitutional acts that are difficult, if not impossible, to be undone; such, for instance, as the admission of Louisiana into the Union, admitting it to be unconstitutional, which I do not. There are others which cannot be undone suddenly, without wide-spread distress and ruin; such as the protective tariff, which, accordingly, the compromise act allowed upwards of eight years for the gradual repeal. Such also is the case under consideration, which, under the provisions of the bill, would be effected in seven years. In all such cases I hold it to be not only clearly constitutional for Congress to make a gradual repeal, but its duty to do so; otherwise it would be often impossible to get clear of an unconstitutional act short of a revolution. His next objection was, that the reasons which would make the receipt of bank notes unconstitutional, would also make the China trade so, which he represented as absorbing a large portion of the specie of the country. There is no analogy whatever between the two cases. The very object of specie is to carry on trade, and it would be idle to attempt to regulate the distribution and fluctuation which result from its operation. Experience proves that all attempts of the kind must either prove abortive or mischievous. In fact, it may be laid down as a law, that the more universal the demand for specie, and the less that demand is interrupted, the more steady and uniform its value, and the more perfectly, of course, it fulfils the great purpose of circulation, for which it was intended. There are, however, not a few who, taking a different view, have thought it to be the duty of the Government to prohibit the exportation of specie to China, on the very ground which the Senator atsumes, and I am not certain but that he himself has been in favor of the measnre.

But the Senator did not restrict himself to a reply to my arguments. He introduced personal remarks, which neither self-respect, nor a regard to the cause I support, will permit me to pass without notice, as adverse as I am to all personal controversies. Not only my education and disposition, but, above all, my conception of the duties belonging to the station I occupy, indisposes me to such controversies. We are sent here, not to wrangle, or indulge in personal abuse, but to deliberate and decide on the common interests of the States of this Union, as far as they have been subjected by the Constitution to our jurisdiction. Thus thinking and feeling, and having perfect confidence in the cause I support, I addressed myself, when I was last up, directly and exclusively to the understanding, carefully avoiding every remark which had the least personal or party bearing. In proof of this, I appeal to you, Senators, my witnesses and judges on this occasion. But it seems that no caution on my part could prevent what I was so anxious to avoid. The Senator, having no pretext to give a personal direction to the discussion, made a premeditated and gratuitous attack on me. I say having no pretext, for there is not a shadow of foundation for the assertion that I called on him and his party to follow my lead, at which he seemed to take offence, as I have already shown. I made no such call, or any thing that could be construed into it. It would have been impertinent, in the relation between myself and his party, at any stage of this question; and absurd at that late period, when every Senator had made up his mind. As there was, then, neither provocation nor pretext, what could be the motive of the Senator in making the attack? It could not be to indulge in the pleasure of personal abuse, the lowest and basest of all our passions, and which is so far beneath the dignity of the Senator's character and station. Nor could it be with the view to intimidation. The Senator knows me too long and too well to make such an attempt. I am sent here by constituents as respectable as those he represents, in order to watch over their peculiar interests, and take care of the general concern; and if I were capable of being deterred by any one, or any consequence, in discharging my duty, from denouncing what I regarded as dangerous or corrupt, or giving a decided and zealous support to what I thought right and expedient, I would, in shame and confusion, return my commission to the patriotic and gallant State I represent, to be placed in more resolute and trustworthy hands.

If, then, neither the one nor the other of these be the motive, what, I repeat, can it be? In casting my eyes over the whole surface I can see but one, which is, that the Senator, despairing of the sufficiency of his reply to overthrow my arguments, had resorted to personalities, in the hope, with their aid, to effect what he could not accomplish by main strength. He well knows that the force of an argument on moral or political subjects depends greatly on the character of him who advanced it, and that to cast suspicion on his sincerity or motive, or to shake confidence in his understanding, is often the most effectual mode to destroy its force. Thus viewed, his personalities may be fairly regarded as constituting a part of his reply to my argument; and we, accordingly, find the Senator throwing them in front, like a skilful general, in order to weaken my arguments before he brought on his main attack. In repelling, then, his personal attacks, I also defend the cause which I advocate. It is against that his blows are aimed, and he strikes at it through me, because he believes his blows will be the more effectual.

Having given this direction to his reply, he has imposed on me a double duty to repel his attacks: duty to myself and the cause I support. I shall not decline its performance; and when it is discharged, I trust I shall have placed my character as far beyond the darts which he has hurled at it, as my arguments have proved to be above his abilities to reply to them. In doing this, I shall be compelled to speak of myself. No one can be more sensible than I am how how odious it is to speak of one's self. I shall endeavor to confine myself within the limits of the strictest propriety; but if any thing should escape me that may wound the most delicate ear, the odium ought in justice to fall not on me, but the Senator, who, by his unprovoked and wanton attack, has imposed on me the painful necessity of speaking of myself.

The leading charge of the Senator—that on which all the others depend, and which, being overthrown, they fall to the ground—is that I have gone over; have left his side, and joined the other. By this vague and indefinite expression, I presume he meant to imply that I had either changed my opinion, or abandoned my principle, or deserted my party. If he did not mean one, or all; if I have changed neither opinions, principles, nor party, then the charge meant nothing deserving notice. But if he intended to imply, what I have presumed he did, I take issue on the fact—I meet and repel the charge. It happened, fortunately for me, fortunately for the cause of truth and justice, that it was not the first time that I had offered my sentiments on the question now under consideration. There is scarcely a single point in the present issue on which I did not explicitly express my opinion, four years ago, in my place here, when the removal of the deposites and the questions connected with it were under discussion—so explicitly as to repel effectually the charge of any change on my part, and to make it impossible for me to pursue any other course than I have without involving myself in gross inconsistency. I intend not to leave so important a point to rest on my bare assertion. What I assert stands on record, which I now hold in my possession, and intend, at the proper time, to introduce and read. But, before I do that, it will be proper I should state the questions now at issue, and my course in relation to them, so that, having a clear and distinct perception of them, you may, Senators, readily and satisfactorily compare and determine whether my course on the present occasion coincides with the opinions I then expressed.

There are three questions, as is agreed by all, involved in the present issue: Shall we separate the Government from the banks, or shall we revive the league of State banks, or create a national bank? My opinion and course in reference to each are well known. I prefer the separation to either of the others; and, as between the other two, I regard a national bank as a more efficient and a less corrupting fiscal agent than a league of State banks. It is also well known that I have expressed myself on the present occasion hostile to the banking system, as it exists, and against the constitutional power of making a bank, unless on the assumption that we have the right to receive and treat bank notes as cash in our fiscal operations, which I, for the first time, have denied on the present occasion. Now, I entertained and expressed all these opinions, on a different occasion, four years ago, except the right of receiving bank notes, in regard to which I then reserved my opinion; and if all this should be fully and clearly established by the record, from speeches delivered and published at the time, the charge of the Senator must, in the opinion of all, however prejudiced, sink to the ground. I am now prepared to introduce, and have the record read. I delivered two speeches in the session of 1833–34, one on the removal of the deposites, and the other on the question of the renewal of the charter of the late bank. I ask the Secretary to turn to the volume lying before him, and read the three paragraphs marked in my speech on the deposites. I will thank him to raise his voice, and read slowly, so that he may be distinctly heard, and I must ask you, Senators, to give your attentive hearing, for on the coincidence between my opinions then and my course now my vindication against this unprovoked and groundless charge rests.

"If [said Mr. C.] this was a question of bank or no bank; if it involved the existence of the banking system, it would indeed be a great question—one of the first magnitude; and, with my present impression, long entertained, and daily increasing, I would hesitate, long hesitate, before I would be found under the banner of the system. I have great doubts (if doubts they may be called) as to the soundness and tendency of the whole system, in all its modifications. I have great fears that it will be found hostile to liberty and the advance of civilization; fatally hostile to liberty in our country, where the system exists in its worst and most dangerous form. Of all institutions affecting the great question of the distribution of wealth; a question least explored, and the most important of any in the whole range of political economy, the banking institution has, if not the greatest, among the greatest, and, I fear, most pernicious, influence on the mode of distribution. Were the question really before us, I would not shun the responsibility, great as it might be, of freely and fully offering my sentiments on these deeply important points; but, as it is, I must content myself with the few remarks which I have thrown out.

"What, then, is the real question which now agitates the country? I answer, it is a struggle between the Executive and Legislative departments of the Government; a struggle, not in relation to the existence of the bank, but which, Congress or the President, should have the power to create a bank, and the consequent control over the currency of the country. This is the real question. Let us not deceive ourselves. This league, this association of banks, created by the Executive, bound together by its influence, united in common articles of association, vivified and sustained by receiving the deposites of the public money, and having their notes converted, by being received every where by the Treasury, into the common currency of the country, is, to all intents and purposes, a Bank of the United States, the Executive Bank of the United States, as distinguished from that of Congress.

"However it might fail to perform satisfactorily the useful functions of the Bank of the United States as incorporated by law, it would outstrip it, far outstrip it, in all its dangerous qualities, in extending the power, the influence, and the corruption of the Government. It was impossible to conceive any institution more admirably calculated to advance these objects. Not only the selected banks, but the whole banking institutions of the country, and with them the entire money power, for the purpose of speculation, peculation, and corruption, would be placed under the control of the Executive. A system of menaces and promises will be established; of menace to the banks in possession of the deposites, but which might not be entirely subservient to Executive views; and of promise of future favors to those who may not as yet enjoy its favors. Between the two, the banks would be left without influence, honor, or honesty; and a system of speculation and stock-jobbing would commence, unequalled in the annals of our country."

"So long as the question is one between a Bank of the United States, incorporated by Congress, and that system of banks which has been created by the will of the Executive, it is an insult to the understanding to discourse on the pernicious tendency and unconstitutionality of the Bank of the United States. To bring up that question fairly and legitimately, you must go one step farther—you must divorce the Government and the banking system. You must refuse all connection with banks. You must neither receive nor pay away bank notes; you must go back to the old system of the strong box, and of gold and silver. If you have a right to receive bank notes at all—to treat them as money by receiving them in your dues, or paying them away to creditors, you have a right to create a bank. Whatever the Government receives and treats as money, is money; and, if it be money, then they have the right, under the Constitution, to regulate it. Nay, they are bound by a high obligation to adopt the most efficient means, according to the nature of that which they have recognised as money, to give to it the utmost stability and uniformity of value. And if it be in the shape of bank notes, the most efficient means of giving those qualities is a Bank of the United States, incorporated by Congress. Unless you give the highest practical uniformity to the value of bank notes—so long as you receive them in your dues, and treat them as money, you violate that provision of the Constitution which provides that taxation shall be uniform throughout the United States. There is no other alternative. I repeat, you must divorce the Government entirely from the banking system, or, if not, you are bound to incorporate a bank as the only safe and efficient means of giving stability and uniformity to the currency. And should the deposites not be restored, and the present illegal and unconstitutional connection between the Executive and the league of banks continue, I shall feel it my duty, if no one else moves, to introduce a measure to prohibit Government from receiving or touching bank notes in any shape whatever, as the only means left of giving safety and stability to the currency, and saving the country from corruption and ruin."

Such were my sentiments, delivered four years since, on the question of the removal of the deposites, and now standing on record; and I now call your attention, Senators, while they are fresh in your minds, and before other extracts are read, to the opinions I then entertained and expressed, in order that you may compare them with those that I have expressed, and the course I have pursued, on the present occasion. In the first place, I then expressed myself explicitly and decidedly against the banking system, and intimated, in language too strong to be mistaken, that, if the question was then bank or no bank, as it now is, as far as Government is concerned, I would not be found on the side of the bank. Now, I ask, I appeal to the candor of all, even the most prejudiced, is there any thing in all this contradictory to my present opinions or course? On the contrary, having entertained and expressed these opinions, could I, at this time, when the issue I then supposed is actually presented, have gone against the separation without gross inconsistency? Again, I then declared myself to be utterly opposed to a combination or league of State banks, as being the most inefficient and corrupting fiscal agent the Government could select, and more objectionable than a Bank of the United States. I again appeal, is there a sentiment or a word in all this contradictory to what I have said or done on the present occasion? So far otherwise, is here not a perfect harmony and coincidence throughout, which, considering the distance of time and the difference of the occasion, is truly remarkable, and this extending to all the great and governing questions now at issue?

But the removal of the deposites was not the only question discussed at that remarkable and important session. The charter of the United States Bank was then about to expire. The Senator from Massachusetts nearest to me, [Mr. WEBSTER,] then at the head of the Committee on Finance, suggested, in his place, that he intended to introduce a bill to renew the charter. I clearly perceived that the movement, if made, would fail; and that there was no prospect of doing any thing to arrest the danger I saw approaching, unless the subject was taken up on the broad question of the currency; and that if any connection of the Government with the banks could be justified at all, it must be in that relation. I am not among those who believe that the currency was in a sound condition when the deposites were removed in 1834. I then believed, and experience has proved I was correct, that it was deeply and dangerously diseased; and that the most efficient measures were necessary to prevent the catastrophe which has since fallen on the circulation of the country. There was then not more than one dollar in specie, on an average, in the banks, including the United States Bank and all, for six of bank notes in circulation, and not more than one in eleven compared to liabilities of the banks, and this while the United States Bank was in full and active operation, which proves conclusively that its charter ought not to be renewed, if renewed at all, without great modifications. I saw also that the expansion of the circulation, great as it then was, must still farther increase; that the disease lay deep in the system; that the terms on which the charter of the Bank of England was renewed would give a western direction to specie, which, instead of correcting the disorder, by substituting specie for bank notes in our circulation, would become the basis of new banking operations that would greatly increase the swelling tide. Such were my conceptions then, and I honestly and earnestly endeavored to carry them into effect, in order to prevent the approaching catastrophe.

The political and personal relations between myself and the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. WEBSTER] were then not the kindest. We stood in opposition at the preceding session on the great question growing out of the conflict between the State I represented and the General Government, which could not pass away without leaving unfriendly feelings on both sides; but where duty is involved, I am not in the habit of permitting my personal relations to interfere. In my solicitude to avoid coming dangers, I sought an interview through a common friend, in order to compare opinions as to the proper course to be pursued. We met, and conversed freely and fully, but parted without agreeing. I expressed to him my deep regret at our disagreement, and informed him that, although I could not agree with him, I would throw no embarrassment in his way, but should feel it to be my duty, when he made his motion to introduce a bill to renew the charter of the bank, to express my opinion at large on the state of the currency and the proper course to be pursued, which I accordingly did. On that memorable occasion I stood almost alone. One party supported the league of State banks, and the other the United States Bank, the charter of which the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. WEBSTER] proposed to renew for six years. Nothing was left me but to place myself distinctly before the country on the ground I occupied, which I did, fully and explicitly, in the speech I delivered on the occasion. In justice to myself, I ought to have every word of it read on the present occasion. It would of itself be a full vindication of my course. I stated and enlarged on all the points to which I have already referred; objected to the recharter as proposed by the mover, and foretold that what has since happened would follow, unless something effectual was done to prevent it. As a remedy, I proposed to use the Bank of the United States as a temporary expedient, fortified with strong guards, in order to resist and turn back the swelling tide of circulation. With this view, I proposed to prohibit the issue of any note under ten dollars, at first, and after a certain interval, under twenty; and to refuse to receive the notes of any bank that issued notes under five dollars, or that received the notes of any bank that issued less, in order to make a total separation between the banks that should refuse to discontinue the issue of small notes, and the others, in the hope that the influence of the latter, with the voice of the community, would ultimately compel a discontinuance. I proposed that the charter, with these and other provisions that might be devised by a committee appointed for the purpose, should be renewed for twelve years, two years longer than the Bank of England had been, in order to avail ourselves of the experience and wisdom of that great and enlightened nation. All this I proposed, expressly on the ground of undoing the system, gradually and slowly, till a total disconnection should be effected, if experience should show that it could be carried to that extent. My object was double; to get clear of the system, and to avoid the catastrophe which has since befallen us, and which I then saw was approaching.

To prove all this, I again refer to the record. If it shall appear from it that my object was to disconnect the Government gradually and cautiously from the banking system, and with that view, and that only, I proposed to use the United States Bank for a short time, and that I explicitly expressed the same opinions then, as I now have, on almost every point connected with the system, I shall not only have vindicated my character from the charge of the Senator from Kentucky, but shall do more, much more: show that I did all an individual, standing alone as I did, could do to avert the present calamities, and, of course, I am free from all responsibility for what has since happened. I have shortened the extracts, as far as was possible to do myself justice, and have left out much that ought, of right, to be read in my defence, rather than to weary the Senate. I know how difficult it is to command attention to reading of documents; but I trust that this, where justice to a member of the body, whose character has been assailed without the least provocation, will form an exception. The extracts are numbered, and I will thank the Secretary to pause at the end of each, unless otherwise desired.

The Secretary here read the following extract:

"After a full survey of the whole subject, I see none, I can conjecture no means of extricating the country from its present danger, and to arrest its farther increase, but a bank, the agency of which, in some form or under some authority, is indispensable. The country has been brought into the present diseased state of the currency by banks, and must be extricated by their agency. We must, in a word, use a bank to unbank the banks, to the extent that may be necessary to restore a safe and stable currency—just as we apply snow to a frozen limb in order to restore vitality and circulation, or hold up a burn to the flame to extract the inflammation. All must see that it is impossible to suppress the banking system at once. It must continue for a time. Its greatest enemies, and the advocates of an exclusive specie circulation, must make it a part of their system to tolerate the banks for a longer or a shorter period. To suppress them at once would, if it were possible, work a greater revolution, a greater change in the relative condition of the various classes of the community, than would the conquest of the country by a savage enemy. What, then, must be done? I answer, a new and safe system must gradually grow up under, and replace, the old; imitating, in this respect, the beautiful process which we sometimes see, of a wounded or diseased part in a living organic body, gradually superseded by the healing process of nature."

After having so expressed myself, which clearly shows that my object was to use the bank for a time in such a manner as to break the connection with the system, without a shock to the country or currency, I then proceed and examine the question, whether this could be best accomplished by the renewal of the charter of the United States Bank, or through a league of State banks. After concluding what I had to say on the subject, in my deep solicitude I addressed the three parties in the Senate separately, urging such motives as I thought best calculated to act on them, and pressing them to join me in the measure suggested, in order to avert approaching danger. I began with my friends of the State Rights party and with the Administration. I have taken copious extracts from the address to the first, which will clearly prove how exactly my opinion then and now coincide on all questions connected with the banks. I now ask the Secretary to read the extract numbered two.

"Having now stated the measure necessary to apply the remedy, I am thus brought to the question—can the measure succeed? which brings up the inquiry of how far it may be expected to receive the support of the several parties which compose the Senate, and on which I shall next proceed to make a few remarks.

"First, then, can the State Rights party give it their support? that party of which I am proud of being a member, and for which I entertain so strong an attachment—the stronger because we are few among many. In proposing this question, I am not ignorant of their long-standing constitutional objection to the bank, on the ground that this was intended to be, as it is usually expressed, a hard-money Government—a Government whose circulating medium was intended to consist of the precious metals, and for which object the power of coining money and regulating the value thereof was expressly conferred by the Constitution. I know how long and how sincerely this opinion has been entertained, and under how many difficulties it has been maintained. It is not my intention to attempt to change an opinion so firmly fixed, but I may be permitted to make a few observations, in order to present what appears to me to be the true question in reference to this constitutional point—in order that we may fully comprehend the circumstances under which we are placed in reference to it. With this view, I do not deem it necessary to inquire whether, in conferring the power to coin money and to regulate the value thereof, the Constitution intended to limit the power strictly to coining money and regulating its value, or whether it intended to confer a more general power over the currency; nor do I intend to inquire whether the word coin is limited simply to the metals, or may be extended to other substances, if, through a gradual change, they may become the medium of the general circulation of the world."

"The very receipt of bank notes on the part of the Government, in its dues, would it is conceded, make them money, as far as the Government may be concerned, and by a necessary consequence, would make them, to a great extent, the currency of the country. I say nothing of the positive provisions in the Constitution which declare that 'all duties, imposts, and excises, shall be uniform throughout the United States,' which cannot be, unless that in which they are paid should also have, as nearly as practicable, a uniform value throughout the country. To effect this, where bank notes are received, the banking power is necessary and proper within the meaning of the Constitution; and consequently, if the Government has the right to receive bank notes in its dues, the power becomes constitutional. Here lies, said Mr. C. the real constitutional question: has the Government a right to receive bank notes or not? The question is not upon the mere power of incorporating a bank, as it has been commonly argued; though, even in that view, there would be as great a constitutional objection to any act on the part of the Executive, or any other branch of the Government, which should unite any association of State banks into one system, as the means of giving the uniformity and stability to the currency which the Constitution intends to confer. The very act of so associating or incorporating them into one, by whatever name called, or by whatever department performed, would be in fact an act of incorporation.

"But, said Mr. C. my object, as I have stated, is not to discuss the constitutional questions, nor to determine whether the bank be constitutional or not. It is, I repeat, to show where the difficulty lies—a difficulty which I have felt from the time I first came into the public service. I found then, as now, the currency of the country consisting almost entirely of bank notes. I found the Government intimately connected with the system, receiving bank notes in its dues, and paying them away under its appropriations as cash. The fact was beyond my control: it existed long before my time, and without my agency; and I was compelled to act on the fact as it existed, without deciding on the many questions which I have suggested, as connected with this subject, and on many of which I have never yet formed a definite opinion. No one can pay less regard to precedent than I do, acting here in my representative and deliberative character, on legal or constitutional questions; but I have felt from the beginning the full force of the distinction so sensibly taken by the Senator from Virginia, [Mr. LEIGH,] between doing and undoing an act, and which he so strongly illustrated in the case of the purchase of Louisiana. The constitutionality of that act was doubted by many at the time, and among others by its author himself; yet he would be considered a madman who, coming into political life, at this late period, would now seriously take up the question of the constitutionality of the purchase, and coming to the conclusion that it was unconstitutional, should propose to rescind the act, and eject from the Union two flourishing States, and a growing Territory."

I next ask the attention of the Senators, especially from the Northern States, while the Secretary reads the short address to the Opposition, that they may see how distinctly I foresaw what was coming, and how anxious I was to avert the calamity that has fallen on the section where I anticipated it would. I ask the Secretary to read the extract numbered three.

"I next address myself to the members of the Opposition, who principally represent the commercial and manufacturing portions of the country, where the banking system has been the farthest extended, and where a larger portion of the property exists in the shape of credit than in any other section; and to whom a sound and stable currency is most necessary, and the opposite most dangerous. You have no constitutional objection; to you it is a mere question of expediency: viewed in this light, can you vote for the proposed measure?—a measure designed to arrest the approach of events which I have demonstrated must, if not arrested, create convulsions and revolutions; and to correct a disease which must, if not corrected, subject the currency to continued agitations and fluctuations: and in order to give that permanence, stability, and uniformity which is so essential to your safety and prosperity. To effect this may require some diminution on the profits of banking; some temporary sacrifice of interest; but if such should be the fact, it would be compensated in more than a hundred-fold proportion, by increased security and durable prosperity. If the system must advance in the present course without a check, and if explosion must follow, remember that where you stand will be the crater: should the system quake, under your feet the chasm will open that will engulf your institutions and your prosperity."

I regret to trespass on the patience of the Senate, but I wish, in justice to myself, to ask their attention to one more, which, though not immediately relating to the question under consideration, is not irrelevant to my vindication. I not only expressed my opinions freely in relation to the currency and the bank, in the speech from which such copious extracts have been read, but had the precaution to define my political position distinctly in reference to the political parties of the day, and the course I would pursue in relation to each. I then, as now, belonged to the party to which it is my glory ever to have been attached exclusively; and avowed, explicitly, that I belonged to neither of the two parties, Opposition or Administration, then contending for superiority, which of itself ought to go far to repel the charge of the Senator from Kentucky, that I have gone over from one party to the other. The Secretary will read the last extract:

"I am the partisan, as I have said, of no class, nor, let me add, of any political party. I am neither of the Opposition nor of the Administration. If I act with the former in any instance, it is because I approve of their course on the particular occasion; and I shall always be happy to act with them when I do approve. If I oppose the Administration; if I desire to see power change hands, it is because I disapprove of the general course of those in authority; because they have departed from the principles on which they came into office; because, instead of using the immense power and patronage put in their hands to secure the liberty of the country and advance the public good, they have perverted them into party instruments for personal objects. But mine has not been, nor will it be, a systematic opposition. Whatever measure of theirs I may deem right, I shall cheerfully support; and I only desire that they shall afford me more frequent occasions for support, and fewer for opposition, than they have heretofore done."

Such, Senators, are my recorded sentiments in 1834. They are full and explicit on all the questions involved in the present issue, and prove, beyond the possibility of doubt, that I have changed no opinion, abandoned no principle, nor deserted any party. I stand now on the ground I stood then, and, of course, if my relations to the two opposing parties are changed—if I now act with those that I then opposed, and oppose those with whom I then acted, the change is not in me. I at least have stood still. In saying this, I accuse none of changing. I leave others to explain their position, now and then, if they should deem explanation necessary. But, if I may be permitted to state my opinion, I would say that the change is rather in the question and the circumstances, than in the opinions or principles of either of the parties. The Opposition were then and now National Bank men, and the Administration, in like manner, were anti-national bank, and in favor of a league of State banks, while I preferred then, as now, the former to the latter, and a divorce from banks to either. When the experiment of the league failed, the Administration were reduced to the option between a National Bank and a divorce. They chose the latter, and such, I have no reason to doubt, would have been their choice, had the option been the same four years ago. Nor have I any doubt, had the option been then between a league of banks and divorce, the Opposition then, as now, would have been in favor of the league. In all this there is more apparent than real change. As to myself, there has been neither. If I acted with the Opposition and opposed the Administration then, it was because I was openly opposed to the removal of the deposites and the league of banks, as I now am; and if I now act with the latter and oppose the former, it is because I am now, as then, in favor of a divorce, and opposed to either a league of State banks or a National Bank, except indeed as the means of effecting a divorce gradually and safely. What, then, is my offence? What but refusing to abandon my first choice, the divorce from the banks, because the Administration has selected it, and of going with the Opposition for a National Bank, to which I have been and am still opposed? That is all; and for this I am charged with going over—leaving one party and joining the other.

Had some guardian angel, Mr. President, whispered in my ear at the time, "be cautious what you say; this question will not terminate here: four years hence it will be revived, under very different circumstances, when your principles and duty will compel you to act with those you now oppose, and oppose those with whom you now act, and when you will be charged with the desertion of principles," I could not have guarded myself more effectually than I have done. Yet, in the face of all this, the Senator has not only made the charge, but has said, in his place, that he heard, for the first time in his life, at the extra session, that I was opposed to a National Bank! I could place the Senator in a dilemma, from which there is no possibility of escape. I might say to him, you have either forgot or not what I said in 1834. If you have not, how can you justify yourself in making the charge you have? But if you have—if you have forgot what is so recent, and what, from the magnitude of the question and the importance of the occasion, was so well calculated to impress itself on your memory, what possible value can be attached to your recollection or opinions, as to my course on more remote and less memorable occasions, on which you have undertaken to impeach my conduct? He may take his choice.

Having now established by the record that I have changed no opinion, abandoned no principle, nor deserted any party, the charge of the Senator, with all the aspersions with which he accompanied it, falls prostrate to the earth. Here I might leave the subject, and close my vindication. But I choose not. I shall follow the Senator up, step by step, in his unprovoked, and, I may now add, groundless attack, with blows not less decisive and victorious.

The Senator next proceeded to state, that in a certain document (if he named it I did not hear him) I assigned as the reason why I could not join in the attack on the Administration, that the benefit of the victory would not enure to myself or my party; or, as he explained himself, because it would not place myself and them in power. I presume he referred to a letter, in answer to an invitation to a public dinner, offered me by my old and faithful friends and constituents of Edgefield, in approbation of my course at the extra session.

[Mr. CLAY. I do.]

The pressure of domestic engagements would not permit me to accept their invitation, and, in declining it, I deemed it due to them and myself to explain my course, in its political and party bearing, more fully than I had done in debate. They had a right to know my reasons, and I expressed myself with the frankness due to the long and uninterrupted confidence that had ever existed between us.

Having made these explanatory remarks, I now proceed to meet the assertion of the Senator, and I again take issue on the fact. I assigned no such reason as the Senator attributes to me. I never dreamed nor thought of such a one; nor can any force of construction extort it from what I said. No: my object was not power or place, either for myself or party. It was far more humble and honest. It was to save ourselves and our principles from being absorbed and lost in a party more numerous and powerful, but differing from us on almost every principle and question of policy.

When the suspension of specie payments took place in May last, (not unexpected to me,) I immediately turned my attention to the event earnestly, considering it as an event pregnant with great and lasting consequences. Reviewing the whole ground, I saw nothing to change in the opinions and principles I had avowed in 1834, and I determined to carry them out, as far as circumstances and my ability would enable me. But I saw that my course must be influenced by the position which the two great contending parties might take in reference to the question. I did not doubt that the Opposition would rally either on a National Bank, or a combination of State banks, with Mr. Biddle's at the head; but I was wholly uncertain what course the Administration would adopt, and remained so till the Message of the President was received and read by the Secretary at his table. When I saw he went for a divorce, I never hesitated a moment. Not only my opinions and principles long entertained, and, as I have shown, fully expressed years ago, but the highest political motives, left me no alternative. I perceived, at once, that the object, to accomplish which we had acted in concert with the Opposition, had ceased; Executive usurpations had come to an end for the present; and that the struggle with the Administration was no longer for power, but to save themselves. I also clearly saw if we should unite with the Opposition in their attack on the Administration, the victory over them in the position they occupied would be a victory over us and our principles. It required no sagacity to see that such would be the result. It was as plain as day. The Administration had taken position, as I have shown, on the very ground I occupied in 1834, and which the whole State Rights party had taken at the same time in the other House, as its journals will prove. The Opposition, under the banner of the bank, were moving against them for the very reason that they had taken the ground they did.

Now, I ask, what would have been the result if we had joined in the attack? No one can now doubt that the victory over those in power would have been certain and decisive, nor would the consequences have been the least doubtful. The first fruit would have been a National Bank. The principles of the Opposition, and the very object of the attack, would have necessarily led to that. We would have been not only too feeble to resist, but would have been committed by joining in the attack with its avowed object to go for one, while those who support the Administration would have been scattered in the winds. We should then have had a bank—that is clear; nor is it less certain, that in its train there would have followed all the consequences which have and ever will follow, when tried—high duties, overflowing revenue, extravagant expenditures, large surpluses; in a word, all those disastrous consequences which have well near overthrown our institutions, and involved the country in its preseat difficulties. The influence of the institution, the known principles and policy of the Opposition, and the utter prostration of the Administration party, and the absorption of ours, would have led to these results as certainly as we exist.

I now appeal, Senators, to your candor and justice, and ask, could I, having all these consequences before me, with my known opinions and that of the party to which I belong, and to which only I owe fidelity, have acted differently from what I did? Would not any other course have justly exposed me to the charge of having abandoned my principles and party, with which I am now accused so unjustly? Nay, would it not have been worse than folly—been madness in me, to have taken any other? And yet, the grounds which I have assumed in this exposition are the very reasons assigned in my letter, and which the Senator has perverted most unfairly and unjustly into the pitiful, personal, and selfish reason, which he has attributed to me. Confirmative of what I say, I again appeal to the record. The Secretary will read the paragraph marked in my Edgefield letter, to which, I presume, the Senator alluded.

"As soon as I saw this state of things, I clearly perceived that a very important question was presented for our determination, which we were compelled to decide forthwith—shall we continue our joint attack with the Nationals on those in power, in the new position which they have been compelled to occupy? It was clear, with our joint forces, we could utterly overthrow and demolish them, but it was not less clear that the victory would enure, not to us, but exclusively to the benefit of our allies and their cause. They were the most numerous and powerful, and the point of assault on the position which the party to be assaulted had taken in relation to the banks, would have greatly strengthened the settled principles and policy of the National party, and weakened, in the same degree, ours. They are, and ever have been, the decided advocates of a National Bank, and are now in favor of one with a capital so ample as to be sufficient to control the State institutions, and to regulate the currency and exchanges of the country. To join them with their avowed object in the attack to overthrow those in power, on the ground they occupied against a bank, would, of course, not only have placed the Government and country in their hands without opposition, but would have committed us, beyond the possibility of extrication, for a bank, and absorbed our party in the ranks of the National Republicans. The first fruits of the victory would have been an overshadowing National Bank, with an immense capital, not less than from fifty to a hundred millions, which would have centralized the currency and exchanges, and with them the commerce and capital of the country, in whatever section the head of the institution might be placed. The next would be the indissoluble union of the political opponents, whose principles and policy are so opposite to ours, and so dangerous to our institutions, as well as oppressive to us."

I now ask, is there any thing in this extract which will warrant the construction that the Senator has attempted to force on it? Is it not manifest that the expression on which he fixes, that the victory would enure, not to us, but exclusively to the benefit of the Opposition, alludes not to power or place, but to principle and policy? Can words be more plain? What then becomes of all the aspersions of the Senator, his reflections about selfishness and the want of patriotism, and his allusions and illustrations to give them force and effect? They fall to the ground without deserving a notice, with his groundless accusation.

But, in so premeditated and indiscriminate an attack, it could not be expected that my motives would entirely escape, and we accordingly find the Senator very charitably leaving it to time to disclose my motive for going over. Leave it to time to disclose my motive for going over! I, who have changed no opinion, abandoned no principle, and deserted no party; I, who have stood still, and maintained my ground against every difficulty, to be told that it is left to time to disclose my motive! The imputation sinks to the earth with the groundless charge on which it rests. I stamp it with scorn in the dust. I pick up the dart, which fell harmless at my feet. I hurl it back. What the Senator charges on me unjustly, he has actually done. He went over on a memorable occasion, and did not leave it to time to disclose his motive.

The Senator next tells us that I bore a character for stern fidelity, which he accompanied with remarks implying that I had forfeited it by my course on the present occasion. If he means by stern fidelity a devoted attachment to duty and principle, which nothing can overcome, the character is, indeed, a high one, and, I trust, not entirely unmerited. I have, at least, the authority of the Senator himself for saying that it belonged to me before the present occasion, and it is, of course, incumbent on him to show that I have since forfeited it. He will find the task a Herculean one. It would be by far more easy to show the opposite; that, instead of forfeiting, I have strengthened my title to the character; instead of abandoning any principles, I have firmly adhered to them, and that, too, under the most appalling difficulties. If I were to select an instance in the whole course of my life on which, above all others, to rest my claim to the character which the Senator attributed to me, it would be this very one, which he has selected to prove that I have forfeited it. I acted with the full knowledge of the difficulties I had to encounter, and the responsibility I must incur. I saw a great and powerful party, probably the most powerful in the country, eagerly seizing on the catastrophe which had befallen the currency, and the consequent embarrassments that followed, to displace those in power, against whom they had been long contending. I saw that, to stand between them and their object, I must necessarily incur their deep and lasting displeasure. I also saw that, to maintain the Administration in the position they had taken, to separate the Government from the banks, I would draw down on me, with the exception of some of the Southern banks, the whole weight of that extensive, concentrated, and powerful interest—the most powerful by far of any in the whole community; and thus I would unite against me a combination of political and moneyed influence almost irresistible. Nor was this all. I could not but see that, however pure and disinterested my motives, and however consistent my course with all I had ever said or done, I would be exposed to the very charges and aspersions which I am now repelling. The ease with which they could be made, and the temptation to make them, I saw were too great to be resisted by the party morality of the day, as groundless as I have demonstrated them. But there was another consequence that I could not but foresee, far more painful to me than all others. I but too clearly saw that, in so sudden and complex a juncture, called on as I was to decide on my course instantly, as it were, on the field of battle, without consultation, or explaining my reasons, I would estrange for a time many of my political friends, who had passed through with me so many trials and difficulties, and for whom I feel a brother's love. But I saw before me the path of duty, and, though rugged, and hedged on all sides with these and many other difficulties, I did not hesitate a moment to take it. After I had made up my mind as to my course, in a conversation with a friend about the responsibility I would assume, he remarked that my own State might desert me. I replied that it was not impossible; but the result has proved that I under-estimated the intelligence and patriotism of my virtuous and noble State. I ask her pardon for the distrust implied in my answer; but I ask with assurance it will be granted, on the grounds I shall put it—that in being prepared to sacrifice her confidence, as dear to me as light and life, rather than disobey, on this great question, the dictates of my judgment and conscience, I proved myself worthy of being her representative.

But, if the Senator, in attributing to me stern fidelity, meant, not devotion to principle, but to party, and especially the party of which he is so prominent a member, my answer is, that I never belonged to his party, nor owed it any fidelity; and, of course, could forfeit, in reference to it, no character for fidelity. It is true, we acted in concert against what we believe to be the usurpations of the Executive; and it is true, that, during the time, I saw much to esteem in those with whom I acted, and contracted friendly relations with many which I shall not be the first to forget. It is also true that a common party designation was applied to the Opposition in the aggregate, not, however, with my approbation; but it is no less true that it was universally known that it consisted of two distinct parties, dissimilar in principle and policy, except in relation to the object for which they had united: the National Republican party, and the portion of the State Rights party which had separated from the Administration, on the ground that it had departed from the true principles of the original party. That I belonged exclusively to that detached portion, and to neither the Opposition nor Administration party, I prove by my explicit declaration, contained in one of the extracts read from my speech on the currency in 1834. That the party generally, and the State which I represent in part, stood aloof from both of the parties, may be established from the fact that they refused to mingle in the party and political contests of the day. My State withheld her electoral vote in two successive Presidential elections; and, rather than to bestow it on either the Senator from Kentucky, or the distinguished citizen whom he opposed, in the first of those elections, she threw her vote on a patriotic citizen of Virginia, since deceased, of her own politics, but who was not a candidate; and, in the last, she refused to give it to the worthy Senator from Tennessee near me, [Judge WHITE,] though his principles and views of policy approached so much nearer to hers than that of the party to which the Senator from Kentucky belongs. But, suppose the fact was otherwise, and that the two parties had blended so as to form one, and that I owed to the united party as much fidelity as I do to that to which I exclusively belonged; even on that supposition, no conception of party fidelity could have controlled my course on the present occasion. I am not among those who pay no regard to party obligations; on the contrary, I place fidelity to party among the political virtues, but I assign to it a limited sphere. I confine it to matters of detail and arrangement, and to minor questions of policy. Beyond that, on all questions involving principles, or measures calculated to affect materially the permanent interest of the country, I look only to God and country.

And here, Mr. President, I avail myself of the opportunity to declare my present political position, so that there may be no mistake hereafter. I belong to the old Republican State Rights party of '98. To that, and that alone, I owe fidelity, and by that I shall stand through every change, and in spite of every difficulty. Its creed is to be found in the Kentucky resolutions, and Virginia resolutions and report; and its policy is to confine the action of this Government within the narrowest limits compatible with the peace and security of these States, and the objects for which the Union was expressly formed. I, as one of that party, shall support all who support its principles and policy, and oppose all who oppose them. I have given, and shall continue to give, the Administration a hearty and sincere support on the great question now under discussion, because I regard it as in strict conformity to our creed and policy, and shall do every thing in my power to sustain them under the great responsibility which they have assumed. But let me tell those who are more interested in sustaining them than myself, that the danger which threatens them lies not here, but in another quarter. This measure will tend to uphold them, if they stand fast, and adhere to it with fidelity. But, if they wish to know where the danger is, let them look to the fiscal department of the Government. I said, years ago, that we were committing an error the reverse of the great and dangerous one that was committed in 1828, and to which we owe our present difficulties, and all we have since experienced. Then we raised the revenue greatly, when the expenditures were about to be reduced by the discharge of the public debt; and now we have doubled the disbursements, when the revenue is rapidly decreasing; an error, which, although probably not so fatal to the country, will prove, if immediate and vigorous measures be not adopted, far more so to those in power. The country will not, and ought not, to bear the creation of a new debt, beyond what may be temporarily necessary to meet the present embarrassment; and any attempt to increase the duties must, and ought, to prove fatal to those who may make it, so long as the expenditures may, by economy and accountability, be brought within the limits of the revenue.

But the Senator did not confine his attack to my conduct and motives in reference to the present question. In his eagerness to weaken the cause I support, by destroying confidence in me, he made an indiscriminate attack on my intellectual faculties, which he characterized as metaphysical, eccentric, too much of genius, and too little common sense, and of course wanting a sound and practical judgment.

Mr. President, according to my opinion, there is nothing of which those who are endowed with superior mental faculties ought to be more cautious than to reproach those with their deficiency to whom Providence has been less liberal. The faculties of our mind are the immediate gift of our Creator, for which we are no farther responsible than for their proper cultivation, according to our opportunities, and their proper application to control and regulate our actions. Thus thinking, I trust I shall be last to assume superiority on my part, or reproach any one with inferiority on his; but those who do not regard the rule, when applied to others, cannot expect it to be observed when applied to themselves. The critic must expect to be criticized, and he who points out the faults of others, to have his own pointed out.

I cannot retort on the Senator the charge of being metaphysical. I cannot accuse him of possessing the powers of analysis and generalization, those higher faculties of the mind (called metaphysical by those who do not possess them,) which decompose and resolve into their elements the complex masses of ideas that exist in the world of mind, as chemistry does the bodies that surround us in the material world; and without which those deep and hidden causes which are in constant action, and producing such mighty changes in the condition of society, would operate unseen and undetected. The absence of these higher qualities of the mind is conspicuous throughout the whole course of the Senator's public life. To this it may be traced that he prefers the specious to the solid, and the plausible to the true. To the same cause, combined with an ardent temperament, it is owing that we ever find him mounted on some popular and favorite measure which he whips along, cheered by the shouts of the multitude, and never dismounts till he has rode it down. Thus, at one time, we find him mounted on the protective system, which he rode down; at another, on internal improvement; and now he is mounted on a bank, which will surely share the same fate, unless those who are immediately interested shall stop him in his headlong career. It is the fault of his mind to seize on a few prominent and striking advantages, and to pursue them eagerly without looking to consequences. Thus, in the case of the protective system, he was struck with the advantages of manufactures; and, believing that high duties was the proper mode of protecting them, he pushed forward the system without seeing that he was enriching one portion of the country at the expense of the other; corrupting the one and alienating the other; and, finally, dividing the community into two great hostile interests, which terminated in the overthrow of the system itself. So, now, he looks only to a uniform currency, and a bank as the means of securing it, without once reflecting how far the banking system has progressed, and the difficulties that impede its farther progress; that banking and politics are running together to their mutual destruction; and that the only possible mode of saving his favorite system is to separate it from the Government.

To the defects of understanding, which the Senator attributes to me, I make no reply. It is for others, and not me, to determine the portion of understanding which it has pleased the Author of my being to bestow on me. It is, however, fortunate for me, that the standard by which I shall be judged is not the false, prejudiced, and, as I have shown, unfounded opinion which the Senator has expressed, but my acts. They furnish materials, neither few nor scant, to form a just estimate of my mental faculties. I have now been more than twenty-six years continuously in the service of this Government, in various stations, and have taken part in almost all the great questions which have agitated this country during this long and important period. Throughout the whole I have never followed events, but have taken my stand in advance, openly and freely avowing my opinions on all questions, and leaving it to time and experience to condemn or approve my course. Thus acting, I have often, and on great questions, separated from those with whom I usually acted, and if I am really so defective in sound and practical judgment as the Senator represents, the proof, if to be found any where, must be found in such instances, or where I have acted on my sole responsibility. Now, I ask, in which of the many instances of the kind is such proof to be found? It is not my intention to call to the recollection of the Senate all such; but that you, Senators, may judge for yourselves, it is due in justice to myself, that I should suggest a few of the most prominent, which at the time were regarded as the Senator now considers the present; and then, as now, because where duty is involved, I would not submit to party trammels.

I go back to the commencement of my public life, the war session, as it was usually called, of 1812, when I first took my seat in the other House, a young man, without experience to guide me, and I shall select, as the first instance, the Navy. At that time the Administration and the party to which I was strongly attached were decidedly opposed to this important arm of service. It was considered anti-republican to support it; but acting with my then distinguished colleague, Mr. Cheves, who led the way, I did not hesitate to give it my hearty support, regardless of party ties. Does this instance sustain the charge of the Senator?

The next I shall select is the restrictive system of that day, the embargo, the non-importation and non-intercourse acts. This, too, was a party measure, which had been long and warmly contested, and of course the lines of party well drawn. Young and inexperienced as I was, I saw its defects, and resolutely opposed it, almost alone of my party. The second or third speech I made, after I took my seat, was in open denunciation of the system; and I may refer to the grounds I then assumed, the truth of which have been confirmed by time and experience, with pride and confidence. This will scarcely be selected by the Senator to make good his charge.

I pass over other instances, and come to Mr. Dallas's bank of 1814-15. That, too, was a party measure. Banking was then comparatively but little understood, and it may seem astonishing, at this time, that such a project should ever have received any countenance or support. It proposed to create a bank of $50,000,000 to consist almost entirely of what was called then the war stocks; that is, the public debt created in carrying on the then war. It was provided that the bank should not pay specie during the war, and for three years after its termination, for carrying on which it was to lend the Government the funds. In plain language, the Government was to borrow back its own credit from the bank, and pay to the institution six per cent. for its use. I had scarcely ever before seriously thought of banks or banking, but I clearly saw through the operation, and the danger to the Government and country, and, regardless of party ties or denunciations, I opposed and defeated it in the manner I explained at the extra session. I then subjected myself to the very charge which the Senator now makes, but time has done me justice, as it will in the present instance.

Passing the intervening instances, I come down to my administration of the War Department, where I acted on my own judgment and responsibility. It is known to all, that the department, at the time was perfectly disorganized, with not much less than $50,000,000 of outstanding and unsettled accounts, and the greatest confusion in every branch of service. Though without experience, I prepared, shortly after I went in, the bill for its organization, and on its passage I drew up the body of rules for carrying the act into execution; both of which remain substantially unchanged to this day. After reducing the outstanding accounts to a few millions, and introducing order and accountability in every branch of service, and bringing down the expenditure of the army from four to two and a half millions annually, without subtracting a single comfort from either officer or soldier, I left the Department in a condition that might well be compared to the best in any country. If I am deficient in the qualities which the Senator attributes to me, here in this mass of details and business it ought to be discovered. Will he look to this to make good his charge?

From the War Department I was transferred to the Chair which you now occupy. How I acquitted myself in the discharge of its duties, I leave it to the body to decide, without adding a word. The station, from its leisure, gave me a good opportunity to study the genius of the prominent measure of the day, called then the American system, of which I profited. I soon perceived where its errors lay, and how it would operate. I clearly saw its desolating effects in one section, and corrupting influence in the other; and when I saw that it could not be arrested here, I fell back on my own State, and a blow was given to a system destined to destroy our institutions, if not overthrown, which brought it to the ground. This brings me down to the present times, and where passions and prejudices are yet too strong to make an appeal, with any prospect of a fair and impartial verdict. I then transfer this, and all my subsequent acts, including the present, to the tribunal of posterity, with a perfect confidence that nothing will be found, in what I have said or done, to impeach my integrity or understanding.

I have now, Senators, repelled the attacks on me. I have settled the account and cancelled the debt between me and my accuser. I have not sought this controversy, nor have I shunned it when forced on me. I have acted on the defensive, and if it is to continue, which rests with the Senator, I shall throughout continue so to act. I know too well the advantage of my position to surrender it. The Senator commenced the controversy, and it is but right that he should be responsible for the direction it shall hereafter take. Be his determination what it may, I stand prepared to meet him.

INDEPENDENT TREASURY BILL.

SPEECH OF MR. TIPTON, OF INDIANA.

In Senate, Friday, February 16, 1838.—The Senate having resumed the consideration of the bill imposing additional duties, as depositaries, on public officers, in certain cases, etc. the question being on Mr. RIVES's substitute for the bill—

Mr. TIPTON said nothing but the peculiar position which he was compelled to occupy before the country on the question now under debate here, could have induced him to obtrude himself on the notice of the Senate. This consideration (said Mr. T.) obliges me to claim your indulgence, while I briefly present the reasons which incline me to vote against the bill under consideration, and to prefer the proposition brought forward by the honorable Senator from Virginia, (Mr. RIVES.) In the remarks I am about to make, (said Mr. T.) I shall confine myself to the subject before the Senate, and shall not wander from it to discuss the politics of the country.

The Sub-Treasury bill, sir, provides for a separation of the Government, in is fiscal operations, from all banks; and, after a short period, prohibits the receipt of bank paper in payment of public dues, and enacts that all debts due the United States shall thenceforward be paid in hard money. Believing, as I do, that these measures, if adopted, will be injurious to the country, I cannot sanction them with my vote. Since their rejection at the extra session, I have carefully noted the expressions of public sentiment in different quarters of the country, and consider them as having been condemned by the people themselves, as well as by their representatives at the other end of the Capitol. In every State where there has been a legislative expression of opinion, that expression has, with one exception, been against them. The Sub-Treasury has friends of much respectability in the State represented here by my colleague and myself; but they are in the minority. The suspension of specie payment by the banks, and the assaults made on all banks and banking, have rendered these institutions unpopular; but the Sub-Treasury is more so.

While the late Bank of the United States existed, the Government managed its fiscal concerns through that institution with great facility, and without loss. No country ever had a better currency than that institution and the State banks of that day furnished us. Those who wanted hard money could easily procure it, and the exchanges were reasonable and safe. The paper of the United States Bank was at par every where, and convertible at the will of the holder into gold and silver, but preferred by most people to either. After the downfall of that bank, the Secretary of the Treasury, by an act of Congress of the 23d of June, 1836, was directed to select a suitable number of the banks chartered by the Legislatures of the States and Territories, and of the banks of the District of Columbia, as depositories of the public money. He was prohibited from depositing in any bank that did not pay specie for its notes, or that should, after the 4th day of July, 1836, issue or pay out notes or bills of a less denomination than five dollars. This last was an excellent provision. By excluding small bills, a large proportion of the precious metals would be infused into the circulation. When the banks suspended specie payment, all connection between them and the Government was dissolved, except that the Government retained the right to enforce the collection of the public money remaining in the vaults of the deposite banks. The suspension of specie payments by the banks embarrassed the pecuniary operations of the Government, produced a stagnation of business of every kind, and we hear the question asked every day, what is to be done to restore a sound currency? All eyes are anxiously looking this way to see what course the General Government will pursue. What are the people and the banks to expect from this quarter, provided the banks again begin and continue in good faith to redeem their paper with gold and silver? Will bank paper be received in payment of the public dues, or will the Government persist in demanding and enforcing the payment of gold and silver for public land in the West, and permit the receipt of bank paper in payment of public dues in the East, thereby discriminating between the currency used by the people on the east and west side of the Alleghany mountains, or will Congress endeavor to establish and maintain a uniform currency? On these points, so vastly important to the people, I conceive it very desirable that Congress should decide at an early day. The amendment of the honorable Senator from Virginia holds out strong inducements to the banks to resume specie payment, and I cannot doubt the ability of the banks to do so, provided confidence is restored. It is not so much a lack of means as of confidence, of knowledge respecting the intention and future action of the General Government, that prevents them from paying specie for their paper. If the General Government will, by law, make the paper of specie-paying banks receivable in payment of public dues, and if these institutions are but properly managed, their paper will furnish a sound currency. I am aware, sir, that gentlemen, high in the confidence of the country, whose opinions have great weight with the people, are in favor of a hard money currency. Entertaining different views, I will give my vote in favor of the State bank system. If adopted, it will restore confidence, and relieve the embarrassments under which the business of the country languishes. But if the amendment is rejected by the majority, then to that majority we shall look to give us a sound currency. It seems a battle is to be fought between the supporters of an exclusive metallic and those of a mixed currency; that is, hard money, and paper issued on a metallic basis, and convertible, at the will of the holder, into gold and silver. I contend that it is not practicable, at this age of the world, to introduce the former. I am for returning to that currency under which our country has prospered in times gone by. Should the supporters of the hard money system succeed in introducing it, to the exclusion of all paper, so great a diminution of the money in circulation will injuriously affect the business of our country. Instead of a currency of over $400,000,000, we shall have less than $80,000,000 of hard money as the measure of value of all our property. Should we drive bank paper from circulation, it will increase the demand for precious metals, and thus raise the standard value of gold and silver, and proportionably depress the value of property of every description. No civilized nation has, at any age of the world, been able to dispense with some measure of value. The gold bill of 1834, by raising the standard value of gold, forced into our country a larger portion of the precious metals than our share, in proportion to the quantity in the commercial world; it has made but a short stay with us; the payment of our foreign debt, and the natural course of trade, forced it out again; it is now in demand, and at a premium. We have heretofore gone on very well and prosperously with a mixed currency; but the West does not produce the precious metals. And if hard money be established as the currency, we must depend on the gold region of the South, or go beyond seas for it. If the Western people are compelled to raise hard money to pay their taxes, and for all the other purposes of life, they will be compelled to sacrifice their produce and manufactures in the Southern market for whatever the purchaser may see fit to give them in hard money. I put this question to honorable members: is it possible to establish and maintain, for any length of time, two currencies—one for the General, and one for the State Governments? Or, if you please, one for the General Government and one for the people?

Whatever currency is received in payment for the public lands in the West, and for public dues in the East, should be the standard currency to pay debts among the people, and taxes to the States.

I call on the advocates of the hard money system who have been for years ringing the sound of words, not of hard money, in our ears, to come forward and tell us where this hard money is, or whence it is to come, to supply the place of bank paper and credit, which they are striving to drive out of existence? Do gentlemen who cry out against all banks and credit really and seriously think of putting down all banks? I beg them to reflect what the consequences will be; what bank credit and enterprise have done for our country. Did not the great State of New York resort to her credit and banking to carry on her canals? She has demonstrated what a single State, by wise counsels, energy, and enterprise, could effect in the successful completion of a work that has never been excelled in any age of the world. She has connected the great lakes with the Atlantic by the North river, and divided the Northwestern trade with the British Empire. And are not the States of Ohio, Indiana, and Illinois, with other States West and South, at this time selling State stocks, which is nothing more nor less than borrowing money to carry on similar works on their own credit? South Carolina, Kentucky, and my native State, Tennessee, are vesting incorporated companies with banking privileges, to enable them to raise funds to carry on their gigantic railroad from Charleston to the Ohio river; and will those who represent those States here, injure the credit of those banks by refusing to receive their paper in payment of the public dues?

I esteem this enterprise as worthy of the age we live in, and sincerely hope it will redound to the honor of the master spirits engaged in it, and enrich the States through which it passes. I complain of no Senator for his course here; but when I see honorable members who share so large a portion of the nation's confidence waging an interminable war against all banks and credit in one breath, and in the next urging their own States to charter banking companies to carry on public improvements which are deemed of too great magnitude for individual enterprise, I confess that I cannot understand them. Should Congress determine that hereafter nothing but gold and silver shall be used as a currency by the General Government, you will drive bank paper out of circulation, increase the value of the precious metals five times their present value, diminish, in an almost incalculable ratio, the means of carrying on those works, and depress the price of property to the same extent. No one acquainted with political economy will deny that a diminution of the currency of a State will check improvements, and derange the business of society. This was the case in 1819, and will follow now, should we drive bank paper from circulation, and leave no other currency than the small amount of precious metals now in the country. A reduction so rapid and extensive cannot fail to produce general distress. By driving bank paper out of circulation, every interest in society will be seriously affected; property of every kind will decrease in value; the relation between debtor and creditor will be entirely changed, and the change will be ruin to the debtor. The amount of property necessary to discharge his debts, under this new state of things, will greatly exceed that which he received from his creditor. Enterprise of every kind will sustain a shock, and misery and distress pervade all classes of the community.

Property or labor which is now worth five dollars will not then command one dollar. Dare we vote eighty per cent. off the value of the property of our constituents? I cannot assume so fearful a responsibility. I know gentlemen will tell us they have no idea of injuring the banks; very far from it; they just wish to separate the Government from the banks in its fiscal operations; that the Government may go on and use hard money, and drafts drawn by Government officers, and that the banks can get along very well on their own resources. Sir, you may as well tell me that a good physician can draw the last drop of blood from the human system, and still continue life and animation, as that bank paper will circulate as a currency for all other purposes, when it is rejected by the Government in payment of public dues. If bank notes are refused in payment for public lands in the West, those who wish to buy lands will take the notes, draw the specie from the banks, and pay it into the land offices. It will pass into the United States Treasury, and thence into the pockets of the office-holders, to be sold out by them at a premium to the purchasers of the public lands. In commercial cities, where duty bonds are to be paid, hard money must be had to pay them, no matter what it may cost, and the cost falls on the consumer; for neither the importing merchant nor the Government will bear the loss. I have stated that, by increasing the demand for specie, you depress the price of property and labor; and, sir, by paying the office-holders their salaries in gold and silver, you increase them to double what they were, and the people bear the additional burden. The Shylock who has hoarded a few hard dollars, and owes no debts, will, under this new order of things, be enabled to purchase the best property in our cities, or the most valuable farms in the country, for one-tenth of their cost to the present owners; thereby doubling his thousands at the expense of the unfortunate debtor. All writers on political economy agree that the demand for currency is greater than the precious metals can supply, without depressing the price of all the products of human labor. We should not forget that production is regulated by demand, and that both are affected by the amount of currency, compared with the number of articles to be exchanged through its agency. It will readily be perceived that an increase of the currency of a State by the substitution of paper, even when convertible into coin, gives vigor to productive industry, and will increase the quantity of exchangeable commodities beyond what would otherwise have existed. Under these circumstances, the sudden rejection of paper currency, as proposed by the Sub-Treasury bill, cannot fail to derange all the business of the country, by diminishing the quantity of currency, whilst the articles to be exchanged through its agency will suffer no diminution.

The currency of this country has been greatly increased within the last ten years, by the employment of paper, founded, it is true, originally on a metallic basis. Within the last year this paper has ceased to be convertible into specie, and as in many instances no systematic effort was at first made to prevent excessive issues, paper soon became redundant, and, consequently, decreased in value. Notwithstanding the present depreciation, there can be no doubt that public works have been commenced by States, and that the prudent and industrious part of the community have been aided by the increase of the currency far beyond what would have taken place had we been confined to a hard money currency alone.

Efforts are now being made by the banks to resume specie papments. They are rapidly diminishing the amount of paper in circulation. It will be foreseen that the relative value of money will increase, and, of course, that all other articles must decrease. This increase in the value of money will be followed by a fall in the price of all articles that cannot be exported to places where money is more abundant. And, in the progress of these operations, the price of exportable articles will also be affected by the reduction of the currency, and the quantity of exchangeable articles will also be diminished. While currency is evidently increasing in value, the manufacturer will not hazard his capital in producing articles, the price of which is declining; manufactured goods of various kinds will have to be imported from abroad, at prices demanded there, where money is more plenty, and which, of course, cannot be afforded as cheap as if manufactured at home. The merchant dare not purchase his usual supply of fresh goods while exchanges are high, and the danger of being compelled to part with them at reduced prices is staring him in the face. Under these circumstances, all the money in the country will be required to pay debts already contracted. No one will embark in enterprises of any kind until this currency question is settled. To effect this desirable object, the joint action of the General and State Governments is requisite. The States are doing their part, by correcting the errors that have crept into the management of their banking institutions, and preparing to pay specie for their paper. If the General Government will honor the paper of the specie-paying banks of the States by receiving it in payment of public dues, confidence will be restored, and business revived. In currency, like all the business of life, no matter what we possess, the possession affords but little enjoyment without confidence.

I am opposed to any further experimenting on the currency, and wish to restore things to what they were a few years ago. The paper system, as gentlemen call it, is not new to us; it has existed, in some form, from the foundation of the Government. The value of property, of labor, of provisions, of every commodity in all the business of life, has relation to ths paper credit system, and how are we to get clear of it at this late day? Our roads, our canals, all our public works, are constructed on credit. Why should it create surprise if we sustain the credit system? We know that it is sometimes liable to abuse; but, hoping to profit by experience, and to correct the evils complained of, we cannot give it up. The Legislatures of many of the States are now in session; every mail brings us news of steps taken by them to investigate the condition of the banks, and guard against future abuses in their management. Our banks want but judicious kindness, or, I might say, the justice, of this Government extended to them, to enable them to do all that their friends can expect of them, to wit: furnish a sound currency.

Without bank credit it would have been impossible for the new States of the West to grow and increase in wealth, population, and business, as we know they have done between the years 1820 and 1832. Prior to 1820 the public lands were sold at a credit. In that year the cash system was adopted. Emigrants from the old States to the West were generally poor and destitute of means to pay for public land. While the Government sold its land on credit, the purchasers bought on credit; but when the system was changed to cash payment, they borrowed money from the banks, bought lands from the United States, improved them by their own industry, and when they raised a surplus of produce on their farms, they sold that surplus in the markets of the lower country, paid their bank debt, and became independent citizens of the country. Thousands now own land, who, had it not been for bank credit, probably never would have been able to purchase a permanent home for their families. Equally beneficial has bank credit been to the planters of the Southern States; their practice, I am told, is to draw on the banks in favor of their merchants at Natchez or New Orleans, payable in six months, and depending upon the return of their crops to pay their bank drafts. By these means they stock their plantations with hands, farming utensils, and provisions. This gives a spring to the planting interest, by which millions are realized. The Western States of Ohio, Kentucky, Indiana, and Illinois, want money of equal value every where. The farmers and graziers of these States vend their supplies in the lower country markets. It is important that they should receive money which will not decrease in value every step they take on their return to their homes. There they have to pay this money to the merchants who purchase their goods in the Eastern cities, and it is of the utmost importance that the money thus received in New Orleans should answer the purpose of the merchant to pay for his goods in New York.

In 1834-5, while our banks were in favor with the General Government, all went on harmoniously. The President, in his messages, and the Secretary of the Treasury, in his reports, were extolling these institutions to the skies for the ability and fidelity with which they transmitted and disbursed the public revenue, and regulated exchanges: the banks were prosperous, and our country flourished. The banks were encouraged by the Executive to grant commercial facilities; they did so, in some instances, imprudently, no doubt, but unfortunately they incurred the displeasure of this Government, and what followed? Why, sir, the Treasury order of the 11th of July, 1836! This order created alarm for the safety of the banks; the note holders lost confidence in them; a rush was made upon them for hard money to pay for lands; and they, in self-defence, closed their doors; and by no one should they be blamed for so doing. Should the banks open their vaults and pay specie for their notes in the present unsettled state of the public mind and of the business of the country, they might continue for a few days, perhaps weeks, when the last dollar would be drained from their coffers, and they be compelled to close their doors for ever. Embarrassments will occasionally happen in every country, from which it requires an effort of the people and wise legislation to extricate them. We were overtaken by similar embarrassments in our country soon after the last war, from which we were relieved by the joint efforts of the General and State Governments operating on the currency. It will not be denied that the Bank of the United States was on the very verge of ruin in 1819, in consequence of the commercial and fiscal embarrassments of that day. A committee of Congress investigated its concerns; and by the report made to the House of Representatives by Mr. Spencer, of New York, on the 24th day of February, 1820, both the people and their representatives were informed of the true condition of that institution. A reform in the management of the bank took place; the favor shown it by the General Government restored it to the confidence of the people; and from that period to the expiration of its charter, the paper of that institution and of the State banks, furnished us both a safe and convenient currency at par every where, from Boston to New Orleans, and convertible, at the will of the holder, into specie. Western people, who sold their produce in New Orleans, received in payment the paper of the Bank of the United States, which was at par in all the western States and the eastern cities. It is a return to such times and such a currency that I advocate. The United States Bank charter has expired. We must now depend on the small quantity of precious metal that, in the course of trade with other nations, would fall to our share, (and that is about $75,000,000,) or upon the paper issued by the State institutions, or both, to supply the place of the United States Bank paper. If our banks are properly conducted and favored by the General Government, their paper will supply the people of each State with a sound and convenient currency; but if the Executive and Congress set their faces against the State institutions, they will destroy them.

If the Sub-Treasury bill should become a law, you will first lock up $40,000,000 of this public revenue from circulation: secondly, by the rejection of bank paper, you will force an unnatural collection of the whole amount of the revenue in hard money. It goes into your Sub-Treasury, and cannot be used as currency by the people until it passes to them through the hands of the public officers. By thus withdrawing from circulation the revenue of the United States, amounting to forty-eight millions, you will so diminish the quantity of currency as to depress the price of property and labor to less than one-fifth its present value.

The revenue of the United States, amounting to forty-eight millions of dollars, has heretofore been kept and disbursed through the agency of the banks, and formed no inconsiderable part of the currency. The question now to be determined is, by whose agency shall these operations be conducted hereafter? The Senator from New York (Mr. WRIGHT) is for the Sub-Treasury; the honorable member from Virginia (Mr. RIVES) is for the State bank system. I have the most profound respect for the judgment and sagacity of the gentleman from Virginia, but I cannot place the same unbounded confidence in the ability of the State banks to regulate exchanges, both foreign and domestic, that he does. Of the integrity and ability of a majority of them to redeem their paper I have no doubt; but it is contrary to the nature of things to suppose that twenty or thirty State institutions, each independent of the other, acting under different boards of directors, consulting the interests of different stockholders and different sections of the country, each possessing principles, in some measure, antagonistical to the others, can, with the same facility, transmit and disburse the public revenue as we have seen was done by the late Bank of the United States. Should one of our planters or farmers, on making sale of their produce at New Orleans for hard money, place it in deposite in the State Bank of Louisiana, (for instance,) and be compelled to purchase a draft on Charleston or New York, he would have to pay a premium. The Bank of Louisiana would be able to draw a draft on any place within the limits of that State, but it is contrary to the nature of things to suppose it would have funds or credit, on which it could draw, at Charleston, Louisville, or Boston, without charging higher rates of exchange than the Western people formerly paid when the Bank of the United States existed. The Senator from Virginia thinks there was no failure in the State banks to answer all the purposes of depositories.

When the question of regulating the deposites the public money with the State banks, and of distributing the surplus revenue among the States, was before the Senate at the first session of the 24th Congress, I opposed the provision for regulating the deposites in the State banks. These propositions, however, were connected, and we had to take that part of the bill regulating the deposites with the State banks, to get the distribution part through the Senate. After many fruitless attempts, by the friends of distribution, to separate these propositions, I voted, under duress, for the bill as it became a law. We now have to determine between the State banks and the Sub-Treasury, as depositories of the public money. The former is preferred for two reasons: 1st. The banks are organized under authority from the States; the people have vested a portion of their capital in these institutions; they depend on their paper to supply them a sound currency; the legislation of Congress has much influence on the credit of these institutions, especially in the Western States, where the General Government is the great land-holder. The Western people, to use their own language, want land office money; money that is not receivable in the land offices is always from five to ten per cent. below par. 2d. The Sub-Treasury is new and untried, and it contemplates the rejection of bank paper in payment for public dues. Should this be adopted, it will diminish the currency, destroy all confidence in banks and credit, cripple agriculture and commerce, and every other interest in society in the Western States.

The Western people are the carriers between the North and the South; they sell their produce in the South, and buy goods in the Northeast; it is evidently their interest that exchanges should be moderate, and money of equal value at both these points. We should not think it strange to find that the large States in the East feel but little interest in reducing the rate of exchanges. New York has her safety fund banking system; Pennsylvania her United States Bank; Virginia, too, has her banks. All these States have large commercial cities, with seaports and harbors, into which foreign goods are imported, and from which they ship their produce or manufactured articles to foreign countries. All their business can be transacted within their own limits, and with the paper of their own banks. But how stands the case with the Western merchant? He has no port of entry, into which foreign goods are imported. If compelled to make his payments in hard money, the transportation to the Eastern cities will be at least 5 per cent.; should he offer paper of our most solvent Western banks, he must go to a broker and have them shaved from 8 to 12 per cent. to procure New York currency. If the Western members of Congress propose a measure that will cheapen the rate of exchanges, they have to contend against Eastern wealth and influence, and to combat the powerful delegations in Congress from all the Eastern States of the Union. I do not contend that the proposition of the Senator from Virginia is the best that could be offered, but we must take it as preferable to the Sub-Treasury bill. One is to sustain and the other to destroy the State institutions.

The Senator from Connecticut (Mr. SMITH) asked, what right have the State banks to demand support from this Government? Are they, said he, under the control of the General Government? True, sir, these institutions are not under the immediate control of the General Government; they are the property of the people of the different States. We here represent the States, and I have always understood it to be the Democratic doctrine that the representative was amenable to the constituent for his conduct. The General Government is clothed by the Constitution with power to make war, to conclude treaties, to levy and collect taxes. This Government collects and disburses the revenue of the nation, and is answerable to the people and the States, and will be by them holden to strict accountability for the manner in which these high trusts are discharged.

The Senator from South Carolina, (Mr. CALHOUN,) to alarm our fears, said this combination of banks, with Mr. Biddle's bank at their head, will be a mighty engine of power, and will rule the country. I ask him to answer this question: Will these twenty-five or thirty local banks, to be selected by the Secretary of the Treasury, with the approbation of Congress, and to be discontinued at the pleasure of Congress, be a more dangerous engine of power than the late Bank of the United States or the State banks were? The Bank of the United States was put down by the consent of the people, and the deposite banks are prostrate at the feet of the General Government as the State banks were in 1814, when life and vigor was restored to the State institutions by the General Government.

The honorable member told us that confidence could not pay seventy-five millions of debt. From the course of his reasoning I understood him to contend that banks have no substantial capital on which their issues are based. Does he not know that banks, established under charters from the States, must have a capital consisting of gold and silver actually paid into their vaults before they can issue a dollar of paper to circulate as money? No bank notes are put in circulation but upon notes of individuals, drawn and endorsed by men known to the bank directors to be both solvent and trustworthy. Will the Senator contend that a single Treasury officer is a safer depositary for the public treasure than a banking company, composed of a president and directors, who are interested in sustaining the solvency and credit of the institution under their charge? Or is he satisfied that the public money, in deposite with the Bank of Indiana, would be safer were it deposited with a half dozen receivers of public moneys in the land offices of that State? The Bank of Indiana had a capital of two millions of dollars in specie. At the time of the suspension of specie payment its issues were about two and a half to one; since the suspension it has reduced its liabilities over eight hundred thousand dollars. At the time of suspending specie payment it had near a million of public money in its vaults. Notwithstanding the suspension, that bank continues to pay all the drafts drawn on it by the Secretary of the Treasury, either in hard money or in other par funds acceptable to the holders of the Treasury draft. It has reduced its deposites to about four hundred thousand dollars; and this sum, I assure you, will be promptly paid when called for. The public deposites have rather injured than benefited that institution. I am not an advocate for continuing the public deposites in that bank, but I will not consent to see the United States refuse its paper in payment for public dues.

The State Bank of Indiana can and will resume specie payment as soon as any other western bank will resume. I have before me a report of the condition of that bank on the 20th of last month, by which it is shown that on that day its bills and notes discounted amounted to $3,536,441 20; gold and silver in bank $1,223,911 69; circulation $2,322,200; excess of circulation over gold and silver is $1,099 288 31. The State owns half the capital of the bank, and is bound for the redemption of its paper. The property of the directors is also bound. You will perceive that the State, the private fortunes of the directors, and the capital of the bank, as well as the security for individual notes and bills discounted, are are all bound for payment of the public money deposited in that bank. Will gentlemen contend that a Sub-Treasury officer is a safer depositary for the public treasure than a bank thus constructed? I think not. They will tell us that banks will speculate on the public money. I tell them that Treasury officers are quite as liable to these temptations as those who have the management of our State banks. By the bill under consideration it is made the duty of the Secretary of the Treasury to cause the books and money in possession of your Sub-Treasury officers, to be examined once in each year. This will require the appointment of swarms of agents of the Treasury, to travel into every quarter of the country, and they must be paid from the Treasury for their services. It is plainly to be seen that the bill, should it become a law, provides for quartering on the Treasury swarms of officers and agents of the General Government, which, if not quite so numerous as the locusts were in Egypt, we have reason to fear will prove as sore a scourge to us as the locusts were to the Egyptians.

The Senator from South Carolina (Mr. CALHOUN,) contends that banks will issue on the public deposites to advance the interests of the stockholders, and contract their issues to facilitate speculations. This was the case with the Bank of the United States, as shown by the report which I alluded to some time ago, and it may again happen if not prevented by those whose duty and interest required them to preserve the credit of these institutions. I have a cure, sir, for all these evils, by keeping the State banks to a constant and rigid accountability by weekly settlements, making it the duty of the deposite banks to settle their accounts at the close of each week, allowing them to collect the balances due from debtor banks in specie, and compelling them to place the balance due to the Government to its credit as so much specie on special deposite. If this course is adopted, it will effectually prevent banks from issuing on the public deposites.

The directors of the banks are generally men of the first standing in society, who have both reputation and private fortune at stake, and if brought up to rigid accountability, will not touch your public moneys, unless it be to receive them on special deposite, and charge for the risk and safe-keeping, and to pay them over when called for.

The Senator from South Carolina pronounced the proposition of the member from Virginia to be unconstitutional, and had passages read from the Constitution of the United States to sustain his position. I will not detain the Senate to give another version of that instrument: let every one read and understand that instrument for himself. I am at a loss for words to express my astonishment when I heard this declaration boldly made on the floor of the Senate, by the champion of the United States Bank, and of the paper system of 1816. What was constitutional, expedient, and proper with him then, is unconstitutional now. He must surely have been right at one time. How is this to be reconciled? I leave the honorable member to explain this position, among others. In 1816, the people confided in his judgment, and were not disappointed. But, sir, he is asking too much if he expects the people to follow and confide in him upon every occasion when he may see fit to change his political course. I hope he will not take it unkind in me if I tell him, that he, like the banker makes too heavy drafts on his capital; we cannot longer honor them; we are constrained to withdraw that confidence we reposed in him in times gone by. He is, on this question, on the side of the Administration, and I take the other side, believing that sound policy and the interest of the State I serve require me do so.

With regard to the banks of the District of Columbia I need say but a word. Other Senators are better acquainted with them than I pretend to be, and will in due time inform us. I have been favored with a statement of the condition of one of these institutions, which is to be satisfactory. Although it does not appear to be doing a very extensive and profitable business for the stockholders, it has given the best proof that it was equal to the emergency. This institution, I learn, was ready and willing to pay specie for its paper last June, within one month after the suspension, but it was thought best to wait, and see what other banks would do. It resumed on the 1st of September, and continues to pay specie for its notes. The officers of this bank are entitled to the thanks of this community, and the Bank of Washington deserves a renewal its charter. Those who have conducted it through the late storms have given proof of what prudent and honest men can do, whose object is rather to be useful to a whole community than to act on the selfish principle of monopolizing wealth to stockholders, at the expense of the community. They seem to have been governed more by principle than by interest.

I cannot support the Sub-Treasury bill without its friends will make some important alterations; and the first alteration that I desire, if the bill is to become the law of the land, is a provision to receive the paper of specie paying banks in payment of public dues.

I am aware that by separating from a majority of the political party with which I have acted, and intend to act, where I can, separating from them only where I must, I subject myself to misapprehension, and, of course, to be misrepresented by those who do not understand me. I am not alone. Others, who share a much larger portion of the people's confidence than has fallen to me, think and will act as I do. The small band of Conservatives, often referred to in this debate, have taken the ground pointed out by an approving conscience, trusting to the approbation of our constituents, which we value much higher than party.

While on the subject, I hope the Senate will bear with me while I say a word in relation to myself. I do not owe my place here to party or party organization; before I was appointed to a seat on this floor, I made known to those who held the appointing power, in terms that could not be misunderstood, and will not now be controverted, that my views on banks and the currency were essentially different from those of the Chief Magistrate of that day. In separating from the late or present Administration on the currency question, I claim exemption from party trammels.

I trust I have said enough to show that the system of State bank deposites is preferable to the bill reported by the committee; and having very briefly touched on some of the topics before the Senate, I will close my remarks.

REMARKS OF MR. RUSSELL, OF NEW YORK,

In the House of Representatives, January 9, 1838 — On the question ordering the bill for the relief of the heirs of Robert Fulton to a third reading.

Mr. RUSSELL said, having been a member of the Committee of Claims, which had reported this bill to the House, and not having been able to concur with that committee in that report, he felt himself called on to give to the House the reasons for his dissent. This bill proposes to give to the heirs of Robert Fulton the sum of one hundred thousand dollars, for services alleged to have been rendered by Mr. Fulton to the United States, and for the detention of his steamboat Vesuvius at New Orleans, from the 30th December, 1814, to the 12th of March, 1815, both days inclusive. The amount of this claim, the peculiar basis upon which it rests, the time and circumstances accompanying its presentation, and the factitious aid which had been infused into the examination of it, rendered a calm and dispassionate examination peculiarly desirable: and, sir, (said Mr. R.) while I assure you that I enter upon it with no unkind feelings towards the individual whose personal merits are so intimately mingled with the discussion of the bill that they can hardly be separated, yet, sir, in the discharge of the duties confided to me, I shall examine it with freedom, and with an anxious desire to arrive at a just and equitable result; and while, on the one hand, I shall indulge no time-serving sympathies inconsistent with the public interest, on the other hand, my purpose will be to secure a liberal adjustment of the claim in question. This bill, sir, presents to the ordinary observer but an index to the claim which lies beyond it: the labyrinth in which it is enveloped must be carefully traversed in its various windings, and the deceptive guise which time or accident may have thrown around it drawn aside, that in sober reality we may examine its merits. In canvassing this claim, my colleagues on the committe, or such of them as concurred in this report, will claim for themselves (as the chairman has already done) the right of presenting the reasons which have induced them to view this demand in a more favorable light than the minorty thought themselves authorized to do; and they will not fail, I am sure, sir, to extend to the minority that courtesy which they claim for themselves. The time has been when this claim was not involved in that obscurity which now surrounds it. Contemporaneous circumstances and evidence which would have presented the claim in its true character may well be presumed now to be lost by time or accident, or those from whom a more perfect relation may have been obtained have descended to the tomb. Sir, allow the principle to prevail, that lapse of time strengthens the demand, originally of doubtful merit, and I ask, you, sir, what period will you fix for the consummation of that right which in its origin was worthless?

That you may be enabled to judge, sir, how far this claim falls within the latter description, I will present to you briefly the facts disclosed. We are informed by the Secretary of the Navy, in his report, under date of the 3d of January, 1837, that in 1810 the sum of $5,000 was advanced by the Government to Mr. Fulton. In that same report he also informs us, that in the year 1814 the Government advanced to Mr. Fulton another sum of $40,000; and as to this item, it will be found that the amount was furnished under a written contract, bearing date on the 27th day of December, 1814, between the then Secretary of War and Mr. Fulton; that, to enable Mr. Fulton to bring into operation the steamboat Vesuvius and others specified in the contract, this sum of $40,000 was advanced. In this contract it is stipulated "that during the present war with Great Britain and these United States, and until said $40,000 shall be repaid or satisfied to the United States, by the passage of troops or freight in said steamboats, or in the money circulating medium of the United States, all officers and troops finding their own provisions and bedding shall be transported in the steamboats from Louisville to New Orleans, down the stream, for ten dollars each, and from New Orleans to Louisville, up the stream, for twenty dollars each; in all cases of shorter distance, each person shall be transported for one cent a mile down the stream, and two cents a mile up the stream. Ordnance and military stores, and munitions of war belonging to the United States, which can be conveyed in steamboats, (and of which the captain shall be the judge,) shall be transported down the stream from Louisville to New Orleans for one dollar per ton for one hundred miles, or up the stream at the rate of three dollars per ton for each hundred miles."

In this contract there is a further provision that "if within five years from this date, (27th December, 1814,) the said sum of forty thousand dollars shall not have been earned, and compensated to the Government of the United States, by the transportation of troops and transport of munitions of war as aforesaid, the whole or any deficiency of said forty thousand dollars not satisfied, as aforesaid, shall be paid by the said Robert Fulton and the stockholders in said boats to the Government of the United States." Thus, Mr. Speaker, you have presented the items composing the demand of the Government against Mr. Fulton, which, in the language of the Secretary of the Navy, are "specific and certain," presenting an aggregate of $45,000. It should be borne in mind that the appropriate duties of the Committee of Claims are specific, limited, and well defined, and, in the language of legislation, comprise only such claims of a pecuniary nature as ordinarily arise between the Government and its citizens, arising upon contract, either express or implied, and such only as may be reduced in practice to reasonable certainty. In proportion to this duty imposed is the responsibility increased; and if they are permitted to transcend the one, they assume a responsibility which should not be cast upon them, and which appropriately belongs to the other standing committees of this House. And, sir, it is the scrupulous observance of this discrimination of the appropriate duties and responsibilities of the respective standing committees of this House which has induced this whole land, from Maine to Florida, to become vocal with praise to the distinguished chairman of that committee; and I submit whether it is for the interest of the people of the United States to allow an assumption of power not delegated by law or well-regulated custom to any functionary of this Government or any department thereof. Would you allow the Committee for the District of Columbia to exercise a supervisory control, or to take cognizance of the military operations of your Government, or to grant pensions or annuities, or erect monuments to the memory of departed worth? Are there not appropriate standing committees for these purposes? If there are not, raise a select committee for the specific purpose, and then this House and this nation will hold such committee responsible for the recommendations which it shall make. So far as the items brought to your notice, and the claims of Mr. Fulton against the Government for services rendered and moneys expended, which properly form the subject of reciprocal credit, are concerned, they were properly referrible to the Committee of Claims; and beyond that I submit whether they should have taken cognizance. If, sir, as has been stated by the gentleman from Ohio, (Mr. WHITTLESEY,) "the thing to be paid for was not bodily exertion or mere mechanical superintendence, that it was talent, that it was invention, that it was ingenuity," for which compensation is asked—be it so, sir, for the purpose of this discussion—are these proper items of account to be submitted to the Committee of Claims? Can you, sir, by any known rule of compensation practised by that committee, arrive at any certain result, taking these particulars for the basis of your calculations? The mere statement of them shows that the appropriate reference of this part of the claim was to a select committee. But, sir, Mr. Fulton stands indebted prima facie to the Government of the United States in the sum of $45,000; and how is that pretended by the advocates of this bill to have been discharged? Why, it is said, "he has rendered important services to the country, and to the world of mankind." Sir, though I cannot yield to him the entire merit claimed, it is not my purpose to withhold a more than ordinary meed of approbation. That he had talents and mechanical powers, and a mind well adapted to the investigation of scientific pursuits, which elevated him above many of his contemporaries, and that he possessed industry and enterprise entitling him to high praise, most, if not all, will admit; and that these considerations should invoke a liberal examination of his claims will, no doubt, be conceded. But, sir, there is a point in legislation beyond which liberality cannot be indulged without encountering an epithet which few would be emulous to acquire. Others whose interests have been confided to the safe-keeping of this Government are involved in this matter; and before an appropriation of this large amount should be made, it will become those who are entering upon it to examine the basis upon which it can be founded, and discriminate clearly between paying a debt and making a donation. So far, then, sir, as matters of account are concerned, allow me for a moment to consider it. Under the contract of the 27th of December, 1814, the Vesuvius was to be used as a transport for certain troops and munitions of war, at and about New Orleans, at a fixed rate of compensation; and the rule which has been generally, if not universally, applied by the Committee of Claims, and with the approbation of Congress, has been, that when boats or other property have been taken into the service of the Government, under a contract with the owner for a stipulated compensation, such boat or other property has been at the risk of the owner. Can any one doubt the propriety of this as a general rule? And is there any well-founded reason for allowing this case to form an exception to that general regulation? Such regulations, upon which the rights of citizens are made to depend, to be just should be general, and all made to conform to them. Now, sir, apply that principle to this case, and it is thought no remuneration can be allowed. Upon this principle, if the boat, on her passage from New Orleans to Louisville, had been captured and destroyed by the enemy, or she had foundered from the perils of the voyage, or stranded upon the rocks, her loss must have been sustained by the owner, and the Government, according to the established rule of legislation by this Government, would have been under no obligation to make reparation. And, if the article of agreement is at all to be regarded, does not this case fall clearly within that rule? But, sir, suppose it does not, and you subject the Government to all that can reasonably be claimed for the use and damages of this boat. It is stated that she was pressed into the service of the Government by General Jackson, on the 30th of December, 1814, at New Orleans, (though this is denied by him, as appears by his letter to the committee,) and on the night of that day she grounded on the batture at the upper part of the city, where she remained until the 12th of March, 1815. At this time G. Knights was the quartermaster general at New Orleans, where the following account was presented to him for payment:

1. For transporting on board the Vesuvius, in the spring of 1815, a part of the Kentucky troops from New Orleans to Natchez - - $2,025 00
2. For mattresses and pillows taken from the boat for the use of the sick - - - - 390 00

3. For transporting troops and articles from Natchez to New Orleans -	146 12
4. For two days' use of boat under orders of Dec. 19, 1814, at $250 per day - - - -	500 00
5. For 85 days she was aground, being from the night of the 30th December, 1814, to the 12th March, 1815	21,250 00

The second item of $390 appears to have been paid to F. B. Ogden, attorney, 4th of October, 1825.

I will not, Mr. Speaker, undertake to say how far there is a want of evidence to sustain many of these items; but suppose they have all been proved, is it not reasonable to believe that at that time, when every thing was fresh in the memory, and the rights and obligations of the respective parties well known and understood, the account thus rendered corresponded with the then known rights of the party presenting it, and embraced every thing which could properly be included growing out of the use, seizure, and detention of this boat. If it is so, let us state the account and see to what practical result we shall arrive:

In 1810, Mr. Fulton received - -	$5,000
In 1814, on the contract - -	40,000
Total - -	$45,000
Cr. as per account furnished,	$21,250
Deduct for amount paid F. B. Ogden - - -	390
Balance - -	$20,860

Deduct this balance of $20,860 from the sum of $45,000, and it will leave a balance again Fulton, of $24,140.

And, sir, suppose you add to this credit the amount reported by his friend in 1829, to which I shall hereafter call your attention, the sum of $5,000 as a compensation for his services, "which can be measured by no certain rule," and even extend to him a still greater liberality, and add the interest as advised, which, at the rate of 7 per cent. will give $8,000 or $10,000 more: and then deduct these two last items of $5,000, and the interest thereon, say $8,000 or $10,000 more—say $10,000 for the sake of precision—making a total of $15,000, and deduct this sum from the sum of $24,140, and there yet remains a balance against him of $9,140, due to the Government. And how is this balance to be overcome? Why, sir, it is urged by the advocates of this bill, that Mr. Fulton rendered important services to the Government in 1814 in superintending the building of a steam frigate in the New York harbor, and about the year 1810 in making experiments for coast and harbor defence by means of "torpedoes." Many will, no doubt, call to mind by-gone events connected with this subject, and would hardly be induced to believe that this "torpedo system" should now be called up "to plague the inventor." Sir, if my memory serves me correctly, the Committee on Naval Affairs, who were appointed to examine into these "torpedo" experiments, did not think so highly of them as to recommend the system as a means of national defence. But, sir, I will not scrutinize too closely this item: if any service has been rendered for which an equivalent has not been given, a more appropriate occasion than the present will probably never arise for liquidating the demand. But, sir, the services of Mr. Fulton, in constructing this sub-marine mode of warfare, must have been taken into the account by the committee who made the report in 1829, to which I have referred, and, probably with that of building the steam frigate, tended in no small degree to produce the result to which that committee arrived, as it relates to superintending the buiding of the steam frigate. It is understood, sir, (but with how much confidence it may be relied on I am not prepared to say,) that there is yet remaining in the archives of the Government, evidence going to show that when this work was in progress, it was understood and agreed that Mr. Fulton was not to receive any compensation for the labor bestowed in superintending the building this frigate; and this idea is confirmed by reference to a report heretofore made on this claim by the honorable Stephen Van Rensselaer, whose liberality and sense of justice none will deny, and who was the chairman of a select committee heretofore raised in this House for the purpose of considering this claim, in which report it is stated, in reference to this service, "that Mr. Fulton never asked or expected any compensation." But if this House should be of the opinion that this disclaimer and argument should not be regarded, but that a reasonable compensation should be made, then the question arises—what should that compensation be? This subject, too, was before the committee of which Mr. Van Rensselaer was chairman, and was, no doubt, regarded by them in making this report, and coming to the liberal conclusion to which that committee arrived. But, Mr. Speaker, after making all these deductions, it will be found that there is yet a balance in favor of the United States, of $9,140. If the view I have taken be a correct one, can there by the remotest doubt, sir, if these respective demands had been liquidated and settled before the trial of the cause in 1826, and the representatives of Mr. Fulton discharged from their liability to the Government, that all would have considered it an act of great liberality on the part of the Government to these representatives? But, sir, this was not done; but a suit was instituted for the recovery of the debt; and the sequel is to be found in the history of these proceedings.

This suit was brought about the year 1825, in the southern district of the State of New York, and tried in February, 1826, when a verdict was returned for the defendants; in reference to which the Secretary of the Navy, in his report made to Congress on the 3d of January, 1837, says: "I have endeavored to discover what composed the items of set-off to the claims of the United States; but very little information in this case can be obtained, in addition to the documents and papers referred. William M. Price and John Anthon were counsel for the defendants; but from the lapse of time, they have no distinct recollection of the defence. Mr. Price, in his letter of the 5th of November last, says that his best impression is that the set-off of the defendants consisted of some $2,000 for the transportation of the munitions of war, and about $70,000, as a loss sustained by Mr. Fulton, by the seizure by the Government of this steamboat Vesuvius." Well, indeed, Mr. Speaker, may the Secretary of the Navy have said that the claims on the part of the estate of Mr. Fulton against the United States were "vague and uncertain in their support; estimates believed from all the circumstances in the case to be just and equitable must be substituted for fact, proved by legal evidence."

Is it not evident, sir, that every searcher after truth (and I doubt not that all on this floor are of that description) the more he investigates this claim, the stronger will his convictions be that the most of it is entirely inadmissible? But, sir, suppose, in the exercise of an abundant liberality, you allow to the claimants the amount referred to, claimed as having been established "by substituting the vague and uncertain conclusions for facts proved," as the Secretary of the Navy has indicated he was obliged to do, and consider the $70,000 vaguely referred to (for it cannot be said to be established by evidence) as constituting the bases of the set-off; then, sir, deduct from this sum the $45,000, to which amount Mr. Fulton appears, from the books of the Treasury, to be indebted to the Government, and you leave a balance due the applicants of $25,000, to which sum Mr. R. said he should propose to reduce the the amount before he resumed his seat.

If I am correct in the view I have already taken of this case, Mr. Speaker, it must be evident to all that the great proportion of this $100,000 is to be given upon other and distinct considerations than that of claim, or upon the principle of accounting, in the legislative sense of that expression.

In the language of his friend from Ohio, (Mr. WHITTLESEY,) said Mr. R. it was for talent, for invention, and for ingenuity, all of which, it is alleged, have been applied in advancing the common interest, and ameliorating the condition of mankind, by the application, if not the invention, of steam power to boat navigation. If this were so, sir, do you find that principle incorporated into this bill? But, sir, the most sanguine advocate of the claim does not pretend that Mr. Fulton was the original inventor of steamboats, or the first to apply the power of steam to practical use in boat navigation. If it could have been shown that Mr. Fulton had been the first to discover this steam power, and practically to apply it, a far different question than that which now exists would have been presented for consideration. In such an event, the pleasing eulogium which has been pronounced of Mr. Fulton, by the advocates of this bill, would have drawn forth no remonstrance from me. But, sir, when it is sought to elevate his merits at the expense of another's fame, all who are disposed to render equal justice to conflicting claimants for distinction, seek to check, by the interposition of truth, that intolerant zeal which so often outruns discretion, in urging the claims of an individual favorite. Long before Mr. Fulton's attention was turned to this subject, this power was well known, and its practical benefits tested by experience. Under the old confederation, and as early as the years 1786–7,–8, some of the States in this Union had, by legislative enactments, granted exclusive privilege for navigating the waters of the respective States with boats, &c. impelled by the power of steam, which, in some instances as early as 1787, were in successful operation, and navigated at the rate of eight miles an hour. And, sir, it is a fact well authenticated, that between the years 1786 and 1790, the steam engine for propelling boats up and down the Delaware was in operation, and the novelty of the scene drew forth the warmest congratulations from the admiring audience. In those exhibitions of mechanical genius, enterprise, and skill of his countrymen, Mr. Fulton did not participate: he was then in a foreign country, pursuing a more lucrative and favorite object. How far he may be entitled to the appellation of a public benefactor, is a question which, at present, I have no inclination to discuss; but, sir, if you were to propound that question to those who are familiar with the history of legislative and judicial proceedings in the State of New York for the last half century, you might, perhaps, receive an appropriate response.

Mr. Speaker, if this claim was so peculiarly meritorious, and this family so entirely destitute as has been represented, is it not somewhat remarkable that it should have remained dormant from the spring of 1815 until the year 1829, without having been claimed or urged upon the consideration of the Government? And I now submit whether it is probable that this claim would ever have been heard of, if a suit had not been brought by the Government to have recovered from his representatives the amount due to the United States from Mr. Fulton. And, sir, if this "torpedo experiment," of which we have heard so much, had been so immensely valuable, do you believe it would have been rejected as worthless? And, sir, if it be true that the five thousand dollars advanced in 1810 had been expended by Mr. Fulton for the Government, and he entitled to receive four thousand dollars more for disbursing it, is it not strange that the account should have remained open upon the books of the Treasury, and Mr. Fulton held up as a public defaulter, when, in truth, and in fact, the Government were indebted to him? I must confess, sir, that I am credulous enough to believe that there is no consideration of public policy or private duty that demands my approbation of this bill. I therefore, in pursuance of the suggestions I have made, move that the amount be reduced from one hundred to twenty-five thousand dollars.

HEIRS OF ROBERT FULTON.

REMARKS OF MR. McCLELLAN, OF NEW YORK,

In the House of Representatives, March 9, 1838—The motion to reconsider the bill for the relief of the heirs of Robert Fulton being under consideration,

Mr. McCLELLAN addressed the House as follows:

MR. SPEAKER: It was my original intention to take no part in the discussion of this bill. When it was under examination upon a former occasion, I contented myself in listening to the eloquence which was poured forth from different parts of this Hall, and in giving a silent vote in favor of the bill, as reported by the chairman of the Committee of Claims, [Mr. WHITTLESEY.]

I rise, Mr. Speaker, to resist the motion to reconsider, made by the honorable member from South Carolina, [Mr. THOMPSON,] and to notice the remarks which have fallen from my honorable colleague, [Mr. RUSSELL,] which I heard with surprise, and, as an American citizen, with deep mortification. That honorable member, in exhibiting his opposition to this bill, has made an attempt to tear the well-earned laurels from the brow of a distinguished and deceased public benefactor. He has denied to the late Mr. Fulton the credit of being the inventor of the successful and practical application of steam power to boat navigation. If this allegation be true, the honorable member will succeed, not only in defeating the award of the national justice proposed by the passage of this bill, but he will take from his orphan children the legacy of his achievements.

When Mr. Fulton first demonstrated the practicability of applying steam power to boat navigation; and when, in 1807, he launched his first boat at New York, which moved up the waters of the Hudson to the admiration of the inhabitants on its banks; when his experiment had proved successful, and the benefit his invention would confer upon the country was evident to all, I am aware, sir, that envy and avarice were operating to rob him of his well-earned reputation. I had supposed that those times were past, and that a great and happy people—made so, in a measure, by the efforts of his genius—would be willing to accord to his memory the meed of praise; and that no honorable member on this floor would tear from orphanage the legacy bequeathed by such a father.

All that was claimed by Mr. Fulton, was the successful application of steam power to boat navigation. The expansive power of steam was known, and steam engines were invented before his time. Ingenious mechanics had suggested the possibility of propelling boats by steam power; but all their experiments in this country, in England, France, and Scotland, had proved abortive, and were abandoned.

My colleague has referred to the experiments of John Fitch on the Delaware, in 1783. That individual was supported by an association of men, who furnished him means, and were interested in his success. The experiments resulted in no evidence of practical utility. The report made upon them to the Philosophical Society at Philadelphia shows, that no possible advantage could be derived from the plan proposed.

The question is not, sir, who first suggested the possibility of applying steam power to boat navigation, but who first perfected such application, and made an experiment with entire success.

The mechanics, whose attention had been turned to the subject, were, doubtless, men of ingenuity and merit; but, sir, they were not possessed of that rare union of genius and practical knowledge, which was necessary to enable them to make a successful application. All their efforts and experiments proved fruitless.

England, or rather her critics and reviewers, for a time, claimed priority of invention. But, sir, the documents on our tables show the injustice of such claim. The report of the Commissioner of Patents made to Congress at the present session says:

"Among the losses occasioned by the fire, most deeply regretted, was the destruction of all the papers deposited by Robert Fulton. His drawings were executed by his own hand, and formed an interesting part of the records of American genius. Establishing for our country the honor of the first successful and practical employment of steam in navigation. This loss has been considered irreparable. I am happy, however, to state, that correct duplicates can doubtless be procured. The fame of Fulton attracted the attention of a foreign Government, for whom, on application therefor, complete copies of his drawings and transcripts of specifications and other papers, deposited in this office, were made and transmitted to London, where, it is presumed, copies may be obtained to supply the place of the originals. Measures will immediately be taken to accomplish that object."

Here is evidence that England established no claim. Every boat built upon English waters, was constructed upon the plan and after the model and drawings of Mr. Fulton. It was reserved for his inventive genius and enterprise, by a wonderful combination of machinery, to produce the successful result. The present generation have awarded to him this merit; posterity will recognise, and history will record it, as the achievement of Robert Fulton.

Mr. Speaker, I rose to rescue his memory from undeserved attack. Deeply impressed, as I have been from my youth, with the merits of that distinguished individual, and the value of his life and labors to our country, and the world, I could not permit the remarks of honorable members on this floor to pass without a response from me.

I will now give my reasons in support of the bill. The bill proposes to award to the heirs of Robert Fulton $100,000, not as a donation, but for valuable services rendered the country; services in which rare talent and inventive ingenuity were employed, and of such a character as no other man could have performed. The resources of the whole country have been developed, and the people of every State in the Union have been enriched by his inventions. His whole life was one unbroken act of devotion to the interests of his country. The interest of self was merged in that of the public good. As an evidence of this, I will read an extract from his letter to his friend, the poet Barlow, in 1807, after his return to New York, from his first trip up the Hudson by steamboat. He writes:

"Having employed much time, money and zeal, in accomplishing this work, it gives me, as it will you, great pleasure to see it fully answer my expectations. It will give a cheap and quick conveyance to the merchandise on the Mississippi, Missouri, and other great rivers, which are now laying open their treasures to the enterprise of our countrymen; and although the prospect of present emolument has been some inducement to me, yet I feel infinitely more pleasure in reflecting on the immense advantage that my country will derive from the invention."

Sir, this was a proud day for Fulton. A short period before he was soliciting aid to complete his boat. Having exhausted all his own means, he made application to men of property in the city of New York, offering them a share in his boat, and the privileges granted him; but his project was considered wild and visionary. After its completion, the morning it was to leave New York a crowd of spectators gathered upon the wharves, to witness what they believed would be an abortive experiment. Jeers and sarcasms passed among the unbelieving populace. But when the boat rounded from East river, and entered the waters of the Hudson, their jeers and sarcasms were changed to plaudits of admiration.

In reference to these facts, Mr. Fulton writes in the same letter to his valued friend:

"The morning I left New York there were not thirty persons in the city who believed that the boat would ever move one mile an hour, or be of the least utility; and while we were putting off from the wharf, which was crowded with spectators, I heard a number of sarcastic remarks. This is the way in which ignorant men compliment what they call philosophers and projectors."

At this time Mr. Fulton, in conjunction with his friend and patron, the late celebrated Chancellor Livingston, made application to the Legislature of New York, and the grant for the exclusive navigation of the Hudson river by steam power, was extended to them for twenty years. The money derived from this privilege enabled him to construct other boats, and to carry on his inventions for maritime defence, which he prosecuted in the harbor of New York. He enjoyed this privilege, unmolested, but a few years. Speculators arose, complained of his monopoly, and interfered with his privileges. This invasion of his rights called forth the public sympathy, and the matter underwent legislative investigation. His rights and claims upon the public gratitude, were ably defended on that occasion by the late Thomas Addis Emmet. That eloquent advocate, after he had finished his address to the Legislature, turned to Mr. Fulton, and addressed to him a most touching appeal, which I will read as a portion of the history of those times, and as an evidence of the estimation in which he was then held as a great public benefactor:

"I know and feel, (said Mr. Emmet) and I rejoice in the conviction, that for the present at least, your interests, my friend, are perfectly secure; but do not, therefore, flatter yourself that you will be involved in no future difficulties on the same account. You expect too much from your well-earned reputation, and the acknowledged utility to mankind of your life and labors. You permit yourself to be engrossed with vast and noble plans for the public good. You are inconsiderately sinking your present income in the extension of public accommodations by steamboats. You are gratuitously giving your time and your talents to the construction of that great national object, your stupendous invention for maritime defence, which in itself is calculated to effect a revolution in naval warfare. I admire and applaud you for your readiness to devote to the service of the public the opulence you derive from its grateful remuneration. Let me remind you, however, that you have other and closer ties. I know the pain I am about to give, and I see the tears I make you shed; but by that love I speak—by that love which, like the light of Heaven, is refracted in rays of different strength upon your wife and children, which, when collected and combined, forms the sunshine of your soul—by that love, I do adjure you, provide in time for those dearest objects of your care. Yes, my friend, my heart bleeds while I utter it; but I have fearful forebodings that you may hereafter find in public faith a broken staff for your support, and receive from public gratitude a broken heart for your reward."

This appeal of Mr. Emmet was of no avail. Fired by his genius, and possessed of those rich and rare endowments of Heaven which are sometimes sent to bless mankind, he prosecuted with zeal his system for maritime defence up to and during the last war, till death closed his valuable life, in 1815. In his last moments, if the recollections of his friends are to be relied on, he was sustained and soothed by the confident belief that a country which had been enriched by his labors would make ample provision for his family.

Sir, when Fulton died; when the arm which gave life and spirit to his great inventions, which have formed an era in human history, was powerless, speculators again arose, encouraged by the opinions of able counsel, denied the constitutional power of the law in granting the exclusive navigation of the Hudson river by steam, and then commenced that memorable contest in the State courts of New York, each, in succession, deciding in favor of the grant, until, upon an appeal to the Supreme Court of the United States, the judgment was reversed, the law declared unconstitutional and void, and thus the last hope of his orphan family was torn from them, and they were thrown upon the charities of a cold and unfeeling world, embarrassed with the debts of their father's estate, and with nothing to sustain them but the recollection of his virtues and his fame.

If Mr. Fulton, after he had obtained his patent for propelling boats by steam power, instead of applying to the Legislature of New York, had applied to Congress to purchase his patent, would Congress have awarded a less sum than the amount proposed by this bill? Sir, I would ask honorable members who represent the Western country, to estimate the value of steam navigation, in developing her resources—extending her population—building up her cities and villages as by the spirit of enchantment—multiplying the elements of national prosperity, and pouring millions of money into the National Treasury, by the sale of the public lands? Sir, I would ask them the value of the services of Robert Fulton? The great rivers of the West, the Ohio, the Mississippi, and Missouri, were innavigable, except upon their downward currents, until the introduction of steam navigation. And now more than five hundred steamboats are plying on those waters, forming the wings of western prosperity. I trust that honorable members, whose constituents share so largely in the fruits of his labors, will not be unmindful of the claims of his children.

The triumphs of his distinction were not confined to the mechanic arts. He was the projector of the canal system of this country. The impulses of his mind first awakened public attention to that system of internal improvements, which is now the pride of New York and Pennsylvania. In a letter to Mr. Gallatin, Secretary of the Treasury, in 1808, he shows the influence of canal navigation in cementing the bonds of the Union.

Mr. Speaker, I have thus given a rapid sketch of the character and services of Robert Fulton. But, sir, it is not compensation for his general services to this country, which has brought his children before Congress in the humble attitude of petition. Their claim is for specific relief. The language of the bill is:

"For the services of Robert Fulton, in inventing a system of coast and harbor defence, and in testing its utility; and for his services for inventing and superintending the construction of a steam frigate at New York during and after the late war; and for the use of his patent for steam frigates; and for the detention of his steamboat Vesuvius, impressed into the service of the United States, and detained from the 30th of December, 1814, to the 12th March, 1815, both days inclusive; and for the damage done to said boat while she was aground at New Orleans."

These claims were presented to Congress in the year 1829. No definite action was had upon them until, by a joint resolution of the Senate and House of Representatives, of the 9th of April, 1837, the petition and papers were referred to the Secretary of the Navy, to state an account. On the 3d of January, 1837, the Secretary made his report, showing the balance due the heirs, with a detailed statement of the testimony and reasons to fortify each item of the account; and it is the conclusion arrived at by the Secretary, which the bill proposes to adopt.

One item of the account, as stated by the Secretary, is:

"1815. Damages for the detention of the steamboat Vesuvius, from 30th December, 1814, to 12th March, 1815, $50,000."

This charge, sir, is sustained by ample testimony. The steamboat Vesuvius, measuring 356 tons, was owned by Robert Fulton, and in the year 1814 was the only steamboat on the Ohio and Mississippi rivers, between Louisville, in Kentucky, and New Orleans. This boat arrived at New Orleans in the latter part of December, 1814, at the time great alarm prevailed in consequence of the appearance of the British army before that city. The boat was, on the 30th of the same month, impressed and taken into the service of the United States, for the transportation of troops and munitions of war, and detained until the 12th of March following. Robeson DeHart, who was commandant of the Vesuvius at the time of her impressment, states, on oath, "that as this was the only boat between Louisville and New Orleans, her services would have been worth to her owner, during the campaign, (which lasted between three and four months,) from eight to nine hundred dollars per day." Other witnesses make the estimate still higher. And it is worthy of remark that these estimates are not mere opinions, but are based upon the most accurate calculation of the profits this boat had been clearing in her voyages between Louisville and New Orleans.

John De Hart, who commanded the boat the following year, states on oath that, for a portion of the time during her impressment, her services would have been worth from fifteen hundred to two thousand dollars per day, in conveying families and valuable effects up the river, to escape from the supposed impending destruction of that city. The Secretary, however, thinks the estimates too high, and says, "that as the Government have been lately paying at the rate of $500 per day for the use of a steamboat in the present campaign against the Seminole Indians, when steamboats are much more easily procured than they were in 1814 and 1815, he thinks that $600 per day for the use of the boat would be a reasonable compensation," which, with the estimate for the damage done the boat, he puts at $50,000. I am not disposed to dissent from the judgment of the Secretary, but my opinion is, sir, from the testimony, that the estimate is too low.

The next item is, "the use of Mr. Fulton's patent right for constructing steam frigates, $60,000." In relation to this item, and the one for "services as superintendent in building a steam frigate at New York," the Secretary in his report, says:

"Mr. Fulton secured to himself the right of a patent for this invention, the whole benefit of which has resulted to the United States. A liberal estimate of the value and importance of his services in this invention should be adopted.

"The opinions expressed in the papers referred are in favor of a very high estimate of the value and importance of this invention; and the Messrs. Robert and George L. Schuyler, in their letter of the 3d of last month, express their opinion that the sum of $100,000 should be awarded to the heirs of Fulton for the use of his patent right and improvements for the construction of steam frigates. Although I place great confidence in the opinion of these gentlemen, yet I think their estimate is too high; but I am satisfied, from the best consideration I can give to the case, that $60,000 would be no more than a reasonable allowance for the use of this patent right and improvements.

"The Messrs. Robert and George L. Schuyler also state in their letter that, in their opinion, the sum of $25,000 should be allowed as a compensation for the services of Mr. Fulton as superintendent in the construction of the steam frigate at New York; and as this opinion is corroborated by much testimony in the case, I consider that sum as a liberal, and, at the same time, no more than an adequate, allowance for these services."

Mr. Speaker, it has been usual for Congress to purchase patents for inventions useful as an arm of national defence. In the session of 1836, by special act, the sum of $20,000 was awarded to the inventor for his interest in two patents; one a machine for elevating heavy cannon, and the other for pointing cannon.

From 1810 till the day of his death, in 1815, Mr. Fulton was, a large portion of his time, engaged in the harbor of New York in prosecuting and perfecting his plan for maritime defence. During the last war, his time, his talents and his money were actively engaged, and freely bestowed, in aiding the military in the defence of that city; and because he had patriotism enough to enter the workshops of the mechanic, and superintend in the construction of the steam frigate at New York, without the promise of any compensation on the part of the Government, and, as is said, without the expectation of remuneration, it is now proposed by my colleague, [Mr. RUSSELL,] in his abundant liberality, to allow his children no compensation for those services. He was engaged, as appears by the deposition of Thomas Morris, from twelve to eighteen months in building it; and it was the exposure upon the decks of this vessel during its construction, which produced the disease that terminated his valuable life. And, sir, there is evidence to show that Mr. Fulton did not intend to devote his time and talents gratuitously in the construction of this vessel. There is, among the papers, a proposal, in the form of a law of Congress, in his own hand-writing, to form a company, consisting of General Dearborn, Dr. Samuel L. Mitchell, Henry Rutgers, and others, to build the steam frigate, and receive a certain per cent. upon the cost of construction. This proposition, it would appear, the Government did not accept; and besides, during the time of its construction, Mr. Fulton had four steamboats building at Pittsburgh, on the Ohio, which were under the superintendence of agents. But, sir, the joint resolution of the Senate and House of Representatives of the 9th April, 1836, settles this point, and directs the Secretary of the Navy to credit the heirs of Robert Fulton, a compensation commensurate with the value and importance of his services in constructing the steam frigate at New York. Under this resolution the Secretary acted; and the following is the account, as he presents it for the action of Congress.

Mr. Speaker, it is asked by my colleague why these claims have been permitted to sleep from the death of Mr. Fulton, in 1815, till 1829, when they were first presented to Congress? Sir, I will answer this question. In 1820, as appears by the papers, a suit was commenced by the Government against the personal representatives of Robert Fulton, in the district court for the southern district of New York. These claims, or a portion of them, were interposed as a set-off in that suit, which was not tried until the month of February, 1826. During its pendency, therefore, these claims could not have been presented to Congress. That suit was brought to adjust the claim standing uncancelled on the books of the Treasury Department for moneys advanced to Mr. Fulton under a contract to place four steamboats on the Western waters during the last war, a fulfilment of which contract was rendered unnecessary by the return of peace. At the trial in New York, the jury rendered a verdict for the defendants, and were about certifying a balance due the representatives of Mr. Fulton, when they were informed that it would be irregular, as the action was upon a sealed instrument. What balance they were prepared to certify is not known. But again: Mr. Fulton left four children, one son and three daughters, who were minors a great portion of this time.

Mr. Speaker, I am in favor of the bill. I rejoice that an opportunity has been presented to express my unqualified approbation of its merits. The intelligent and high minded constituency I represent will sustain me in the vote I propose to give. It will remain among the treasured recollections of my life that I have stood up in its defence, and aided in dispensing national justice to the orphan children of him who has contributed so largely to make us a great, prosperous, and happy people.

INDEPENDENT TREASURY BILL.

SPEECH OF MR. CALHOUN,
OF SOUTH CAROLINA,

In Senate, February 15, 1838—Upon the bill "to impose additional duties, as depositaries, upon certain public officers, to appoint Receivers General of public money, and to regulate the safe-keeping, transfer, and disbursement, of the public moneys of the United States."

I regard this measure, which has been so much denounced, as very little more than an attempt to carry out the provisions of the joint resolution of 1816, and the deposite act of 1836. The former provides that no notes but those of specie-paying banks shall be received in the dues of the Government, and the latter that such banks only shall be the depositories of the public revenues and fiscal agents of the Government; but it omitted to make provisions for the contingency of a general suspension of specie-payments, such as is the present. It followed, accordingly, on the suspension in May last, which totally separated the Government and the banks, that the revenues were thrown into the hands of the Executive, where they have since remained under its exclusive control, without any legal provision for their safe-keeping. The object of this bill is to supply this omission; to take the public money out of the hands of the Executive, and place it under the custody of the laws, and to prevent the renewal of a connection which has proved so unfortunate to both the Government and the banks. But it is this measure, originating in an exigency caused by our own acts, and that seeks to make the most of a change effected by operation of law, instead of attempting to innovate, or to make another experiment, as has been erroneously represented, which has been denounced under the name of the Sub-Treasury with such unexampled bitterness.

In lieu of this bill, an amendment has been offered, as a substitute, by the Senator from Virginia, furthest from the chair, (Mr. RIVES,) which he informs us is the first choice of himself and those who agree with him, and the second choice of those with whom he is allied on this question. If I may judge from appearances, which can hardly deceive, he might have said their first choice, under existing circumstances; and have added, that, despairing of a National Bank, the object of their preference, they have adopted his substitute, as the only practical alternative at present. We have, then, the question thus narrowed down to this bill and the proposed substitute. It is agreed on all sides, that one or the other must be selected, and that to adopt or reject the one, is to reject or adopt the other. The single question then is, which shall we choose?

A deeply momentous question, which we are now called on to decide in behalf of the States of this Union, and on our decision their future destiny must, in a great degree, depend, so long as their Union endures.

In comparing the relative merits of the two measures, preparatory to a decision, I shall touch very briefly on the principles and details of the bill. The former is well understood by the Senate and the country at large, and the latter has been so ably and lucidly explained by the chairman of the committee in his opening speech, as to supersede the necessity of further remarks on them at this stage of the discussion. I propose, then, to limit myself to a mere general summary, accompanied by a few brief observations.

The object of the bill, as I have already stated, is to take the public funds out of the hands of the Executive, where they have been thrown by operation of our acts, and to place them under the custody of law; and to provide for a gradual and slow, but a perpetual, separation between the Government and the banks. It proposes to extend the process of separating to the year 1845, receiving during the first year of the series the notes of such banks as may pay specie, and reducing thereafter the amount receivable in notes one-sixth annually, till the separation shall be finally consummated at the period mentioned.

The provisions of the bill are the most simple and effectual that an able committee could devise. Four principal receivers, a few clerks, and a sufficient number of agents to examine the state of the public funds, in order to see that all is right, at an annual charge not exceeding forty or fifty thousand dollars, at most, constitute the additional officers and expenditures required, to perform all the functions heretofore discharged by the banks, as depositories of the public money and fiscal agents of the Treasury. This simple apparatus will place the public Treasury on an independent footing, and give to the Government, at all times, a certain command of its funds to meet its engagements, and preserve its honor and faith inviolate. If it be desirable to separate from the banks, the Government must have some independent agency of its own to keep and disburse the public revenue; and if it must have such an agency, none, in my opinion, can be devised more simple, more economical, more effectual and safe, than that provided by this bill. It is the necessary result of the separation, and to reject it, without proposing a better, (if, indeed, a better can be) is to reject the separation itself.

I turn now to the substitute. Its object is directly the reverse of that of the bill. It proposes to revive the league of State banks, and to renew our connection with them, which all acknowledge has contributed so much to corrupt the community, and to create a spirit for speculation, heretofore unexampled in our history.

The Senator in offering it, whether wisely or not, has at least acted consistently. He was its advocate at first in 1834, when the alternative was between it and the recharter of the late Bank of the United States. He then defended it zealously and manfully, against the fierce assaults of his present allies, as he now defends it, when those who then sustained him have abandoned the measure. Whether wisely or not, there is something heroic in his adherence, and I commend him for it; but I fear I cannot say as much for his wisdom and discretion. He acknowledged, with all others, the disasters that have followed the first experiment, but attributes the failure to inauspicious circumstances, and insists that the measure has not had a fair trial. I grant that a second experiment may succeed, after the first has failed; but the Senator must concede, in return, that every failure must necessarily weaken confidence, both in the experiment and the experimenter. He cannot be more confident in making this second trial, than he was in the first; and, if I doubted the success then, and preferred the Sub-Treasury to his league of banks, he must excuse me for still adhering to my opinion, and doubting the success of his second trial. Nor ought he to be surprised, that those who joined him in the first should be rather shy of trying the experiment again, after having been blown into the air, and burnt and scalded by the explosion. But if the Senator has been unfortunate in failing to secure the co-operation of those who aided him in the first trial, he has been compensated by securing the support of those who were then opposed to him. They are now his zealous supporters. In contrasting their course then and now, I intend nothing personal. I make no charge of inconsistency, nor do I intend to imply it. My object is truth, and not to wound the feelings of any one, or any party. I know that to make out a charge of inconsistency, not only the question, but all the material circumstances, must be the same. A change in either, may make a change of vote necessary; and, with a material variation in circumstances, we are often compelled to vary our course, in order to preserve our principles. In this case, I conceive that circumstances, as far as the present allies of the Senator are concerned, have materially changed. Then the option was between a recharter of the late bank, and a league of State banks; but now the former is out of the question, and the option is between such a league and a total separation from the banks. This being the alternative, they may well take that which they rejected in 1834, without subjecting themselves to the charge of inconsistency, or justly exposing themselves to the imputation of change of principle, or opinion. I acquit them, then, of all such charges. They doubtless think now, as they formerly did, of the measure which they then denounced and rejected, but which a change of circumstances now compels them to support. But in thus acquitting them of the charge of inconsistency, they must excuse me, if I should avail myself of the fact, that their opinion remains unchanged, as an argument in favor of the bill—against the substitute. The choice is between them. They are in the opposite scales. To take from the one is, in effect, to add to the other; and any objection against the one, is an argument equally strong in favor of the other. I then do avail myself of their many powerful objections in '34 against the measure which this substitute proposes now to revive. I call to my aid, and press into my service, every denunciation they then uttered, and every argument they then so successfully urged against it. They, no, we (for I was then, as now, irreconcilably opposed to the measure) charged against it, and proved what we charged, that it placed the purse and the sword in the same hands; that it would be the source of boundless patronage and corruption, and fatal in its consequences to the currency of the country; and I now avail myself of these, and all other objections, then urged by us, in as full force against this substitute, as if you were again to rise in your places and repeat them now, and, of course, as so many arguments, in effect, in favor of the bill; and on their strength I claim your vote in its favor, unless, indeed, still stronger objections can be, urged against it. I say stronger, because time has proved the truth of all that was then said against the measure now proposed to be revived by this substitute. What was then prediction is now fact. But whatever objections have been, or may be, urged against the bill, however strong they may appear in argument, remain yet to be tested by the unerring test of time and experience. Whether they shall ever be realized, must be admitted, even by those who may have the greatest confidence in them, to be at least uncertain; and it is the part of wisdom and prudence, where objections are equally strong against two measures, to prefer that which is yet untried, to that which has been tried and failed. Against this conclusion there is but one escape.

It may be said, that we are sometimes compelled, in the midst of the many extraordinary circumstances in which we may be placed, to prefer that which is of itself the more objectionable, to that which is less so; because the former may more probably lead, in the end, to some desired result, than the latter. To apply the principle to this case. It may be said that the substitute, though of itself objectionable, is to be preferred, because it would more probably lead to the establishment of a National Bank than the bill, which you believe to be the only certain remedy for all the disorders that affect the currency. I admit the position to be sound in principle, but it is one exceedingly bold and full of danger in practice, and ought never to acted on, but in extreme cases, and where there is a rational prospect of accomplishing the object ultimately aimed at. The application, in this case, I must think, would be rashness itself. It may be safely assumed, that the success of either, whichever may be adopted, the bill, or the substitute, would be fatal to the establishment of a National Bank. It can never put down a successful measure to take its place; and, of course, that which is most likely to fail, and replunge the country into all the disasters of a disordered currency, is that which would most probably lead to the restoration of a National Bank; and to prefer the substitute on that account is, in fact, to prefer it because it is the worst of the two. But are you certain that another explosion would be followed by a bank? We have already had two; and it is far more probable, that the third would impress, universally and indelibly, on the puhlic mind, that there was something radically and incurably wrong in the system, which would blow up the whole concern, National Bank and all.

If I may be permitted to express an opinion, I would say, you have pursued a course on this subject unfortunate both for yourselves and country. You are opposed both to the league of banks, and the Sub-Treasury. You prefer a National Bank; and regard it as the only safe and certain regulator of the currency, but consider it, for the present, out of the question, and are therefore compelled to choose between the other two. By supporting the substitute, you will be held responsible for all the mischief and disasters that may follow the revival of the pet bank system, as it has been called, with the almost certain defeat of your first and cherished choice; and those you oppose will reap all the benefits of the power, patronage and influence, which it may place in their hands, without incurring any portion of the responsibility. But that is not all. The success of the substitute would be the defeat of the bill, which would, in like manner, place on you the responsibility of its defeat, and give those you oppose, all the advantage of having supported it without any of the responsibility that would have belonged to it, had it been adopted. Had a different course been taken—had you joined in aiding to extend the custody of the laws over the public revenue, in the hands of the Executive, where your own acts have placed it, and for which you, of course, are responsible, throwing the blame at the same time on those to whom you attribute the present disordered state of the currency, the burden of the responsibility, you would have stood ready to profit by events. If the Sub-Treasury, contrary to your anticipation, succeeded, as patriots, you would have cause to rejoice in the unexpected good. If it failed, you would have the credit of having anticipated the result; and might then, after a double triumph of sagacity and foresight, have brought forward your favorite measure, with a fair prospect of success, when every other had failed. By not taking this course, you have lost the only prospect of establishing a National Bank.

Nor has your course, in my opinion, been fortunate for the country. Had it been different, the currency question would have been decided at the called session; and had it been decided then, the country would this day have been in a much better condition—at least the manufacturing and commercial section to the North, where the derangement of the currency is felt the most severely. The South is comparatively in an easy condition.

Such are the difficulties that stand in the way of the substitute at the very threshold. Those beyond are vastly greater, as I shall now proceed to show. Its object, as I have stated, is to revive the league of State banks; and the first question presented for consideration is, how is this to be done? how is the league to be formed? how stimulated into life when formed? and what, after it has been revived, would be the true character of the league or combination? To answer these questions we must turn to its provisions.

It provides that the Secretary of the Treasury shall select twenty-five specie-paying banks, as the fiscal agents of the Government, all to be respectable and substantial, and that the selection shall be confirmed by the joint vote of the two Houses. It also provides that they shall be made the depositories of the public money, and that their notes shall be receivable in the dues of the Government; and that in turn, for these advantages, they shall stipulate to perform certain duties, and comply with various conditions, the object of which is to give to the Secretary of the Treasury full knowledge of their condition and business, with the view to supervise and control their acts as far as the interest of the Government is concerned. In addition to these, it contains other and important provisions, which I shall not enumerate, because they do not fall within the scope of the objections that I propose to urge against the measure.

Now I ask what does all this amount to? What but a proposal, on the part of the Government, to enter into a contract or bargain with certain selected State banks, on the terms and conditions contained. Have we the right to make such a bargain is the first question; and to that, I give a decided negative, which I hope to place on constitutional grounds, that cannot be shaken. I intend to discuss it, with other questions growing out of the connection of the Government with the banks, as a new question, for the first time presented for consideration and decision. Strange as it may seem, the questions growing out of it, as long as it has existed, have never yet been presented nor investigated in reference to their constitutionality. How this has happened, I shall now proceed to explain, preparatory to the examination of the question which I have proposed.

The union of the Government and the banks was never legally solemnized. It originated shortly after the Government went into operation, not in any legal enactment, but in a short order of the Treasury Department, of not much more than a half a dozen of lines, as if it were a mere matter of course. We thus glided imperceptibly into a connection, which was never recognised by law till 1816, (if my memory serves,) but which has produced more important after consequences, and has had a greater control over the destiny of this country, than any of the mighty questions which have so often and deeply agitated the country. To it may be traced, as their seminal principle, the vast and extraordinary expansion of our banking system, our excessive import duties, unconstitutional and profuse disbursements, the protective tariff, and its associated system for spending what it threw into the Treasury, followed in time by a vast surplus, which the utmost extravagance of the Government could not dissipate, and finally, by a sort of retributive justice, the explosion of the entire banking system, and the present prostrated condition of the currency, now the subject of our deliberation.

How a measure, fraught with such important consequences, should at first, and for so long a time, have escaped the attention and the investigation of the public, deserves a passing notice. It is to be explained by the false conception of the entire subject of banking, which at that early period universally prevailed in the community. So erroneous was it, that a bank note was then identified in the mind of the public with gold and silver, and a deposite in bank was regarded as under the most safe and sacred custody that could be devised. The original impression, derived from the Bank of Amsterdam, where every note or certificate in circulation was honestly represented by an equal and specific quantity of gold or silver in bank, and where every deposite was kept as a sacred trust, to be safely returned to the depositary, when demanded, was extended to banks of discount, down to the time of the formation of our Government, with but slight modifications. With this impression, it is not at all extraordinary that the deposite of the revenue in banks for safe-keeping, and the receipt of their notes in the public dues, should be considered a matter of course, requiring no higher authority than a Treasury order; and hence a connection with all the important questions belonging to it, and now considered of vast magnitude, received so little notice, till public attention was directed to it by its recent rupture. This total separation from the system, in which we now find ourselves placed, for the first time, authorizes and demands that we shall investigate freely and fully, not only the consequences of the connection, but all the questions growing out of it, more especially those of a constitutional character; and I shall, in obedience to this demand, return to the question from which this digression has carried me so far.

Have we, then, the right to make the bargain proposed? Have we the right to bestow the high privileges, I might say, prerogatives, on them of being made the depositories of the public revenue, and of having their notes received and treated as gold and silver in the dues of the Government and in all its fiscal transactions? Have we the right to do all this in order to bestow confidence in the banks, with the view to enable them to resume specie-payments? What is the state of the case? The banks are deeply indebted to the country, and are unable to pay; and we are asked to give them these advantages, in order to enable them to pay their debts. Can we grant the boon? In answering this important question, I begin with the fact, that our Government is one of limited powers. It can exercise no right but what is specifically granted; nor pass any law, but what is necessary and proper to carry such power into effect. This small pamphlet (holding it up) contains the Constitution. Its grants of power are few and plain; and I ask gentlemen to turn to it, and point out the power that authorizes us to do what is proposed to be done, or to show that to pass this substitute is necessary to carry any of the granted powers into effect. If neither can be shown, what is proposed cannot be constitutionally done; and till it is specifically pointed out, I am warranted in believing that it cannot be shown.

Our reason is often confounded by a mere name. An act, in the minds of many, may become of doubtful constitutional authority, when applied to a bank, which none would, for a moment, hesitate to pronounce grossly unconstitutional, when applied to an individual. To free ourselves from this illusion, I ask, could this Government constitutionally bestow on individuals, or a private association, the advantages proposed to be bestowed on the selected banks, in order to enable them to pay their debts? Is there one who hears me who would venture to say, yes, even in the case of the most extensive merchant or mercantile concern, such as some of those in New York, or New Orleans, at the late suspension, whose embarrassments involved entire sections in distress? But, if not, on what principle can a discrimination be made in favor of the banks? They are local institutions, created by the States for local purposes, composed, like private associations, of individual citizens, on whom the acts of the State cannot confer a particle of constitutional right, under this Constitution, that does not belong to the humblest citizen. So far from it, if there be a distinction, it is against the banks. They are removed farther from the control of this Government than the individual citizens, who, by the Constitution, are expressly subject to the direct action of this Government in many instances; while the State banks, as constituting a portion of the domestic institutions of the States, and resting on their reserved rights, are entirely beyond our control; so much so, as not to be the subject of a bankrupt law, although the authority to pass one is expressly granted by the Constitution.

On what possible ground, then, can the right in question be placed, unless, indeed, on the broad principle that these local institutions, intended for State purposes, have been so extended, and have so connected themselves with the general circulation and business of the country, as to effect the interest of the whole community, so as to make it the right and duty of Congress to regulate them; or, in short, on the broad principle of the general welfare? There is none other, that I can perceive; but this would be to adopt the old and exploded principle, at all times dangerous, but pre-eminently so at this time, when such loose and dangerous conceptions of the Constitution are abroad in the land. If the argument is good in one case, it is good in all similar cases. If this Government may interfere with any one of the domestic institutions of the States, on the ground of promoting the general welfare, it may with others. If it may bestow privileges to control them, it may also appropriate money for the same purpose; and thus a door might be opened to an interference with State institutions, of which we of a certain section ought at this time to be not a little jealous.

The argument might be pushed much farther. We not only offer to confer great and important privileges on the banks to be selected, but, in turn, ask them to stipulate to comply with certain conditions, the object of which is to bring them under the supervision and control of this Government. It might be asked, where is the right to purchase or assume such supervision or control? It might be repeated that they are State institutions, incorporated solely for State purposes, and to be entirely under State control, and that all supervision on our part is in violation of the rights of the States. It might be argued that such supervision or control is calculated to weaken the control of the States over their own institutions, and to render them less subservient to their peculiar and local interests, for the promotion of which they were established; and too subservient to other, and, perhaps, conflicting interests, which might feel but little sympathy with those of the States. But I forbear. Other, and not less urgent, objections claim my attention. To dilate too much on one would necessarily sacrifice the claim of others.

I next object, that, whatever may be the right to enter into the proposed bargain, the mode in which it is proposed to make it is clearly unconstitutional, if I rightly comprehend it. I am not certain that I do; but, if I understand it rightly, the plan is for the Secretary of the Treasury to select twenty-five State banks, as described in the substitute, which are to be submitted to the two Houses to be confirmed, or rejected, by their joint resolutions, without the approval of the President, in the same mode as they would appoint a chaplain, or establish a joint rule for the government of their proceedings.

In acting on the joint resolution, if what I suppose be intended, each House would have the right, of course, to strike from it the name of any bank and insert another, which would in fact vest in the two Houses the uncontrollable right of making the selection. Now, if this be the mode proposed, as I infer from the silence of the mover, it is a plain and palpable violation of the Constitution. The obvious intention is, to evade the veto power of the Executive, which cannot be, without an infraction of an express provision of the Constitution, drawn up with the utmost care, and intended to prevent the possibility of evasion. It is contained in the 1st article, 7th section, and the last clause, which I ask the Secretary to read:

["Every order, resolution, or vote, to which the concurrence of the Senate and House of Representatives may be necessary, (except on a question of adjournment) shall be presented to the President of the United States, and before the same shall take effect, shall be approved by him, or being disapproved by him, shall be repassed by two-thirds of the Senate and House of Representatives, according to the rules and limitations prescribed in the case of a bill."]

Nothing can be more explicit, or full. It is no more possible to evade the Executive veto, on any joint vote, than in the passage of a bill. The veto was vested in him not only to protect his own powers, but as an additional guard to the Constitution. I am not the advocate of Executive power, which I have been often compelled to resist of late, when extended beyond its proper limits, as I shall ever be prepared to do when it is. Nor am I the advocate of Legislative or Judicial. I stand ready to protect all, within the sphere assigned by the Constitution, and to resist them beyond. To this explicit and comprehensive provision of the Constitution, in protection of the veto, there but a single exception, resulting, by necessary implication, from another portion of the instrument, not less explicit, which authorizes each House to establish the rules of its proceedings. Under this provision the two Houses have full and uncontrollable authority within the limits of their respective walls, and over those subject to their authority, in their official character. To that extent, they may pass joint votes and resolutions, without the approval of the Executive; but beyond that, without it, they are powerless.

There is in this case special reasons why his approval should not be evaded. The President is at the head of the administrative department of the Government, and is especially responsible for its good management. In order to hold him responsible, he ought to have due power in the selection of its agents, and proper control over their conduct. These banks would be by far the most powerful and influential of all the agents of the Government, and ought not to be selected without the concurrence of the Executive. If this substitute should be adopted, and the provision in question be regarded such as I consider it, there can be no doubt what must be the fate of the measure. The Executive will be bound to protect, by the intervention of its constitutional right, the portion of power clearly allotted to that department by that instrument, which would make it impossible for it to become a law, with the existing division in the two Houses.

I have not yet exhausted my constitutional objections. I rise to higher and to broader, applying directly to the very essence of this substitute. I deny your right to make a general deposite of the public revenue in a bank. More than half of the errors of life may be traced to fallacies originating in an improper use of words; and among not the least mischievous is the application of this word to bank transactions, in a sense wholly different from its original meaning Originally it meant a thing placed in trust, or pledged to be safely and sacredly kept till returned to the depositor, without being used by the depository, while in his possession. All this is changed when applied to a deposite in bank. Instead of returning the identical thing, the bank is understood to be bound to return only an equal value; and instead of not having the use, it is understood to have the right to loan it out on interest, or to dispose of it as it pleases, with the single condition, that an equal amount be returned, when demanded, which experience has taught is not always done. To place, then, the public money in deposite, in bank, without restriction, is to give the free use of it, and to allow them to make as much as they can out of it, between the time of deposite and disbursement. Have we such a right? The money belongs to the people—collected from them for specific purposes—in which they have a general interest—and for that only; and what possible right can we have to give such use of it to certain selected corporations? I ask for the provision of the Constitution that authorizes it. I ask, if we could grant the use, for similar purposes, to private associations or individuals? Or if not to them, to individual officers of the Government; for instance, to the four principal receivers under this bill, should it pass? And if this cannot be done, that the distinction be pointed out.

If these questions be satisfactorily answered, I shall propound others still more difficult. I shall then ask, if the substitute should become a law, and the twenty-five banks be selected, whether they would not in fact be the Treasury? And if not, I would ask, where would be the Treasury? But if the Treasury, I would ask, if public money in bank would not be in the Treasury? And if so, how can it be drawn from it to be lent for the purpose of trade, speculation, or any other use whatever, against an express provision of the Constitution? Yes, as express as words can make it. I ask the Secretary to read the 1st article, 9th section, and the clause next to the last.

"No money shall be drawn from the Treasury, but in consequence of appropriations made by law; and a regular statement and account of the receipts and expenditures of all public money shall be published from time to time."

How clear! How explicit! No money to be drawn from the Treasury, but in consequence of appropriations made by law; that is, the object on which the expenditure is to be made, to be designated by law, and the sum allotted to effect it, specified; and yet we have lived in the daily and habitual violation of this great fundamental provision, from almost the beginning of our political existence to this day. Behold the consequences! It has prostrated and engulfed the very institutions which have enjoyed this illicit favor, and tainted, above all other causes, the morals and politics of the whole country. Yes, to this must be traced, as one of the main causes, the whole system of excessive revenue, excessive expenditure, and excessive surpluses; and to them, especially the last, the disastrous overthrow of the banks and the currency, and the unexampled degeneracy of public and private morals, which have followed. We have suffered the affliction: may the blessing, which follows chastisement, when its justice is confessed, come in due season.

But I take a still higher ground. I strike at the root of the mischief. I deny the right of this Government to treat bank notes as money in its fiscal transactions. On this great question, I never have before committed myself, though not generally disposed to abstain from forming or expressing opinions. In all instances in which a National Bank has come in question, I have invariably taken my ground, that if the Government has the right to receive and treat bank notes as money, it had the right, and was bound, under the Constitution, to regulate them, so as to make them uniform and stable as a currency. The reasons for this opinion are obvious, and have been so often and fully expressed on former occasions, that it would be useless to repeat them now: but I never examined fully the right of receiving, or made up my mind on it, till since the catastrophe in May last, which, as I have said, entirely separated the Government from the banks. Previous to that period, it was an abstract question, with no practical bearing; as much so as is now the constitutional right of admitting Louisiana into the Union. Things are now altered. The connection is dissolved, and it has become a practical question of the first magnitude.

The mover of the substitute assumed as a postulate, that this Government had a right to receive in its dues whatever it might think proper. I deny the position in toto. It is one that ought not to be assumed, and cannot be proved, and which is opposed by powerful objections. The genius of our Constitution is opposed to the assumption of power. Whatever power it gives is expressly granted; and if proof were wanted, the numerous grants of powers far more obvious, and apparently much more safe to be assumed, than the one in question, would afford it. I shall cite a few striking instances.

If any powers might be assumed, one would suppose that of applying money to pay the debts of the Government, and borrowing it to carry on its operations, would be among them; yet both are expressly provided for by the Constitution. Again: to Congress is granted the power to declare war and raise armies and navies; yet the power to grant letters of marque and reprisal, and to make rules for the regulation of the army and navy, are not left to assumption, as obvious as they are, but are given by express grant. With these, and other instances not less striking, which might be added, it is a bold step to assume, without proof, the far less obvious power of the Government receiving whatever it pleases in its dues as money. Such an assumption would be in direct conflict with the great principle which the State rights party, with which the Senator (Mr. RIVES) classes himself, have ever adopted in the construction of the Constitution. But, if the former cannot be assumed, it would be in vain to attempt to prove that it has been granted, or that it is necessary and proper to carry any of the granted powers into effect. No such attempt has been made, nor can be, with success. On the contrary, there are strong objections to the power, which, in my opinion cannot be surmounted.

If once admitted, it would lead by consequence to a necessary interference with individual and State concerns never contemplated by the Constitution. Let us, for instance, suppose that, acting on the assumption of the Senator, the Government should choose to select tobacco as an article to be received in payment of its dues, which would be as well entitled to it as any other product, and in which the Senator's constituents are so much interested. Does he not see the consequences? In order to make its taxes uniform, which it is bound to do by the Constitution, and which cannot be done unless the medium in which it is paid is so, the Government would have to assume a general control over the great staple in question; to regulate the weight of the hogshead or package, to establish inspections under its own officers in order to determine the quality, and whatever else might be necessary to make the payments into the Treasury uniform. So likewise, if the still greater staple, cotton, be selected. The weight of the bale, the quality of the cotton, and its inspection, would all necessarily fall under the control of the Government; and does not the Senator see that the exercise of a power that must lead to such consequences—consequences so far beyond the sphere assigned to this Government by the Constitution, must be unconstitutional? Nor does the objection extend only to these and other staple articles. It applies with equal, if not greater force, to receiving the notes of State banks, as proposed by the substitute, in the dues of the Government and the management of its fiscal concerns. It must involve the Government in the necessity of controlling and regulating State banks, as this substitute abundantly proves, as well as the whole history of our connection with them; and it has been shown that banks are, at least, as far removed from the control of this Government as the cultivators of the soil, or any other class of citizens. To this I might add another objection, not less strong, that for the Government to receive and treat bank notes as money in its dues, would be in direct conflict, in its effect, with the important power, conferred expressly on Congress, of coining money and regulating the value thereof: but as this will come in with more propriety in answer to an argument advanced by the Senator from Massachusetts, (Mr. WEBSTER) I shall now state his argument, and reply to it.

He asserted again and again, both now and at the extra session, that it is the duty of the Government not only to regulate, but to furnish, a sound currency. Indeed, it is the principal argument relied on by the Senator in opposition to the bill, which he says abandons this great duty. Now, if by currency be meant gold and silver coins, there will be but little difference between him and myself. To that extent the Government has a clear and unquestionable right by express grant; but if he goes farther, and intends to assert that the Government has the right to make bank notes a currency, which it is bound to regulate, then his proposition is identical in effect, though differently expressed, with that of the Senator from Virginia, (Mr. RIVES,) and all the arguments I have urged against it are equally applicable to his. I hold, on my part, that the power of the Government on this subject is limited to coining money and regulating its value, and punishing the counterfeiting of the current coins; that is, of the coins made current by law, the only money known to the Constitution. It is time to make a distinction between money, or currency, if you please—between that which will legally pay debts, and mere circulation, which has its value from its promise to be paid in the former; and under which classification, bank notes, as well as bills or promissory notes of individuals, fall. These are all in their nature private and local, and cannot be elevated to the level of currency, or money, in the fiscal transactions of Government, without coming into conflict, more or less, with the object of the Constitution in vesting the very power in Congress, which I shall now proceed to show.

It will hardly be questioned, that the object was to fix a standard in order to furnish to the Union a currency of uniform and steady value, and was therefore united in the same sentence with the relative power to fix the standard of weights and measures—the objects being similar. Now, if our experience has proved any thing, it has amply shown that so long as the Government is connected with the banks, and their notes received in its transactions as money, so long it is impossible to give any thing like stability to the standard of value, and that the power of coining and regulating the coins, becomes, in a great measure, a mere nullity. Every dollar issued in bank notes, when it is made the substitute for money, drives out of circulation more or less of the precious metals; and when the issue becomes exorbitant, gold and silver almost entirely disappears, as our experience at this time proves. The effects are analogous to alloying or clipping the coin, as far as stability of standard is concerned; and it would be not less rational to suppose, that such a power on the part of individuals, would be consistent with a uniform and stable currency, than to suppose the receiving and treating bank notes as a substitute for money by the Government would be. The only check or remedy is to restrict them to their proper sphere—to circulate in common with bills of exchange or other private and local paper, for the convenience of business and trade. So far from such a course operating injuriously on the people, or from being liable to the charge of forming one currency for the people and another for the Government, as has been so often and with such effect repeated—it is the very reverse. Government by refusing to receive bank notes, as it is bound to do, would in fact furnish a choice to the people, to take either money notes at their pleasure. The demand of the Government will always keep a plentiful supply of the former in the country, so as to afford the people a choice, while the the opposite would expel the money, and leave no option to them but to take bank notes or worse, as at present.

I have now shown how it is proposed to form the league of banks, and have presented the constitutional impediments that stand in the way. These are numerous and strong; so much so, that they ought to be irresistible with all, except the latitudinous in construction; but I cannot expect they will produce their full effect. I know too well the force of long entertained impressions, however erroneous, to be sanguine—how strongly the mind rebels against the expulsion of the old and the admission of new opinions. Yet, in this case, where we clearly see how gradually and silently error crept in under the disguise of words applied to new and totally different ideas, without exciting notice or alarm; and when we have experienced such deep disasters in consequence of parting from the plain intent and meaning of the Constitution, I cannot but hope that all who believe that the success of the Government depends on a rigid adherence to the Constitution, will lay aside all previous impressions, taken up without reflection, and give to the objections their due weight.

I come now to the next point, to show how this league is to be revived or stimulated into life. Till this can be done, the substitute, should it become a law, would be a dead letter. The selection is to be made from specie paying banks. None but such can receive the public deposites, or have their notes received in the dues of the Government. There are none such now. The whole banking system lies inanimate, and must be vivified before it can be reunited with the Government. No one is bold enough to propose an union with this lifeless mass. How then is the vital spark to be revived? how the breath of life, the Promethean fire, to be breathed into the system anew, is the question? This is the task.

The mover tells us that it must be the work of the Government. He says that it is bound to aid the banks to resume payments; and for that purpose ought to hold out to them some adequate inducement. He tells us that they have been long preparing, and had made great efforts, but can go no farther; have rolled the round, huge rock almost to the summit, but unless the Government put forth its giant arm, and give the last push, it will recoil and rush down the steep to the bottom, and all past labor be lost. Now, what is this adequate inducement? What this powerful stimulus, which it is proposed the Government should apply, in order to enable the banks to accomplsh this herculean task? The substitute shall answer.

It prosposes to fix the 1st of July next for the period of resumption; and, as the inducement to resume, it proposes to select twenty-five of the most respectable and solid, out of the resuming banks, to be the depositories of the public moneys, and the fiscal agent of the Government, as has been already stated. It also proposes, and this is the stimulus,—the essence of the whole,—to make the notes of such banks as may resume on or before that day, exclusively receivable in the public dues. Here is a quid pro quo; something proposed to be done, for which something is to be given. We tell the banks plainly, if you resume, we, on our part, stipulate to make twenty-five of you our fiscal agents and depositories of the revenue; and we further stipulate, that those who resume by the time fixed, shall have the exclusive privilege for ever of having their notes receivable in the dues of the Government, in common with gold and silver. If the banks perform their part, we shall be bound in honor and good faith to perform ours. It would be a complete contract, as obligatory as if signed, sealed, and delivered. Such is the inducement.

The next question is, will it be adequate? Yes, abundantly adequate. The battery is strong enough to awaken the dead to life; the consideration sufficient to remunerate the banks for whatever sacrifice they may be compelled to make, in order to resume payment. It is difficult to estimate the value of these high privileges, or prerogatives, as I might justly call them. They are worth millions. If you were to enter into a similar contract with an individual, I doubt not that he could sell out in open market for at least thirty, forty, or fifty millions of dollars. I do then the mover the justice to say, that his means are ample to effect what he proposes. As difficult as is the work of resumption—and difficult it will turn out to be when tried—the inducement will prove all sufficient. But the resumption, however desirable, may be purchased too dearly; and such would prove to be the case, should the project succeed. Not only is the offer too great, but the mode of effecting it is highly objectionable. Its operation would prove not less disastrous than the bargain has been shown to be unconstitutional, which I shall now proceed to establish.

The offer will have a double effect. It will act as a powerful stimulus to resumption, but will act at the same time with equal force to excite a struggle among the banks, not only to resume themselves, but to prevent others from resuming. The reason is clear. The advantage to each will increase, as the number of the resuming banks decreases; and of course, the great point of contest among the strong will be to restrict the proffered prize to the smallest number. The closer the monopoly the greater the profits. In this struggle, a combination of a few powerful and wealthy banks, the most respectable and solid, as designated in the substitute, will overthrow and trample down the residue. Their fall will spread desolation over the land. Whatever may be the fate of others in this desperate contest, there is one in relation to which no doubt can be entertained: I refer to the United States Bank of Pennsylvania, a long name and a misnomer; and which, for the sake of brevity, but with no personal disrespect to the distinguished individual at its head, I shall call Mr. Biddle's bank. That, at least, will be one of the winners—one of the twenty-five to whom the prize will be assigned. Its vast resources, its wealth and influential connections, both at home and abroad, the skill and ability of the officer at its head, and, what is less honorable, the great resource it holds in the notes of the late United States Bank, of which more than six millions have been put into circulation, in violation, to say the least, of a trust, constituting more than five-sixths of all its circulation, and which it is not bound to pay—with the still greater amount on hand, making in the whole more than twenty-six millions, and which may be used in the same way, if not prevented—would place it beyond all doubt among the victors.

He starts without proper weights, and will lead the way from the first. Who the others may be is uncertain; this will depend mainly upon his good will and pleasure. It may be put down as certain, whoever they may be, that they will be powerful and influential, and not unfavorable to his interest or aggrandizement. But the mischievous effect will not be limited to this death-like struggle, in which so many must fall and be crushed that might otherwise weather the storm. The forced resumption, for such it will be in effect, would be followed by wide-spread desolation. It is easy to sink to suspension, but hard to return to resumption. Under the most favorable circumstances, and when conducted most leisurely and cautiously, the pressure must be severe; but, if coerced or precipitated by bankrupt laws or temptations such as this, it will be ruinous. To make it safe and easy must be the work of time. Government can do but little. The disease originates in excessive indebtedness, and the only remedy is payment or reduction of debts. It is estimated that when the banks suspended payments, the community was indebted to them the enormous sum of $475,000,000. To reduce this within the proper limits, is not the work of a few days, and can be but little aided by us. The industry, and the vast resources, of the country, with time, are the only remedies to be relied on for the reduction; and to these, with the State Legislatures and the public opinion, the resumption must be left. To understand the subject fully, we must look a little more into the real cause of the difficulty.

This enormous debt was incurred in prosperous times. The abundant means of the banks from the surplus revenue, and a combination of other causes, induced them to discount freely. This increased the circulation, and, with its increase, its value depreciated, and prices rose proportionably. With this rise, enterprise and speculation seized the whole community, and every one expected to make a fortune at once; and this in turn gave a new impulse to discounts and circulation, till the swelling tide bursted its barriers and deluged the land. Then began the opposite process of absorbing the excess. If it had been possible to return it back to the banks, the sources from which it flowed, through its debtors, the speculating, enterprising, and business portion of the community, the mischief would have been, in a great measure, avoided. But circulation had flowed off into other reservoirs; those of the moneyed men and bankers, who hoard when prices are high, and buy when they are low. The portion thus drawn off and held in deposite, either in banks or the chests of individuals, was as effectually lost, as far as the debtors of the banks were concerned, as if it had been burnt. The means of payment were thus diminished; prices fell in proportion, and the pressure increased as they fell. Though the amount in circulation be greatly reduced, yet the banks are afraid to discount, lest, on resumption, the hoarded mass of deposites held by individuals or other banks, should be let loose, and, in addition to what might be put into circulation should discounts be made, would cause another inundation to be followed by another suspension. How is this difficulty to be safely surmounted, but by unlocking the hoarded means? And how is this to be done, without deciding the currency question? This is the first and necessary step. That done, all will be able to calculate, and determine what to do. The period of inaction and uncertainty would cease, and that of business revive. Funds that are now locked up, would be brought again into operation, and the channels of circulation be replenished in the only mode that can be done with safety. Thus thinking, I am now and have been from the first in favor of an early decision, and averse to all coercion, or holding out temptation to resume: leaving the disease to the gradual and safe operation of time, with as little tampering as possible. In the mean time, I hold it to be unwise to cease discounting, and to adopt an indiscriminate system of curtailment. Its effects are ruinous to the business of the country, and calculated to retard, rather than to accelerate a resumption. The true system, I would say, would be to discount with business paper as freely as usual, and curtail gradually on permanent debts. The former would revive business, and would increase the debts to the banks less than it would increase the ability of the community to pay them.

Having now shown how this league, or combination of banks, is to be formed and revived, with the difficulties in the way, it remains to determine what will be the true character and nature of the combination when formed. It will consist of State banks retaining their original powers, that of discounting and all, without being in the slightest degree impaired. To these the substitute proposes to add important additions: to receive their notes as gold and silver in the public dues; and to give them the use of the public deposites, and to organize and blend the whole into one, as the fiscal agent of the Government, to be placed under the immediate supervision and control of the Secretary of the Treasury. Now what does all this amount to? Shall I name the word—be not startled: A BANK—a Government bank—the most extensive, powerful and dangerous, that ever existed. This substitute would be the act of incorporation; and the privileges it confers, so much additional banking capital, increasing immensely its powers, and giving it an unlimited control over the business and exchanges of the country.

The Senator from Virginia (Mr. RIVES) was right in supposing that this new trial of the experiment would be made under very different circumstances from the first, and would have a different termination. That, too, like this, was a bank—a Government bank, as distinguished from the late bank, to which it was set up as a rival, and was at the time constantly so designated in debate. But the circumstances now are indeed different—very different, and so would be the result of the experiment. This bank would not be the same rickety concern as the former. That ended in anarchy, and this would in despotism. I will explain.

The former failed not so much in consequence of the adverse circumstances of the times, or any essential defect in the system, as from the want of a head—a common sensorium—to think, to will, and decide, for the whole, which was indispensably necessary to ensure concert and give unity of design and execution. A head will not be wanting now. Mr. Biddle's bank will supply the defect. His would be not only one of the resuming banks, as I have shown, but would also be one of the twenty-five to be selected. If there should be the temerity to omit it, the present project would share the fate of its predecessor. Mr. Biddle's bank, at the head of those excluded, would be an overmatch for the selected, in skill, capital and power; and the whole league would inevitably be overthrown; but if selected, the position of his bank in the league would be certain. Its vast capital, its extensive connections, its superior authority, and his skill, abilities and influence, would place it at the head, to think and act for the whole. The others would be as dependent on his, as the branches of the late bank were on the mother institution. The whole would form one entire machine, impelled by a single impulse, and making a perfect contrast with its predecessor in the unity and energy of its operations.

Nor would its fate be less dissimilar. Anarchy was inscribed on the first from the beginning. Its deficiency in the great and essential element, to ensure concert, was radical, and could not be remedied. Its union with the Government could not supply it, nor avert its destiny. But very different would be the case of the present. Add its intimate union with the Government, for which the substitute provides, to its other sources of power, and it would become irresistible. The two, Government and bank, would unite and constitute a single power; but which would gain the ascendancy—whether the Government would become the bank, or the bank the Government, is neither certain nor material; for whichever it might be, it would form a despotic moneycracy, (if I may be permitted to unite an English and a Greek word,) altogether irresistible.

It is not a little surprising that the Senator from Virginia, (Mr. RIVES,) whose watchful jealousy could detect, as he supposed, the embryo of a Government bank in the bill, should overlook this regular incorporation of one by his own substitute. Out of the slender materials of Treasury warrants and drafts to pay public creditors, or transfer funds from place to place, as the public service might require, and four principal receivers to keep the public money, he has conjured up, with the aid of a vivid imagination, a future Government bank, which he told us, with the utmost confidence, would rise like a cloud, at first as big as a hand, but which would soon darken all the horizon. Now, it is not a little unfortunate for his confident predictions, that these seminal principles from which the bank is to spring, have all existed from the commencement of our Government in full force, except the four receivers, without showing the least tendency to produce the result he anticipates. Not only ours, but every civilized Government has the power to draw Treasury warrants, and transfer drafts; nor has the power in a single instance terminated in a bank. Nor can the fact, that the money is to be kept by receivers, contribute in the least to produce one. The public funds in their hands will be as much beyond the control of the Executive, as it was in the vaults of the banks. But, to shorten discussion, I would ask, how can there be a bank without the power to discount or to use the deposites? and out of which of the provisions of the bill could the Treasury, by any possibility, obtain either, under the severe penalties of the bill, which prohibits the touching of the public money, except on warrants or drafts, drawn by those having authority, in due form, and for the public service.

But the danger which an excited imagination anticipates hereafter from the bill would exist in sober reality under the substitute. There it would require neither fancy nor conjecture to create one. It would exist, with all its faculties and endowments complete; discount, deposites and all; with which, immense means, guided by a central and directing head, and blended and united with the Government, so as to form one great mass of power. What a contrast with the bill! How simple and harmless the one, with its four principal receivers, twice as many clerks, and five inspectors, compared with this complex and mighty engine of power! And yet there are many, both intelligent and patriotic, who oppose the bill and support the substitute, on the ground that the former would give more patronage and power than the latter! How strange and wonderful the diversity of the human mind!

So far from being true, the very fact of the separation of the Government from the banks, provided for in the bill, would, of itself, be the most decisive blow that could be given against Government patronage, and the union of the two the most decisive in its favor. When their notes are received in the public dues as cash, and the public money deposited in their vaults, the banks become the allies of the Government on all questions connected with its fiscal action. The higher its taxes and duties, the greater its revenue and expenditure; and the larger its surplus, the more their circulation and business, and, of course, the greater their profit; and hence, on all questions of taxation and disbursements, and the accumulations of funds in the Treasury, their interest would throw them on the side of the Government, and against the people.

All this is reversed, when separated. The higher the taxation and disbursements, and the larger the surplus, the less would be their profit; and their interest in that case would throw them with the people, and against the Government. The reason is obvious. Specie is the basis of banking operations; and the greater amount they can command, the greater will be their business and profits; but when the Government is separated from them, and collects and pays away its dues in specie instead of their notes, it is clear that the higher the taxes and disbursements, and the greater the surplus in the Treasury, the more specie will be drawn from the use of the banks, and the less will be left as the basis of their operations, and, consequently, the less their profit. Every dollar withdrawn from them would diminish their business four-fold at least; and hence a regard to their own interest would inevitably place them on the side to which I have assigned them.

The effects on the politics of the country would be great and salutary. The weight of the banks would be taken from the side of the tax consumers, where it has been from the commencement of the Government, and placed on the side of the tax payers. This great division of the community necessarily grows out of the fiscal action of the Government. Take taxation and disbursement together, and it will always be found that one portion of the community pays into the Treasury, in the shape of taxes, more than it receives back in that of disbursements, and that another receives back more than it pays. The former are the tax payers, and the latter the consumers; making the great, essential, and controlling division in all civilized communities. If, with us, the Government has been thrown on the side of the consumers, as it has, it must be attributed to its alliance with the banks, whose influence has been, in consequence, at all times, steadily and powerfully on that side. It is to this mischievous and unholy alliance that may be traced almost all the disasters that have befallen us, and the great political degeneracy of the country. Hence the protective system; hence its associated and monstrous system of disbursements; hence the collection of more money from the people than the Government could require; hence the vast and corrupting surpluses; hence Legislative and Executive usurpations; and, finally, hence the prostration of the currency and the disasters which give rise to our present deliberations. Revive this fatal connection, adopt this substitute, and all this train of evils will again follow, with redoubled disasters and corruption. Refuse the connection, adopt this bill, and all will be reversed, and we shall have some prospect of restoring the Constitution and country to their primitive simplicity and purity. The effect of the refusal on the patronage of the Government would be great and decisive. Burke has wisely said that the "revenue is the State in modern times." Violence and coercion are no longer the instruments of Government in civilized communities. Their reign is past. Every thing is now done by money. It is not only the sinew of war, but of politics; over which, in the form of patronage, it exercises almost unlimited control. Just as the revenue increases or diminishes, almost in the same proportion is patronage increased or diminished.

But admit, for a moment, that neither the separation nor the connection would have any sensible effect to increase or diminish the revenue, and that it would be of the same amount, whether the bill or substitute should be adopted: yet, even on that supposition, the patronage of the latter would be a hundred fold greater than the former. In estimating the amount of patronage of any measure, three particulars must be taken into the calculation: the number of persons who may be effected by it; their influence in the community, and the extent of the control exercised over them. It will be found, on comparison, that the substitute combines all these elements in a far greater degree than the bill, as I shall now proceed to show. I begin with the number.

The bill provides, as has been stated, for four principal receivers, eight or ten clerks, and a suitable number of agents to act as inspectors, making in the whole, say 25 individuals. These would constitute the only additional officers to keep and disburse the public money. The substitute, in addition to the officers now in service, provides for the selection of 25 banks, to be taken from the most powerful and influential, and which would have, on an average, at the least, 100 officers and stockholders each, making, in the aggregate, 2,500 persons, who would be directly interested in the banks, and, of course, under the influence of the Government.

As to the relative influence of the officers and the selected banks over the community, every impartial man must acknowledge that the preponderance would be greater on the side of the latter. Admitting the respectability of the receivers and the other officers provided for in the bill, and the officers and stockholders of the banks to be individually the same, still the means of control at the disposition of the former would be as nothing compared to that of the latter. They could not touch a cent of public money. Their means would be limited to their salary, which would be too small to be felt in the community. Very different would be the case with the officers and stockholders of the banks. They, of all persons, are by far the most influential in the community. A greater number depend on them for accommodation and favor, and the success of their business and prospects in life, than any other class in society; and this would be especially true of the banks connected with the Government.

It only remains now to compare the extent of the control that may be exercised by the Government over the two, in order to complete the comparison; and here again the preponderance will be found to be strikingly on the same side. The whole amount of expenditure under the bill would not exceed $30,000 or $40,000 annually at the very farthest; and this constitutes the whole amount of control which the Government can exercise. There would be no perquisites, no contracts, jobs, or incidental gains. The offices and salaries would be all. To that extent, those who may hold them would be dependent on the Government, and thus far they may be controlled. How stands the account on the other side? What value shall be put on the public deposites in the banks? What on the receivability of their notes, as cash, by the Government? What on their connection with the Government, as their fiscal agent, which would give so great a control over the exchanges and business of the country? How many millions shall these be estimated at, and how insignificant must the paltry sum of $30,000 or $40,000 appear to those countless millions held under the provisions of the substitute at the pleasure of the Government!

Having now finished the comparison as to the relative patronage of the two measures, I shall next compare them as fiscal agents of the Government; and here let me say, at the outset, that the discussion has corrected an error which I once entertained. I had supposed that the hazard of keeping the public money under the custody of officers of the Government would be greater than in bank. The Senators from New Hampshire and Connecticut, (Messrs. HUBBARD and NILES) have proved from the record, that the hazard is on the other side; and that we have lost more by the banks than by the collecting and disbursing officers combined. What can be done to increase the security by judicious selections of officers, and proper organization, is strongly illustrated by the fact stated by the chairman (Mr. WRIGHT) in his opening speech, that in the War Department there has been no loss for fifteen years—from '21 to '36—on an expenditure certainly not less than one hundred millions of dollars. I take some pride in this result of an organization which I originated and established when Secretary of War, against the most formidable opposition.

As to the relative expense of the two agencies, that of the bill, as small as it is, if we are to judge by appearances, is the greatest; but if by facts, the substitute would be much the most so, provided we charge it with all the advantages which the banks would derive from their connection with the Government, as ought in fairness to be done, as the whole ultimately comes out of the pockets of the people.

In a single particular the banks have the advantage as fiscal agents. They would be the more convenient. To this they are entitled, and I wish to withhold from them no credit, which they may justly claim.

The Senator from Virginia (Mr. RIVES) appeared to have great apprehension, that the collection of the public dues in specie might lead to hoarding. He may dismiss his fears on that head. It is not the genius of modern and civilized Governments to hoard; and if it were, the banks will take care that there shall be no extraordinary accumulation of cash in the Treasury. Pass the bill, and I underwrite that we shall never again have to complain of a surplus. It would rarely, if ever, in peace and settled times, exceed three or four millions at the outside. Nor is his apprehension that hoarding of specie would lead to war, less groundless. The danger is in another quarter. War is the harvest of banks, when they are connected with Government. The vast increase of revenue and expenditures, and the enormous public loans, which necessarily enure mainly to their advantage, swell their profits in war to the utmost limits. But separate them from Government, and war would then be to them a state of famine, for reasons which must be apparent after what has been said, which would throw their weight on the side of peace and against war, just as certainly, as I have shown, that the separation would throw it on the side of tax-payers, and against the tax-consumers.

I come now to the comparison of the effects of the two measures on the currency of the country. In this respect the Senator from Virginia (Mr. RIVES) seemed to think that his substitute would have a great superiority over the bill; but his reasons were to me wholly unsatisfactory. If we are to judge from experience, it ought to be pronounced to be the worst possible measure. It has been in operation but twice (each for but a few years) since the commencement of the Government, and it has so happened, that the only two explosions of the currency occurred during these periods. But, without relying on these disastrous occurrences, we have seen enough to satisfy the most incredulous that there are great and radical defects in our bank circulation, which no remedy heretofore applied has been able to remove. It originates in the excess of paper, compared to specie, and the only effective cure is to increase the latter, and reduce the former; and this the substitute itself impliedly acknowledges, by proposing a remedy that would prove wholly inoperative. It proposes that, after a certain period mentioned, none of the banks to be selected should issue notes under ten dollars. The effects would clearly be, not a diminution of the circulation of small notes, but a new division of the banking business, in which the issue of large notes would fall to the lot of the selected banks and the small to the others, without restricting, in the least, the aggregate amount of paper circulation.

But what the substitute would fail to do, the bill would effectually remedy. None doubt but the separation from the banks would greatly increase the proportion of specie to paper; but the Senator from Virginia (Mr. RIVES) apprehends, that its operation would be too powerful; so much so, in fact, as to destroy the banks. His argument is, that specie would be always at a premium, and that it would be impossible for the banks to do business, so long as that was the case. His fears are groundless. What he dreads would be but a temporary evil. The very fact that specie would bear a premium would have the double effect to diminish paper circulation, and increase the importation of specie, till an equilibrium between the two would be restored, when they would be at par. At what point this would be effected, is a little uncertain; but the fear is, that with our decreasing revenue, instead of the specie being increased to excess, it would not be increased sufficiently to give the desired stability to the currency.

In this connection, the Senator urged an objection against the bill, which I regard as wholly groundless. He said, that the payment of the dues of the Government in specie, would create a double demand; a domestic, as well as a foreign; the effects of which would be to increase greatly its fluctuations; and so deeply was he impressed with the idea, that he drew a vivid picture of its alternate flow from the coast to the interior, and from North to South, and back again. All this is the work of imagination. The effect would be directly the reverse. The more numerous the demands, the less the fluctuation; so much so, that the greatest stability would be where it exclusively performed the function of circulation, and where each individual must keep a portion to meet his daily demands. This is so obvious, that I shall not undertake to illustrate it.

But the superiority of the bill over the substitute would not be limited only to a more favorable proportion between specie and paper. It would have another important advantage that cannot be well over estimated: it would make a practical distinction between currency and circulation, between the currency of the country and private and local circulation, under which head bank paper would be comprehended. The effects would be, to render a general explosion of the circulation almost impossible. Whatever derangements might occur, would be local, and confined to some one particular commercial sphere; and even within its limits, there would be a sound currency to fall back on, not partaking of the shock, and which would greatly diminish the intensity and duration of the distress. In the mean time, the general business and finances of the country would proceed, almost without feeling the derangement.

With a few remarks on the comparative effects of the two measures on the industry and business of the country, I shall conclude their comparison. What has been said on their relative effects on the currency, goes far to decide the question of their relative effects on business and industry.

I hold a sound and stable currency to be among the greatest encouragements to industry and business generally; and an unsound and fluctuating one, now expanding and now contracting, so that no honest man tell what to do, as among the greatest discouragements. The dollar and the eagle are the measure of value, as the yard and the bushel are of quantity; and what would we think of the incorporation of companies to regulate the latter—to expand or contract, or shorten or lengthen them at pleasure, with the privilege to sell by the contracted or shortened, and buy by the expanded or lengthened? Is it not seen that it would place the whole industry and business of the country under the control of such companies? But it would not more certainly effect it, than a similar control possessed by the money institutions of the country, over the measure of value. But I go further, and assert confidently, that the excess of paper currency, as well as its unsteadiness, is unfavorable to the industry and business of the country. It raises the price of every thing, and consequently increases the price of production and consumption; and is, in the end, hostile to every branch of industry.

I hold that specie and paper have each their proper sphere; the latter for large and distant transactions, and the former for all others; and that the nearer our circulation approaches gold and silver, consistently with convenience, the better for the industry and the business of the country. The more specie the better, till that point is reached. When attained, it would combine in the greatest possible degree, soundness, and facility, and would be favorable to the productive classes universally; I mean men of business, planters, merchants, and manufacturers, as well as operatives. It would be particularly favorable to the South. Our great staples are cash articles every where; and it was well remarked by the Senator from Mississippi, (Mr. WALKER,) at the extra session, that we sold at cash prices, and bought at paper prices; that is, sold low and bought high. The manufacturing, commercial, and navigating interests would also feel its beneficial effects. It would cheapen productions and be to manufacturers in lieu of a protective tariff. Its effects would be to enable them to meet foreign competition, not by raising prices by high duties, but by enabling them to sell as cheap or cheaper than the foreigner, which would harmonise every interest, and place our manufactures on the most solid basis. It is the only mode by which the foreign market can ever be commanded; and commanded it would be, with a sound and moderately expanded currency. Our ingenuity, invention, and industry are equal to any people; and all our manufacturers want, is a sound currency and an even chance, to meet competition with success any where, at home or abroad. But with a bloated and fluctuating paper circulation, this will be impossible. Among its many drawbacks, it levies an enormous tax on the community.

I have already stated, that the community is estimated to have been indebted to the banks $475,000,000 at the suspension of specie payments. The interest on this sum, estimated at six per cent. (it ought to be higher,) would give an annual income to those institutions of upwards of thirty millions; and this is the sum yearly paid by the community for bank accommodations, to the excess of which we owe our bloated and unstable circulation. Never was a circulation so worthless, furnished at so dear a rate. How much of this vast income may be considered as interest on real capital, it is difficult to estimate; but it would, I suppose, be ample to set down ten millions to that head, which would leave upwards of twenty millions annually, as the profits derived from banking privileges over and above a fair compensation for the capital invested, which some body must pay, and which must ultimately fall on the industry and business of the country. But this enormous expansion of the system is not astonishing, so great is the stimulus applied to its growth. Ingenious men of other ages devoted themselves in vain to discover the art of converting the baser metals into gold and silver; but we have conferred on a portion of the community an art still higher—of converting paper, to all intents and purposes, into the precious metals; and ought we to be surprised, that an article so cheap to the manufacturers, and so dear to the rest of the community, should be so greatly over supplied, and without any reference to the interest or to the wants of the community?

If we are to believe the Senator from Virginia, and others of the same side, we owe almost all our improvements and prosperity to the banking system; and if it should fail, the age of barbarism would again return. I had supposed that the bases of our prosperity were our free institutions; the wide-spread and fertile region we occupy, and the hereditary intelligence and energy of the stock from which we are descended; but it seems that all these go for nothing, and that the banks are every thing. I make no war on them. All I insist on is, that the Government shall separate from them, which I believe to be indispensable, for the reasons I have assigned, both now and formerly. But I cannot concur in attributing to them our improvements and prosperity. That they contributed to give a strong impulse to industry and enterprise in the early stages of their operation, I doubt not. Nothing is more stimulating than an expanding and depreciating currency. It creates a delusive appearance of prosperity, which puts every thing in motion. Every one feels as if he was growing richer, as prices rise, and that he has it in his power, by foresight and exertion, to make his fortune. But it is the nature of stimulus, moral as well as physical, to excite at first, and to depress afterwards. The draft which at first causes unnatural excitement and energy is sure to terminate in corresponding depression and weakness; nor is it less certain that the stimulus of a currency, expanding beyond its proper limits, follows the same law. We have had the exhilaration, and the depression has succeeded. We have had the pleasure of getting drunk, and now experience the pain of becoming sober. The good is gone and the evil has succeeded; and on a fair calculation, the latter will be found to be greater than the former. Whatever impulse the banking system was calculated to give to our improvement and prosperity, has already been given; and the reverse effects will hereafter follow, unless the system should undergo great and radical changes; the first step towards which, would be the adoption of the measure proposed by this bill.

I have, Mr. President, finished what I intended to say. I have long anticipated the present crisis, but did not expect its arrival in my time. When I saw its approach, I resolved to do my duty, be the consequences to me what they might; and I offer my thanks to the Author of my being, that he has given me the resolution and opportunity to discharge what I honestly believe to be that duty on this great subject.

How the question will be decided, is acknowledged to be doubtful, so nearly are the two Houses supposed to be divided; but whatever may be its fate now, I have the most perfect confidence in its final triumph. The public attention is roused. The subject will be thoroughly investigated, and I have no fears but the side I support, will prove to be the side of truth, justice, liberty, civilization, and moral and intellectua lexcellence.

THE NEUTRALITY BILL.

REMARKS OF MR. LOOMIS,

OF NEW YORK,

In the House of Representatives, Feb. 16, 1838—On the bill to maintain our neutrality with conterminous countries.

Mr. LOOMIS said that it was with much reluctance he felt himself compelled, under existing circumstances, to offer an important amendment to the bill. He would propose a substitute for the whole bill.

The SPEAKER remarked that it was not at this time in order to propose an amendment, as that reported by the Committee on Foreign Affairs was now pending.

Mr. LOOMIS said that he would offer it when in order. In the mean time, he would briefly submit his views upon the bill as it stood before the House. He was fully sensible of the necessity of the immediate action of Congress upon the subject, and he regretted that a sense of duty compelled him so essentially to differ from the highly respectable committee who had reported this bill, as to place himself in this attitude. He was not opposed to the principle that seemed to lie at the foundation of the bill. The prevention of our citizens from improperly interfering to excite or carry on insurrection in foreign States with whom we are at peace, and to whom we owe all the duties and rights of a friendly power. In this principle, and in its general application, therefore, he fully agreed with the chairman of the Committee on Foreign Relations in the remarks he had submitted; but the manner in which the committee had proposed to carry out their views was, in his judgment, liable o serious, if not insuperable, objections. He could not bring himself to assent to it.

The circumstances, said Mr. L. which have given rise to this bill—the disturbances on our Canadian frontier—are of a peculiar character, and warrant, nay, they require, the prompt and efficient action of this Government. There is a long line of frontier separating the two countries from each other, yet placing so narrow a barrier between them as to render it impossible that local disturbances breaking out on one side should not affect the minds of inhabitants on the other. There were several hundred miles in extent of an inhabited country, divided in some places only by an imaginary line, in others by rivers and by navigable lakes. The people of the two sides were in the habit of constant and friendly intercourse with each other, and were bound together by the ties of neighborhood, and intermingled in the social relations of life. When the inhabitants of Canada complain of infringement by their Government upon their political rights, and feel, or imagine they feel, oppression and tyranny, they touch a point upon which their American neighbors are peculiarly sensitive, and upon which their sympathies are readily aroused. The native love of liberty and the deep-rooted hatred of tyranny, which characterize American citizens, were easily excited to inflammation whenever an appeal was made to them involving those noble principles. Thus it was that, in a controversy between the Canadians and their Government of that character, our citizens throughout the whole of that extended frontier were easily led to take a deep interest; and, unless their impulses were restrained, would heartily embark on the side of the liberals in those struggles. Abstractedly taken, he would not wish to check those generous sympathies; he would do nothing to deaden or discourage the feelings which emanated from the innate love of freedom, nothing to extinguish the bright spark of liberty which glows in the heart of every true American citizen; yet something we must remember is due to national right and national obligation. We owe it to the well known prudential policy of this Government ever since its existence as a nation, to avoid entanglement in the quarrels and controversies of other nations, and we certainly owe something also to the spirit of friendship and good will which exists between this country and Great Britain, and which it is the duty, as well as the mutual interest, of both powers to continue. For the preservation of these, said Mr. L. I am willing to do every thing which ought to be done, but I insist that whatever restraint we impose upon our citizens should be done agreeably to well established principles of law.

There are several serious objections in my mind to the present bill, and as it came from the Senate. In the first place, it is inefficient to answer the end designed. In what manner does it propose to suppress the improper interference of our citizens in the controversy of their neighbors? By giving to the United States marshals and their deputies, and to all the officers connected with custom-houses, and others, power to seize without process of law, or any other limitation than their own individual discretion, any vessel or vehicle, arms, or munitions of war, which they may suspect are about being taken into a conterminous country, to be used in hostilities to be carried on there, and to detain them until satisfactory security should be given that they should not be so used. Assuming that each of the several officers in whom it was proposed to vest this extraordinary power would act discreetly, suppose one of them, in the exercise of his duty, to have seized property which he had rightly judged was about to be used in violation of the intention of the law, assuming also that he would fairly estimate its value, and that he also should judge properly in reference to the sufficiency of the sureties offered, and that he had skill to frame the proper bond to be taken. The bond is executed. What, then, is to hinder the owner or possessor from marching right along with his bonded property over the line into the adjoining country, in the very face and eyes of the officers of Government? Who can prevent him? He has complied with the law. What is to become of the bond? The officer taking it is not required to deposite it with any law officer, nor to make any report; his duty has been accomplished by taking the bond; he has nothing to do with its violation; but should the bond, by good fortune, find its way into the hands of the district attorney, how is he to know whether the obligation has been violated, the bond broken? or, if informed, how is he to prove that the property has been used contrary to the conditions of the bond? Does his jurisdiction extend to the only place where these facts can be ascertained, beyond the line? Can he obtain witnesses from the camp of one of the belligerents, identifying the very articles specified in the bond, and prove that they have been used in carrying on hostilities? No, sir; he would not be able to make the requisite proof in one case in ten. In a large proportion of the cases, the owner would probably get his goods over without subjecting himself to give a bond; and he would feel secure, that even if they were seized, and a bond required, there would be no difficulty in procuring it when the strong feeling of sympathy prevails, as it does on that frontier, and little or no danger of being convicted for its breach. He would be conscious of violating no law, if he escaped the seizure of his goods; and if seized, he would feel that he had satisfied the penalty of the law by giving a bond which could not be enforced.

There is another very serious objection to the bill. It vests unusual and dangerous powers in the numerous officers to whom its execution is entrusted. This feature is in violation of the whole policy of our laws, and, he felt constrained to say, against the Constitution itself. It proposes to give to executive officers discretionary powers of a judicial character, unparalleled in extent by any ever vested in that class of officers. The same individual who is to make the seizure, is made the judge of the exigency of the case authorizing it. His discretion is unlimited and without restraint. He is to judge, of his own knowledge, or otherwise, as he best may, whether it is "probable that the vessel or vehicle, arms or munitions, are intended to be employed in carrying on hostilities." These are the words of the bill; he is required to make no report, to keep no record or minutes, to render no account; and acting judicially, he is not responsible to any body, or in any form, for any error in judgment, however gross; nor is there any appeal from his judgment. The same individual judges of the probability, makes the seizure, and holds the property; he judges of its value, and of the sufficiency of the surety; he may fix the value at nearly nothing, so as to cover the free passage of the property, as having been bonded; or he may make it so exorbitant as to be oppressive and amount to a prohibition. What could prevent any one of the numerous officers named in the bill, in the exercise of his combined judicial and executive powers, from stopping any citizen riding along in his carriage on the highway on that frontier, ay, or in this very city, and saying, "I arrest this carriage as a vehicle contemplated by this law?" Who could restrain him? The presumption is, that the officer will do his simple duty; but such a law as this would throw in his way a strong temptation to pervert it to his own purposes.

The rights of our citizens to bear arms, guaranteed to them by the Constitution, is liable to be somewhat encroached upon, if it may not be absolutely violated, by the powers and duties vested by this bill in these officers.

But there was another clause of the Constitution with which it appeard to him the provisions of this bill came in direct conflict. The fourth article of the amendment of the Constitution provides that—

"The right of the people to be secure in their persons, houses, papers, and effects against unreasonable searches and seizures, shall not be violated; and no warrant shall issue, but upon probable cause, supported by oath or affirmation, and particularly describing the place to be searched, and the person or things to be seized."

The fifth section provides that no person shall "be deprived of life, liberty, or property, without due process of law."

Sir, said Mr. L. does not this bill propose to vest in Executive officers, the power to deprive persons of property, without due process of law. They are authorized and required to seize the acknowledged property of individuals, without any process, to do it at discretion, to act as judges of the necessity, and then to execute. The great principle of protection to private rights, which the Constitution intended to secure by requiring proof on oath or affirmation of the facts and circumstances, before a judicial tribunal, and process of law, in order to justify a seizure, is directly violated. Will it be said that it does not contemplate to deprive the individual of his ultimate right or legal estate in the property; that he may, on certain conditions, have it restored to him? Sir, the right of possession and use, is property; the only end and object of the ownership of chattels, is that the owner may enjoy their use. The right of possession is as much property as the right to the fee itself.

The object of the bill was preventive. It was intended evidently to prevent the commission of certain acts, which, in the judgment of the committee, were in violation of our national obligations. The possession of the means, connected with the unlawful intent, constituted the case which the committee intended to reach. The only, or the best mode to accomplish this object, was to pursue the same mode as that which had long prevailed in all similar cases—as in the case of persons having in possession implements for making counterfeit money, with intent to use them for that purpose. In that case, the possession of such implements, or of the counterfeit money itself, afforded evidence, to some extent, of the unlawful intent, because such possession was unusual, and, in general, unnecessary, except to accomplish the unlawful act; but in this case the possession of arms affords no such presumption; our Constitution and laws presume that every citizen has arms and munitions of war; hence there was much more need in this than in ordinary cases to have proof made, showing the "facts and circumstances"—some overt act from which unlawful intent could be inferred. And what is still more singular is, that the bill does not make the act unlawful for the imputed intention of doing which the citizen is made liable to have his property seized, and is held to give bonds and sureties. Any one may lawfully have in possession the articles enumerated, with the intent to use them in the manner described. He may carry that intent into effect and be conscious of violating no law of his country, and subject to no punishment. And yet certain officers are required to seize that property, if they think it probable he intends to use it in that manner.

The bill departs from the ordinary and well-tried usages of penal jurisprudence. Those usages have the advantage of long experience;—they have been moulded to utility and safety by the judgments of courts and the learning of counsel It seems to me, said Mr. L. that in order to carry out the recommendation of the President with prudence and safety, and effectually, the act should first make it an offence to procure the arms, &c. with the intent to make that use of them which its object is to prohibit, and should attach a proper penalty for that offence. The individual offending would then be subject to be arrested for violating a penal statute, under ordinary process of law. And the act might then, with much propriety, for greater safety, and as an additional penalty, authorize the seizure of the property thus intended to be applied to unlawful purposes. But, even then, it must be done under judicial process. Such a law, he could not doubt, would prove a far more effectual preventive measure than the present bill, by exposing its violator to the arrest of his person as an offender, and exposing him to pains and penalties, as well as the seizure of his property, while it would preserve the constitutional rights of the citizen, and conform to the established usage of our civil jurisprudence.

The third section of the bill presented another feature, which was also liable to the most serious objections. That section made it the duty of the numerous officers designated in it to seize the arms of any body of armed men who should come within our limits and jurisdiction, and who had been engaged in carrying on hostilities against any conterminous country with which we are at peace. This section is too extensive in its application. Instead of securing us against being involved in foreign quarrels, its literal execution would, in some cases, lead us into them. He would suppose a case, to illustrate this view of its application. Suppose a war should exist between the English Government and some other foreign power, (say Russia, or any other European nation,) and a national ship of the latter, which had been engaged in that war, should put into the port of New York. This Government is certainly bound, by the laws of nations, to protect that vessel and its armament, while lying in our port, even as against its enemies. It has a right to lie safely in our harbor as a place of refuge. The Government of England has territory conterminous with the United States; and the ship contains a body of armed men, who have been actually engaged in carrying on hostilities against a conterminous country with which we are at peace. By the provisions of this third section, it would be the duty of the several officers named to seize upon the arms of this "body of armed men," and detain them until they should enter into bond not to use them in the very manner their duty required of them. This clearly was too palpable a violation of the laws of nations and the rights of belligerents, to have been intended by the framers of this bill; and yet there does not appear to be any escape from that construction of it as it reads.

Mr. L. said he regretted extremely that he had felt himself compelled by a sense of duty to place himself in the attitude, he had done with respect to this bill. He had avowed himself friendly to the proposition to do our whole duty in preventing our over-zealous citizens from embroiling our frontier in hostilities, and endangering the peace of the country; and he was not disposed to be tenacious of any opinions he might have as to the extent of the preventive interference of the Government, and in the amendments which had been printed by the courtesy of the House, and which, when in order, he should offer, he had endeavored to follow the bill in its description of the acts to be prohibited; he had not felt at liberty in this stage of the business to depart from the expressed judgment of the committee, and of the Senate on that point; but reserved to himself a common right with others to act in that respect as they should on further consideration deem proper. He had merely endeavored to mould their views into a form to obviate his constitutional objections, and to conform it to the ordinary rules and practice of penal legislation.

NORTHEASTERN BOUNDARY.

SPEECH OF MR. FAIRFIELD,

OF MAINE.

In the House of Representatives, March 8, 1838—Upon the subject of the Northeastern Boundary.

Mr. FAIRFIELD addressed the House as follows:

Mr. SPEAKER: I am in favor of the bill which my colleague [Mr. EVANS] proposes to introduce. What is it, sir? Why, it simply provides that the President cause the Northeastern boundary line of the United States "to be accurately surveyed and marked, and suitable monuments to be erected thereon, at such points as may be deemed necessary and important." And it is a measure so just and reasonable in itself, and so imperatively demanded by the circumstances of the case, that I trust no member in this House will feel a disposition to oppose it.

In Maine, there is but one feeling upon this subject. That State, sir, feels that she has suffered deep and enduring wrongs at the hands of the British Government. She knows that she has been illegally and unjustly deprived of the property and jurisdiction in a portion of her territory; that the valuable timber upon that territory has been the subject of plunder and waste; that her citizens have been seized and imprisoned in foreign jails, without law and without right; and that the nation guilty of these multiplied and gross outrages not only denies redress, but refuses even to agree upon a mode by which the legality of her acts can be tried, and an amicable adjustment of the difficulties can be effected. That State also feels that "she has not been treated by the General Government as she has endeavored to deserve;" though, in her complaints upon this subject, she goes a little farther back than my colleague found it for his purpose to go.

This, sir, is no party question in Maine. It is true, there have been several attempts to make it a party question; but these attempts have always proved abortive. And this bill, introduced by my colleague, was agreed upon by the delegation from Maine without regard to politics or party, and is introduced in pursuance of an arrangement between them. It was with extreme regret, therefore, that I found my colleague disposed to make it the basis of an attack upon the Administration—to mingle it with party politics, and, perhaps, to send a speech home, to co-operate with similar efforts making there. Sir, I think no good can come of this course in any way; and I regret exceedingly that it should have been thought wise to adopt it. But this regret, great as it was, did not exceed my surprise and astonishment at hearing him eulogise the Administration of 1825, while condemning, in severe terms, the succeeding one, in reference to their respective action upon this subject. The first, it is said, nobly asserted and maintained our rights; while the other, by concessions, frittered away, and finally abandoned them. Sir, I think this declaration will be received with some surprise at home, too; for the general opinion there, as I have supposed, has always been directly the reverse of this. And, as the door to this investigation has been opened, I trust I shall be pardoned for walking in, and asking the House to go back with me to a period somewhat beyond that, to which it seemed to be convenient for my colleague to extend his inquiries. I will then endeavor to show, that Maine has been exceedingly ill treated, not only by the British Government, but by our own Government, and by that Administration, too, which has received the warm encomiums of my colleague.

In doing this, I beg the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. ADAMS] to believe that it will not be from any feelings of personal unkindness or disrespect to him. I shall refer to his acts, merely as a part of the history of the case, and only because I feel compelled to it, by the course of my colleague upon this subject. Besides, if I succeed in my attempt, it will afford an additional reason for the passage of the bill; for, corresponding with the extent of wrongs suffered by Maine, will be the measure of her right to redress. If she has been doubly wronged, then is she doubly entitled to relief.

Sir, if I have not totally misapprehended the history of this matter, almost every step in the progress of the case, taken by the Administration alluded to, was adverse to the interests and wishes of Maine, and, in most instances, against her solemn protest. That Administration did little or nothing to protect our rights and interests, but every thing to put them in jeopardy.

Of our long list of complaints, let me call the attention of the House to a few prominent ones. In the treaty of Ghent it was provided that commissioners should be appointed to ascertain that point in the highlands lying due north from the source of the St. Croix, constituting the northwest angle of Nova Scotia, and to survey the line extending from the source of the St. Croix to the highlands, and along the highlands to the northwesternmost head of Connecticut river. These commissioners having been appointed in conformity with the treaty, extended their official labors through a period of about five years, without being able to agree, and closed their commission by making reports to their respective Governments. In the progress of the case, a vast number of documents relating to it were collected, which, with the statements or argument of the commissioner, were deposited here in the national archives. Copies of these documents Maine was exceedingly anxious to obtain; and, as early as 1826, moved in the matter, by the Legislature authorizing the Governor to procure them, and at the same time making an appropriation of $500 to defray the expense of it, should there be any. And will it be believed, sir, that our Governor persevered in his efforts for a period of over two and a half years before he succeeded in obtaining them? His requests were presented in a variety of forms, and pressed with that earnestness and force which ever characterized his efforts in the public service. I refer to the "lamented Lincoln," the brother of the honorable gentleman from Massachusetts sitting near me. But notwithstanding the importance of the subject, and our deep interest in these documents, especially at the time they were called for; notwithstanding the offer to pay all the expense attending a compliance with our request; and notwithstanding the Governor proposed to receive them as confidential, if it should be requested, still Mr. Clay, then Secretary of State, pertinaciously refused to furnish them, or have them furnished!

May 29, 1827, the Governor, having discontinued his unsuccessful efforts with the Secretary of State, addressed himself directly to the President. In answer to this call, in October following, the copies were furnished; two and a half years having been spent in the accomplishment of that desirable object. In support of these statements, I beg leave to refer to documents now before me. Governor

Lincoln, in his message to the Legislature, January, 1827, says:

"My immediate predecessor [Governor Parris] has solicited the documents contemplated by a resolve of a former Legislature, relative to our boundary; and I cannot but hope that the person applied to will find the obligations of his situation so modified, as to admit his furnishing the proper officers of this State that information, by which it may be prepared to judge correctly of the rights of the Union, and of a foreign nation, in connection with that independent right which it ought to maintain, so far as the prudent application of all its justifiable means will permit."

At the same session of the Legislature, a resolve was proposed by a political friend of my colleague, [Mr. Deane.] The following is an extract:

"By a resolve of the Legislature of this State, passed January 26, 1826, the Governor of this State was authorized and requested to take such measures as he might think expedient and effectual, to procure for the use of the State certain copies and documents, etc. mentioned in said resolve. The Governor, having done all in his power to procure the information alluded to in said resolve, but his efforts not having been successful, your committee are of opinion that the interests of the State may be advanced by a renewal of the request to the Government of the United States."

Subsequently to this, viz: April 18, 1827, Governor Lincoln, in a letter to Mr. Clay, uses the following language upon this subject:

"It was with much regret, not unmingled with mortification, that I considered your denial of the use of the reports and arguments of the commissioners under the treaty of Ghent."

Again: in the same letter he adds:

"With this spirit of forbearance, she has sought information only as to an interest vital to herself, as well as important to the country, without any purpose calculated to excite distrust, with only such patriotic views as have rendered the refusal to comply with her request a subject of that species of surprise which a friend predetermined to take no offence feels, when he is not treated with correspondent confidence."

And again:

"As a free, sovereign, and independent Republic, may we not be permitted to have communication with the authorities of the Union; or do they mean that we shall submit implicitly to their direction, however wise it may be, at the same time that they declare their conviction of the propriety of withholding information? The general concerns of the Union are, of course, communicated only to the whole; but that which relates to a particular community, when its daily intercourse demands information, seems to warrant the request I have made, and which I am reluctantly impelled to renew, with this modification, that any communication made in return will be received, if so required, subject to a restriction on publicity, beyond a communication to the Legislature, in the usual terms of confidential communications."

In a letter to the President, dated May 29, 1827, he says:

"However discouraging may have been the correspondence I have had with the Secretary of State, I cannot decline a course deliberately determined upon, or admit the belief that a representation relating to the welfare of Maine can be unwelcome."

At the session of the Legislature of Maine, January, 1828, a report was made upon the subject of the boundary, by a political friend of the then National Administration. From that I extract the following:

"The delay to give information to the State of Maine, when it had been so often requested"—"is certainly very extraordinary."

Upon this point I have no more to say. The facts speak for themselves, and can be appreciated by the House without multiplying words on my part.

Again: Maine assumed the position that the General Government had no constitutional authority to cede any portion of her territory, either by a direct delegation of power in the Constitution, or indirectly under the treaty making power, by way of arbitration, or otherwise. This, or rather the latter branch of the proposition, was virtually denied by that Administration. The entire correctness of our positions, however, have been again and again admitted by the two succeeding Administrations; yet my colleague commends the first and condemns the last!

The Administration of that day, claimed the power to submit the question of boundary to the entire "exclusion" of Maine, even though it should involve a dismemberment of our territory, considering it as a national question merely, and regarding the efforts of Maine to present her views upon the subject to the Executive, as "obtrusive."

In connection with these remarks, I beg leave to refer to the letter of Governor Lincoln to the President of the United States, dated May 29, 1827. He says:

"Having learned that the title thereto [the disputed territory] is involved in the details of a diplomatic arrangement, conducted under the sanction of the Executive Department of the Federal Government, Maine, although not consulted, yet bound from deference to pay a due respect to reasons, the nature and force of which she is, from a studious and mysterious reserve, rendered unable to comprehend, believes that she ought to present her expostulations in regard to any measures threatening her with injury."

Again, in the same letter, he adds:

"It is not controverted that the control of our foreign relations belongs to the United States as to objects which have arisen under the Constitution or existing laws; but in regard to rights acquired by an independent party, and interests in property vested by acts anterior to the existence of that compact, the interposition of the Federal Executive, without an express grant of power, seems to be gratuitous. No statesman will assert that the treaty making power is competent to an act transcending the scope of the combined trusts of the Government."

In a letter to Mr. Clay, bearing date November 16, 1827, Gov. Lincoln says further:

"I have also this day received your communication of the 10th instant. From its contents, I am made sensible that the objection I have had the honor to urge against the submission to a foreign umpire of the territorial and jurisdictional rights of Maine, without consulting or advising her as to the conditions, have not been deemed available. If any injury shall result to her, the appeal will be made to the people of this country and to posterity. It has not seemed arrogant or presumptuous to have expected a recognition of her rights, and to have asked, that, if she is to be made a sacrifice, she might not be devoted without some consideration on her part of the terms. * * * When you cautioned us against suggestions of compromise and acts of precaution, it was not believed that it was that you might the more easily throw us within the power of an umpire, but that you intended to intimate that the powerful arm of the Federal Government was holding its ample shield before us. At last we learn that our strength, security, and wealth are to be subjected to the mercy of a foreign individual, who, it has been said by your minister, 'rarely decides upon strict principles of law,' and 'has always a bias to try, if possible, to split the difference.' I cannot but yield to the impulse of saying, most respectfully, that Maine has not been treated as she has endeavored to deserve."

In a letter from Gov. Lincoln to Mr. Clay, written April 18, 1827, he says:

"Anxious, as in my situation I cannot avoid being, for the preservation during my continuance in office, and always after, of the rights of the State, I must express my alarm at a portion of Mr. Gallatin's letter. He says: 'An umpire, whether a king or a farmer, rarely decides on strict principles of law; he has always a bias to try, if possible, to split the difference.' And yet, I am informed that there has been in progress an arrangement of the preliminary points for constituting such an umpire. I cannot but hope that no arrangement will be effected, which will endanger the half from the mere circumstance of a wrongful claim to the whole, under the pitiful weakness which is liable to split the difference between right and wrong."

Again, in his letter to the President of the 29th of May, 1827, he says:

"The treaty making power of the United States on one side, and his Britannic Majesty on the other, agree to consider the decision of the arbitration final and conclusive. Let me say that, to a surrender of territory involved as a possibility, it will, I trust, be made evident that there is another party not to be an indifferent spectator of its own delaceration. The mind, in contemplating our prospects, is carried to the courts of Europe, and led to scan the tribunals to which you may refer this subject. It would be unsuitable for me to comment on the dispositions or talents of foreign sovereigns or States; but it is not in cold blood that I can anticipate the committing the destinies of Maine to an irresponsible arbiter, to be found in a distant land, and necessarily unqualified to act in the case. The character of this arbitership has been portentously exhibited by Mr. Gallatin. Suffice it to say, that the proposed arbitration will jeopardise, without her consent, and against her will, the rights of Maine. * * * Maine, now standing in the place of her parent republic, (Massachusetts) may deem the fifth article of the treaty of Ghent as having led to a course endangering her rights, and rendered more painful and alarming by her exclusion from a proper intercommunication and legitimate consideration as a party in the case."

Again, he says:

"Whatever character appertained to the confederation, or to those who entered into that holy league, it is manifest that the States were not identified and confounded with the Union, in relation to the questions here presented, under the original treaty of peace and limits. I must therefore respectfully urge, that, however the policy and principles of the Executive department of the Federal Government may dictate the imposition upon Maine of silence and forbearance, and however plainly may be indicated the disposition to treat the subject as if merely national, she will not observe any procedure by the United States and Great Britain for the severance of her territory and the abrogation of her authority, without a sensibility too serious to be passive."

Once more:

"It has been urged that this concern is so exclusively national that Maine is obtrusive in presenting her views to the consideration of the Executive. It is nevertheless believed," &c.

In the same document from which I have been reading, I find a letter from the Lieutenant Governor of New Brunswick to Governor Lincoln, dated November 15, 1827, to a paragraph of which I wish to call your attention. It seems that a citizen of Maine had been seized on the disputed territory by the provincial authorities, and imprisoned in the jail at Fredericton. Gov. Lincoln addressed a letter to "his Majesty's Lieutenant Governor," asking him to communicate the circumstances of the arrest. His Majesty's Lieutenant Governor replies as follows:

"It is not for me to question the propriety of your Excellency's opening a correspondence with the Government of this province, on a question now pending in negotiation between his Majesty's Government and the Government of the United States, as contracted under the treaty of Ghent; but it would neither be consistent with my sense of duty, nor in conformity with my instructions, to give the explanations your Excellency requests, to any persons excepting those with whom I am directed to correspond, or under whose orders I am placed. Should any reference be made by the General Government of the United States," &c.

Here we see the unfortunate and humiliating condition in which Maine was placed. A foreign Government had seized and imprisoned her citizens, and when asked merely to communicate the circumstances of the arrest, turns up its aristocratic nose, and says it is not consistent with its sense of duty so to do. To the General Government it is willing to communicate. When we call upon the General Government for information, there too, we are repulsed: papers in which Maine is deeply and peculiarly interested, are locked up in the national archives, and she is not only denied copies of them, but her efforts are regarded as very obtrusive. Again: on the one hand, the British Government had unjustly wrested from Maine a portion of her territory; and on the other, the General Government was upon the eve of submitting to a foreign arbitrator the question in effect, whether the British Government should keep the whole, or only half of what it had thus unjustly taken! Thus was Maine bound hand and foot, and made ready for the sacrifice. Really, if Maine is under great obligations to that Administration for its efforts in her behalf, I confess myself totally unable to see or comprehend them. In relation to this matter, however, I suppose my colleague's political optics are some what kneener than my own.

But the case was finally submitted, and that, too, under the implied power, so far as our Secretary of State and his Minister had power to confer it, of splitting the difference. This was most manifestly a fair subject of complaint on the part of Maine, because it was entirely gratuitous and uncalled for on the part of the Minister and Secretary. The written terms of the submission were, upon this point, perhaps well enough. Why then make declarations inconsistent with these written stipulations, calculated to lead the arbitrator to an exercise of power, not strictly granted, and adversely to our interests? I am unwilling to believe tha it arose from any really settled feelings of hostility to Maine, and her then political Government. The letter of Mr. Gallatin has already been referred to, in which he says, that "an umpire, whether a king or a farmer rarely decides on strict principles of law; he has always a bias to try, if possible to split the difference." The correctness of this position was subsequently recognised and confirmed by Mr. Clay. In his letter to Governor Lincoln, of November 27, 1827, in reply to some objections which had been urged against the submission to arbitration, he says: "It is true, that it (arbitration) is a mode not free from all objections, and Mr. Gallatin has adverted to one, in the extract which you give from one of his letters." And this, too, was after the convention was entered into at London, prescribing the terms of the submission, that having been done, September 29, 1827. After, then, it had been solemnly agreed, that the arbiter should decide the question of boundary upon strict principles of law, that is, according to the terms of the treaty of 1783, and not under the influence of that "pitiful weakness" which "splits the difference between right and wrong," we find our Secretary of State admitting the latter as a valid, though not insuperable objection to arbitration. And here, I think, we may date most of the unfortunate difficulties that have since grown out of this case. If it had not been for these unfortunate expressions of our Minister and Secretary of State, would the umpire ever have thought of travelling out of the plain letter of his commission, for the purpose of splitting the difference between right and wrong? I think not. And the extent of their influence since, with the British Government, in protracting the settlement of this question, no man can calculate.

But again: Maine had not only just grounds of complaint, for submitting the question under the circumstances in which it was submitted, but of the selection of the umpire himself. I will not say it was the worst possible selection that could have been made, but I may say, that there were many and, to my mind, insuperable objections to him. He was, in the first place, under great obligations to England. He owed her a debt of gratitude, which, I suppose he would have been happy of an opportunity to pay. At the Congress of Vienna, in 1815, Holland and Belgium were united and made one kingdom, under the name of "The Netherlands;" and, a few months afterwards, William was crowned King, with the title of "King of the Netherlands." England, it is well known, had an overpowering influence in that Congress, and contributed more to the result of a union of Holland and Belgium than all the other members combined. And to England, more than to any other nation, was King William to look to sustain him in the position in which he had been placed. Whether in consequence of all this, his subjection to British influence was more than it ought to be, I will not undertake to say; but it is a fact, that at one time he was called, by his own subjects, "Le Prefect d'Angleterre"—the Prefect of England.

But more than this, he was a member of the "Holy Alliance"—one of the band of conspirators against the rights of man. Cherishing the most deadly hostility to liberal principles, how could he be expected to feel any particular partiality or favor for a nation that was doing more to disseminate these principles than any other nation in the world?

His hostility to liberal principles was fully shown by the tyranny which he exercised upon his own subjects. In the first place, he abolished the right of trial by jury—"that bulwark of liberty, and best safeguard of private rights." He then destroyed the freedom of the press, and imposed punishments for libels upon the Government, from one year's imprisonment to death. He decreed that the French language should no longer be the national language in Belgium. "The Belgians were to unlearn their mother tongue, and frame their organs and those of their children to the use of the Dutch." No man was allowed to advocate a cause in the courts, except in Dutch. No man could devise property, except in a language every word of which required to be translated. And no man was admitted to office, until he had served an apprenticeship to the Dutch language.

Such tyranny can only be equalled by another act of the same king, which was this: On the adoption of the constitution presented by himself to the notables, he declared 527 votes to be a majority of 1,523, on the ground that some of the notables voted from religious scruples! The historian denounces this act, as well he might, "a barefaced outrage on common sense and equity." And this is the man—a member of the Holy Alliance, executing its tyrannical principles upon his own subjects—indebted to England for his crown, and naturally opposed to the United States as the friends and disseminators of free principles; this is the man who was selected to arbitrate upon the rights of property and sovereignty of Maine, when they had been assailed by Great Britain! Verily, if here is cause for gratitude on the part of Maine, I will leave it for the particular friends of that Administration to discover.

But again: Maine had just cause of complaint, that the case was not taken from him, when he ceased to be, what he was when the case was referred, viz: king of the Netherlands. In 1830, his tyrannical oppression of his own subjects caused a revolution, which, we all know, resulted in the independence of Belgium. So that, while he retained the empty title of the king of the Netherlands, he was, in fact, only king of Holland. Shorn of more than half his kingdom, subjects, power, and influence; and dependant upon the combined powers, one of whom was England, even for the retention of this "smaller half," he ceased to be that independent sovereign contemplated in the consent to his arbitration. At the very time of his pretended decision of our case, the question was pending with the combined powers who should be made King of Belgium; whether the Government should pass out of the family of the King of the Netherlands, or not: the Prince of Orange, son of William, and Leopold, of Saxe Coburg, being the principal candidates. England had an overwhelming influence with the combined powers, and the King of the Netherlands knew it. Without, therefore, alleging that the decision was at all influenced by these circumstances, they were sufficient to have authorized our Government to protest against his proceeding further in the case, and to have invited him to give up the papers. This, however, was not done, and the umpire went on to make what he called an award, by which more than two million acres of our land would have been transferred to Great Britain. From this, however, fortunately for Maine, another Administration, which had just then come into power, rescued us. Nevertheless, as my colleague would have it, the first Administration is worthy of all commendation, while the latter is worthy only of censure!

The Governor of Maine, in his annual message, delivered January, 1831, holds the following language in relation to the subject:

"But recent events having deprived that monarch [the King of the Netherlands] of the greatest portion of his kingdom by a revolution, thus rendering him necessarily dependant upon foreign power for succor and support, his political situation has been so essentially changed that it may be doubtful, at least, whether he will give a decision on this delicate and important question, which was referred to him under circumstances so essentially different from those which at present exist. If the effect of this revolution should be to unite in still closer bonds of amity the former friendly and intimate relations of the King of the Netherlands with Great Britain, which seems to be probable, it must be considered that the agreement to refer would, in that event, be rendered of no avail. Whatever confidence may be put in the justice of our cause, however clearly our right may be shown in argument, we certainly could not be willing to submit it to the umpirage of a sovereign, who is not only the ally, but who, by the force of circumstances, may have become, in some measure, the dependant ally of Great Britain."

Similar views were expressed by the Legislature of Maine by certain resolutions upon the subject, adopted February 28, 1827.

These are a portion of the complaints of Maine against the General Government during the Adams administration, and, I trust, that all will perceive them to be neither unjust nor unsubstantial. I will now pass to the specific charges of my colleague against the two succeeding Administrations, and endeavor to show how far they are right, and how for they appear to me to be without foundation.

And, first, in relation to the agreement or understanding had between the Governments of the United States and Great Britain, as to occupation and jurisdiction of the disputed territory. The Adams administration, it was alleged by my colleague, took high ground and maintained it manfully, while the succeeding Administrations had frittered away the agreement, and, finally, abandoned both possession and jurisdiction to the British. Now, this may be so, but I have not yet been able to see it, and, I think, the House will find the same difficulty with myself, after examining the instances particularly cited and relied upon by my colleague.

For the origin of this agreement the letter of Mr. Gallatin to the Secretary of State, dated July, 1827, is referred to, in which he says: "Mr. Canning also suggested the propriety of abstaining, on both sides pending the suit, from any act of sovereignty over the contested territory." We next find the agreement alluded to in a letter of Mr. Clay, Secretary of State, to the Governor of Maine, November 27, 1827, which was overlooked by my colleague. He says: "Both parties stand pledged to each other to practice forbearance, and to abstain from further acts of sovereignty, on the unoccupied waste, until the question of right is settled." Now, as that Administration has been complimented for making a good agreement and adhering to it, it is worth our while, for a moment, to examine these two statements of the agreement, and see how far they coincide. By Mr. Gallatin's statement, "both sides were to abstain from any acts of sovereignty over the contested territory"—that is, over the whole. By Mr. Clay's statement, we were "to abstain from further acts of sovereignty over the unoccupied waste," &c. Here is an important difference. If Mr Gallatin's agreement had been adhered to, Great Britain could not have exercised any acts of sovereignty even over the settlement of Madawaska. But as Mr. Clay has changed it, Great Britain is only restricted to the unoccupied waste. This is a very pretty beginning for the Administration which has received such high encomiums.

But let us go one step farther. The next notice we find of this agreement, is in a letter from Mr. Clay to Mr. Vaughan, bearing date January 9, 1829. After complaining of certain trespasses upon the territory, in cutting timber, which, it was alleged, had been done under the authority of the British Government, he adds: "I need scarcely remark, that the proceedings, thus described, are in opposition to the understanding which has existed between the Governments of the United States and Great Britain; that, during the pendency of the arbitration, which is to settle the question of boundary, neither party should exercise any jurisdiction, or perform any act, on the disputed territory to strengthen his own claims, or to effect the state of the property in issue."

Here, also, we find important modifications of the agreements before stated. In both of those agreements, the acts of sovereignty from which the parties were to abstain were unqualified acts of sovereignty. Now, it is not any act of jurisdiction or sovereignty whatever, but those acts only which have for their object to strengthen the claim of the party exercising it; and in proportion, therefore, to the difficulty of deciding upon the precise object of either of the parties in any particular act of jurisdiction exercised, is the agreement made loose, indefinite, and worse than none. Here, then, are three attempts to state the agreement, and neither agrees with the others. They all differ in very essential particulars. If, therefore, my colleague should have succeeded in showing, as he attempted, that the succeeding Administration had stated the agreement differently, at different times, and that some degree of confusion had been produced upon the subject, I think some allowance should be made on account of the example which, it is perceived, had been set them by their predecessors.

But as this last version of the agreement seems to have been settled down and practised upon as the real agreement or understanding in the case, let us see what it is, and what is the fair construction of it. There are two branches to it; one relating to the jurisdiction, and the other to the property, in the territory;—the parties were not to exercise any acts of sovereignty to strengthen their own claims, or to do any act which should affect the value of the property. It was to continue during the pendency of the arbitration. This I take to be the fair construction of the agreement. Now, how did it apply to the actual state of things? Why, Great Britain had possession of Madawaska village; Maine had possession up to that, or nearly so, and the land lying above Madawaska might be regarded as "unoccupied waste," which neither party had in actual exclusive possession. Hence, both parties might continue to exercise jurisdiction without any violation of the agreement, provided they kept within their usual and accustomed limits, and committed no new or further act of jurisdiction.

The rights of property were to remain untouched, that is, neither were to sell the land or cut off the timber. Here is the agreement, and here the mode of applying it, though we therein make a large concession in favor of Great Britain, to wit: in admitting her jurisdiction over Madawaska village. Maine always denied this, until a certain Mr. Barrell, who seemed to have imbibed strong prejudices against Maine and her interests, was appointed by Mr. Clay to go to the British Provinces to collect the facts in this case. He reported that Great Britain was in possession of Madawaska. This afterwards being recognised and confirmed by Mr. Clay, Maine found herself reluctantly obliged to yield a fact which she had always before, and rightfully, contested, unless the issuing of a few commissions in a militia, not in esse, and a few acts of a like character, were sufficient to constitute possession. That the foregoing is a fair construction of the agreement, I refer to Mr. Clay's letter to the Governor of Maine, bearing date November 27, 1827, in which he says:

"Both parties stand pledged to each other to practice forbearance, and to abstain from further acts of sovereignty on the unoccupied waste, until the question of right is settled."

But, whatever may be the true construction, I would now inquire by what right or authority was this agreement made? If the disputed territory belonged to Maine, and that Administration expressly admitted it, where did the General Government derive its power to say that Maine, a sovereign State, should not extend her jurisdiction over it? Would not such a power involve that of alienating the territory? If the General Government can rightfully deprive us of our property and bestow it upon another for one month, I do not see why it may not be done for one year, or for an indefinite period. This question of authority occurred to the mind of my colleague, when speaking of the agreement as having been made by General Jackson's administration. It was all right and proper, in his estimation, for Mr. Adams's Administration to enter into such an arrangement, but to continue it merely, by the succeeding Administration, was all wrong, and he calls for the authority.

Pursuing the order of my colleague, we now come to the first act of the new Administration, in which it is said that the agreement or understanding is entirely changed, and very much to our disadvantage. That, Mr. Hamilton makes it a question of property between the citizens merely, and not a question of sovereignty and jurisdiction between the two Governments. In a letter from Mr. Hamilton to Mr. Vaughan, under date of March 11, 1829, he says:

"I have received, and laid before the President of the United States, the note, with its enclosures, which you did me the honor to write to me on the 7th of this month, in answer to a representation which was made to you by Mr. Clay, on the 9th of January last, at the instance of the Governor of Massachusetts, concerning depredations complained of by him against inhabitants of the Province of New Brunswick, in cutting timber, preparing lumber for market, and erecting mills, upon the soil of the territory in dispute between the United States and Great Britain; and I am directed by the President to state, in reply, as I have much pleasure in doing, that he derives great satisfaction from the information contained in your communication, as he especially perceives in the prompt and energetic measures adopted by Sir Howard Douglass, Lieutenant Governor of the Province in question, and detailed in the enclosure referred to, a pledge of the same disposition on the part of the authorities of that Province which animates this Government, to enforce a strict observance of the understanding between the two Governments, that the citizens or subjects of neither shall exercise any acts of ownership in the disputed territory whilst the title to it remains unsettled."

Now, although Mr. Hamilton was at the head of the State Department for a few days only, under a temporary arrangement, and probably had not given this subject much of his attention, yet, on a fair construction of what he has said, taken in connection with the circumstances of the case, it will be found that there is in fact no change in the agreement or misstatement of it, made by him. It will be perceived, that the correspondence then was in regard to certain trespasses alleged by us to have been committed by British subjects, and not on account of any acts of sovereignty by the British Government. The agreement, it will be recollected, was of two branches, one touching the property, and the other the jurisdiction. It is, therefore, fair to presume, that Mr. Hamilton alluded to that part of the agreement which bore upon the questions then under consideration, without intending to set out the whole agreement, or those parts of it bearing on questions not then drawn into discussion. This construction is deemed to be strictly in accordance with the fair and legitimate rules of interpretation.

But if he was in an error, the Governor of Massachusetts fell into it also. For, on recurring to his letter to Mr. McLane, then Secretary of State, under date of November 1, 1833, we find the following remark relative to the agreement, viz:

"Prejudicial as the delay in the settlement of this long-vexed subject of boundary is to the rights of property which Massachusetts claimed in the disputed territory, and impatient as both the Government and the people have become at the unreasonableness and pertinacity of the adversary pretensions, and with the present state of the question, yet the Executive of this Commonwealth will not cease to respect the understanding which has been had between the Governments of the two countries, that no act of wrong to the property of either shall be committed during the pending of measures to produce an amicable adjustment of the controversy."

Here it will be perceived that Governor Lincoln, in his statement of the agreement, confines it to the property merely. Now, how is this? No one, I presume, will accuse that gentleman of a disposition to relinquish any rights belonging either to Massachusetts or Maine, as connected with this subject. For myself, I have always regarded him and his distinguished brother among our best friends, and foremost in avowing and maintaining our claims, and in repelling British pretensions. The only true solution of the matter is this: that Governor Lincoln was corresponding with Mr. McLane, upon the subject of certain trespasses alleged to have been committed upon the property of the disputed territory; and hence he confined himself, in his reference to the agreement, to that part of it only which related to the subject matter of discussion. In this, he and Mr. Hamilton adopt the same course, and neither change the agreement, or yield any rights belonging to the States of Maine or Massachusetts.

My colleague [Mr. EVANS] next refers us to the letter of Mr. Van Buren, then Secretary of State, to Mr. Vaughan, under date of May 11, 1829, for further proof of a change in the agreement, and of a virtual abandonment of the rights of Maine. If that letter be susceptible of any such interpretation, then I have studied the English language to no purpose. Mr. Van Buren says:

"The undersigned cannot acquiesce in the supposition that, because the agent of his Britannic Majesty thought proper, in the proceedings before the commissioners, to lay claim to all that portion of the State of Maine which lies north of a line running westerly from Mars Hill, and designated as the limit or boundary of the British claim, thereby the United States, or the State of Maine, ceased to have jurisdiction in the territory thus claimed. In the view of this Government, his Britannic Majesty's agent might, with equal justice, have extended his claim to any other undisputed part of the State, as to claim the portion of it which he has drawn in question; and in such case, the Lieutenant Governor of New Brunswick could surely not have considered a continuance on the part of the United States, and of the State of Maine, to exercise their accustomed jurisdiction and authority, to be an encroachment. If so, in what light are we to regard the continued acts of jurisdiction now exercised by him in the Madawaska settlement? More than twenty years ago, large tracts of land, lying westward of Mars Hill, and northward on the river Restook, were granted by the State of Massachusetts, which tracts are held and possessed under those grants to this day; and the United States, and the States of Massachusetts and Maine, in succession, have never ceased to exercise that jurisdiction which the unsettled condition of the country in that region, and other circumstances, admitted and required."

Here is a plain, clear, and distinct avowal of the justice of our claims, and a forcible and manly vindication of them. He insists on both our jurisdiction and possession, and yields nothing. Surely Maine can find no fault with this. But a paragraph at the close of the same letter is referred to particularly, as containing the unfortunate modifications of the then subsisting agreement. It is as follows:

"The undersigned indulges the hope that Mr. Vaughan will perceive, in the manner in which the President, discriminating between the rights of this Government and their present exercise, has used the discretion conferred upon him—an additional evidence of the desire which he sincerely entertains, and which he has heretofore caused to be communicated to Mr. Vaughan, that both Governments should, as far as practicable, abstain from all acts of authority over the territory in dispute, which are not of immediate and indispensable necessity, and which would serve to create or increase excitement whilst the matter is in course of arbitration," &c.

Here, it is said, by the qualification of "immediate and indispensable necessity," a door is opened for British aggression, and a latitude given that Government which it did not possess before. But I would inquire whether it be any thing more than what Mr. Clay says, in his letter to Mr. Vaughan, of February 20, 1828, viz:

"Nor can they [certain acts of the British Government] be reconciled with that mutual forbearance to perform any new act of sovereignty within the disputed territory, having a tendency to strengthen the claims of the party exercising it, which, it has been expected, would be observed by the two Governments, during the progress of their endeavors amicably to adjust the question of boundary."

If persons, not subjects of either Government, for instance, should go on to the "unoccupied waste" for the purpose of plundering it of its timber, what shall be done? Shall both parties so construe the agreement or understanding between them, in regard to the abstaining from the exercising of jurisdiction as to compel each other to stand by and see such trespass prosecuted with impunity? Or should each party have the right to arrest and punish the intruder? The latter, undoubtedly; and more especially so, because it would not be done for the purpose of "strengthening the claim of the party," and would be of "immediate and indispensable necessity."

This view is supported by reference to a report made to the Legislature of Maine, in January 1829, by a gentleman who was, and still is, the political friend of my colleague. His language is thus:

"There seems to have been an understanding between the Government of the United States and the British Government, early in 1826, that each party should abstain from any acts which might be construed into an exercise of the rights of sovereignty or soil over the disputed territory, except for the purpose of preserving it in its then present state, until the final determination of the question."

The next cause of complaint against Gen. Jackson's administration on my colleague's list, he derives from a letter of Mr. Bankhead to Mr. Livingston, dated October 1, 1831. Mr. Bankhead, after alluding to certain proceedings on the part of Maine touching the disputed territory, says:

"The undersigned regrets sincerely that these irregular proceedings should have been had recourse to, during a period when the question of boundary is in a course of settlement, and in opposition to the desire expressed by the President, that, pending the discussion of that question, the State of Maine should refrain from committing any act which could be construed into a violation of the neighboring territory."

Here, it is said, we see the President ignobly yielding the possession of the disputed territory to Great Britain, and desiring Maine to acquiesce in it. And, if the facts were so, I would unite with my colleague in almost any language of reprehension that he might choose to employ. But where, I ask, is the evidence that the President ever expressed any such desire? It is only to be found in this letter of Mr. Bankhead. But, on referring to a communication from Mr. Van Buren to the Governor of Maine, of March 18, 1831, it will be found that the President is entirely misunderstood, and his language palpably misquoted. It runs thus:

"In making this communication to your Excellency, I am instructed by the President to express his desire, that while the matter is under deliberation, no steps may be taken by the State of Maine, with regard to the disputed territory, which might be calculated to interrupt or embarrass the action of the Executive branch of this Government upon the subject."

Thus, simply by citing the authority upon which Mr. Bankhead predicated his remark, the whole charge and complaint of my colleague falls to the ground. But it is said that, in a letter of Mr. Livingston, while Secretary of State, to Mr. Bankhead, October 17, 1831, there is an entire acquiescence that Great Britain should have the exclusive jurisdiction of the disputed territory. In this letter, my colleague says, all is abandoned, yielded, given up; and that now we have not a right to set a foot there. Sir, I have read that letter in vain to find any such acquiescence in the British claim, or abandonment of our own. On the contrary, it recognises the subsisting agreement between the two Governments, and insists on a strict compliance with it. The object of the communication was to procure the release from imprisonment of certain persons who had been arrested and imprisoned by the Provincial Government. It seems that in 1830, just before the award of the royal umpire, King William, the Legislature of Maine incorporated the town of Madawaska. But, as appears in the communications of the Governor upon the subject, it was merely in anticipation of the award, and without any intention of having any formal organization under the act of incorporation, until after the award should be duly promulgated; never for a moment doubting that it must be in favor of Maine. Certain individuals, however, without instructions or authority from the Government, applied to a justice of the peace in Bangor, to issue a warrant for calling a meeting of the inhabitants, for the purpose of organization, and choice of officers. The warrant was issued; and while in the prosecution of their design, they were arrested and imprisoned by the Provincial Government, on the ground that their acts constituted a violation of the agreement, about which so much has already been said.

Mr. Livingston sought to procure their release in the first place, on the ground that their acts, being unauthorized, and not followed out, were no violation of the agreement; and secondly, that even if it were so, the Provincial Government could not rightfully proceed to try and convict them. It might be a cause of complaint against our Government, if their acts were authorized; but to proceed to try, convict, and punish them, would be a practical decision of the question of exclusive jurisdiction; and against this he remonstrated in earnest language. Now, in all this, what is there to condemn? I am unable to perceive any thing.

But my colleague has instituted a comparison between the course of Mr. Livingston in the foregoing case, and the course of Mr. Clay in the case of the arrest and imprisonment of John Baker in 1828. It is said that Mr. Clay used stronger language in requiring the release of the prisoner than Mr. Livingston used. That is rather a small matter even if it be so; but it appears to me, that Mr. Livingston, in the positions he assumed, took the higher ground of the two. They both refused to justify the acts of our citizens, who had been arrested, but denied the right of the Provincial Government to proceed to trial and conviction, because it would be a practical decision of the question of right to exclusive jurisdiction. Wheelock was arrested for acts done and committed in the village of Madawaska, in the possession of the British; while Baker's settlement, Mr. Clay says,

"appears to have been made outside of the Madawaska settlement, upon contiguous waste lands." And hence he adds:

"Whatever jurisdiction the Government of New Brunswick might claim in virtue of the Madawaska settlement, being confined to it, could not be rightfully extended to Baker and his American neighbors. Even if he had been guilty of any irregularity of conduct, he was not amenable to the Provincial Government, but to his own."

Thus we see, that while Mr. Clay was denying the right of the British Government to try and punish Baker, inasmuch as he lived out of Madawaska settlement, on the unoccupied waste, Mr. Livingston was denying their right to try and punish Wheelock for an act done in the settlement of Madawaska itself. This is manifestly higher ground than that assumed by Mr, Clay, and yet my colleague can see in the course of the former every thing to praise, and in the latter every thing to condemn.

In the case of Greely, however, Mr. Stevenson is complimented for the bold and manly tone in which he denounced the arrest of Greely as an outrage, demanded his release, and denied the jurisdiction of the British Government. Sir, I am glad that this Administration, or any one of its members, can perform any act in a manner to please my colleague. But, he adds, Mr. Stevenson assumed it upon his own responsibility, not having received instructions from this Government of a similar character.

To this, I can make no more effectual answer than to turn to the letter of instructions itself, from Mr. Forsyth to Mr. Stevenson, under date of July 12, 1837. I here find that he expressly calls the seizure and imprisonment an "OUTRAGE upon the personal liberty" of one of the citizens of Maine; and, after dwelling briefly upon the argument of the case, he closes by saying: "You are directed, immediately upon the receipt of this despatch, to bring the subject to the notice of his Majesty's Government, and to DEMAND, as a matter of JUSTICE and RIGHT, the PROMPT release of Mr. Greely, and a suitable indemnity for his imprisonment." Our inclinations must have become belligerent, indeed, if we would require any thing more than this; and one would naturally think, that the materials for fault-finding were very scarce, when such circumstances are seized upon as matters of grave accusation against the Administration.

But it is said, further, that the British Government has acquired possession of the disputed territory by means of a warden, and that this warden was appointed with the knowledge and concurrence of President Jackson. Where is the evidence of this? None is to be found except in a letter from Sir Archibald Campbell to Sir Charles R. Vaughan, January 20, 1834, in which he says: "Mr. McLaughlan was appointed to the wardenship of the country with the knowledge and concurrence of the President; and it is not conceived, therefore, that any fair ground of objection can be taken to his faithful performance of the duties of his office."

It will be observed, that he does not allege that President Jackson concurred in the appointment; and from the information to be gathered from the documents, it is manifest that it could not have been him, for the appointment was made before he came into office. By the foregoing letter of Sir Archibald Campbell, we learn that the name of the warden is McLauchlan; and on turning back to a letter from Sir Howard Douglass to Mr. Vaughan, dated February 11, 1829, we shall find the following in relation to this gentleman and his appointment:

"In order that your excellency may have full, circumstantial, and recent information upon this subject, (i. e. certain trespasses alleged to have been committed upon the disputed territory) I have despatched a magistrate of this county—a gentleman in whose prudence and discretion I place the firmest reliance—with instructions to inspect all the lumber camps any where near the line," etc. etc. "Having made this inspection, this gentleman will be directed to remain in the upper part of the country, with orders to enforce the strictest observance of the instructions I have already given to seize any timber," etc. "The report from Mr. McLauchlan, the magistrate whom I am about to despatch on this duty, will probably reach your excellency in about three weeks after this communication."

This is the only evidence I can find of the appointment of an agent or warden; and it will be perceived that this was during the existence of that Administration which, according to my colleague's views, did so much for Maine, and to which she owes such a debt of gratitude. For myself, however, I do not believe that any President concurred in that appointment. It was a matter of inference merely on the part of Mr. Campbell and he was probably as much mistaken in that as we have already seen Mr. Bankhead was, in undertaking to state the Predent's "desires."

Mr. Campbell in the same letter, speaks of a "conventional frontier;" and this furnishes my colleague with the occasion to inquire by what authority the President had assented to a "conventional frontier," and to complain of the Administration for its criminal abandonment of our territory and our rights. Sir, how easy is it to magnify trifles into importance, to see mountains in mole-hills, when our vision is diseased? Of the sincerity of my colleague I do not doubt; but in this instance, at least, his strong feelings of opposition to General Jackson's administration—an opposition which can see no good, but unmixed evil in all its acts—has misled and deceived him. The conventional frontier, of which Mr. Campbell speaks, is nothing more or less than that which was established by Mr. Clay himself, in the agreement before alluded to. If the British Government were to retain the possession of Madawaska settlement by the agreement, why, then, is it not manifest that the boundary line of that settlement is, for the time being, a "conventional frontier?" Nothing can be plainer; and no evidence can be found (published or unpublished) of President Jackson, assenting to any other conventional frontier.

After the rejection of the award of the King of the Netherlands, agreeably to the advice of the Senate of the United States, negotiations were opened with the British Government, for the settlement of the line according to the terms of the treaty of 1783, and my colleague complains of Mr. Livingston's pusillanimity in inviting negociations, and apologizing for the rejection of the award. I deny that there was any apology, or any thing approaching to it. He stated the fact of the rejection, and then, in plain and manly terms, gives the grounds of it. And as to the invitation to enter upon negotiations, pray why should he not have invited it? Should he rudely have insisted, or assumed a right to command? Sir, I am no friend to the old system of diplomacy, characterized by duplicity, indirectness and intrigue. No sir, I prefer General Jackson's mode of saying right on, in plain, direct, and forcible language, what he had to say—of asking for nothing but what was right, with a determination to submit to nothing wrong. But inviting negotiations, it appears to me, is in no way inconsistent with this.

[Mr. Evans said that his colleague was entirely mistaken; he (Mr. E.) had not complained of Mr. Livingston either for a supposed "apology" or "invitation" to negotiate.]

Well, sir, then I must let it go for my mistake, though I find it upon my minutes of that gentleman's speech, taken at the moment.

But complaint is made of Mr. Livingston for proposing to the British Government a new principle of survey, to wit: to abandon the due north course from the source of the St. Croix, if need be, in order to strike the highlands named in the treaty of 1783. If Mr. Livingston had stopped here, it appears to me, he would have been fully justified. It is a familiar principle, that courses and distances shall yield to monuments—that which is more certain shall control that which is less certain. The highlands, which divide the head waters of the rivers flowing into the Atlantic ocean from those which fall into the river St. Lawrence, is one of the monuments named in the treaty of 1783, and if it be necessary to diverge from a true north line from the source of the St. Croix to strike these highlands, I can see no objection to it. But to the correctness of the position that we should diverge to the west and not to the east, to the left and not to the right, I cannot assent; nor will Maine yield her assent to a proposition so dangerous and suicidal in its nature.

I have thus followed my colleague through his list of charges against the Administrations of General Jackson and Mr. Van Buren upon this subject, and have endeavored to set things right—approving and condemning, as the circumstances seemed to require. Nothing is to be gained by unnecessarily impugning the course of the General Government. Our object now is to procure the passsage of this bill—to take one decisive step towards restoring to Maine her long lost and much abused rights. In this we need the aid of the General Government, and confidently expect to receive it, in both its Legislative and Executive branches. We call for the passage of this bill, as a measure not only mild and prudent in itself, but imperatively called for by the rights of Maine, and corresponding obligations on the part of the General Government. Maine is so unquestionably right, and Great Britain so palpably wrong, in this matter, that I cannot believe any member who has looked at all into it will refuse us his vote.

But I am aware that, from the circumstance of this question being somewhat local in its character, and perhaps from the circumstance, too, that Maine has been so meek and uncomplaining under injuries, it is not generally well understood. I propose, therefore, as briefly as I can, to give an abstract of our title, and the questions now pending between the two Governments.

The northern and eastern boundaries of the United States, and, consequently, of the State of Maine, are thus defined in the definitive treaty of peace between Great Britain and the United States, concluded at Paris the 3d of September, 1783:

ART. 2. And that all disputes which might arise in future on the subject of the boundaries of the said United States may be prevented, it is hereby agreed and declared that the following are, and shall be, their boundaries, viz: From the northwest angle of Nova Scotia, to wit: that angle which is formed by a line due north from the source of the St. Croix river to the highlands, along the said highlands which divide those riversthat empty themselves into the river St. Lawrence, from those which fall into the Atlantic ocean, to the northwesternmost head of the Connecticut river; thence down along the middle of that river to the forty-fifth degree of north latitude," &c. "East, by a line to be drawn along the middle of the river St. Croix, from its mouth in the bay of Fundy to its source: and from its source, directly north, to the aforesaid highlands, which divide the rivers that fall into the Atlantic ocean from those which fall into the river St. Lawrence."

The first question that arose under this treaty, was, as to the true river intended by the St. Croix. Provision was made for the settlement of it in the treaty of 1795, commonly called Jay's treaty; and in 1798, the commissioners appointed in pursuance of the provisions of this treaty, determined that the river called by the Indian name of Schoodiac was the true St. Croix, and accordingly placed a monument at its source, which now remains as one of the acknowledged and undisputed boundaries between the United States and the British colonies.

At that time every thing else was supposed to be well understood. There was no other uncertainty or ambiguity alleged. There was no dispute or question made as to the localities of the monuments referred to in the treaty of 1783. There was then no pretence of title to the now disputed territory set up. All these things, as we shall perceive, were after-thoughts, suggested by the supposed convenience and all-grasping cupidity of Great Britain.

At the negotiation of the treaty of Ghent in 1814, the British commissioners asked for a cession of a part of this now disputed territory for an equivalent. Our ministers substantially replied and rightfully, that they had no authority to cede. That the territory belonged to Massachusetts and Maine, and no power could divest their title. Then, for the first time, a doubt was suggested as to the boundary. This doubt in a short time ripened into a claim; and this claim, founded upon pretences of title the most preposterous, has been urged ever since, if not with the most consummate effrontery, at least with a pertinacity worthy of a better cause.

However, provision was made in that treaty (1814) for the appointment of commissioners to survey the line, and, in case of disagreement, a submission of the question to some friendly sovereign was provided for. The commissioners appointed under this provision of the treaty, after attempts extending through a period of about five years, could not agree; and thereupon, in pursuance of the treaty stipulations, the case, in 1827, was referred; William, king of the Netherlands, as I have before stated, being selected as the arbiter. The evidence was laid before him, and the case argued with distinguished ability by Messrs. Preble and Gallatin, but without success. Notwithstanding his strong bias for Great Britain, and adversary feelings for the United States, the case was so clear that he could not decide against us, and, situated as he was, he would not decide for us. He therefore decided neither way, but advised a compromise, by which the highlands were to be sought in the bed of a river, and by which Maine would have lost about two million acres of land. This advice was rejected by the United States, and afterward by Great Britain herself, and thus we were brought back to the point from which we started in 1814.

After this brief history of the case, I will call the attention of the House again to the terms in which the boundary is described in the treaty of 1783.

"From the northwest angle of Nova Scotia, viz: that angle which is formed by a line drawn due north from the source of the St. Croix river to the highlands; along the said highlands, which divide those rivers that empty themselves into the St. Lawrence, from those which fall into the Atlantic ocean, to the northwesternmost head of Connecticut river." "East, by a line to be drawn along the middle of the river St. Croix, from its mouth, in the bay of Fundy, to its source; and from its source directly north to the aforesaid highlands, which divide the rivers that fall into the Atlantic ocean from those which fall into the river St. Lawrence."

With such a clear, unambiguous, and lucid description of boundaries, it is difficult to conceive how any controversies should have arisen in regard to them, and especially that any serious doubts should have been entertained as to the true intent and meaning of the terms employed. A glance at the map, and a slight attention to the topography of the country, will only tend to increase our surprise.

It will be perceived, that running nearly parallel with the river St. Lawrence, extending from the head of Connecticut river on the west, nearly to Cape Rossieres on the east, and at an average distance of some twenty-five or thirty miles, is a ridge or height of land, from which flow in opposite directions two classes of rivers; the first falling into the river St. Lawrence, and the other, mediately, into the Atlantic ocean, through certain gulfs and bays. This height of land separating the rivers aforesaid, is not a chain of mountains, but may more properly be termed "a ridge of broken highlands," its average height being about fifteen hundred feet above the level of the sea. At the termination of the American line, the height is over sixteen hundred feet, according to the survey of Mr. Bouchette, under British authority, in 1817.

About forty miles north from the source of the St. Croix, is an isolated mountain or peak, called Mars Hill, which, according to Mr. Bouchette, is eleven hundred feet high. Scattered along westerly from this, are numerous mountains or hills, near which the Penobscot and its branches take their rise, but not forming any regular and connected chain. Near that point of the highlands which we allege constitutes the northwest angle of Nova Scotia, it will be perceived two rivers take their rise and flow at nearly right angles, the Metis into the river St. Lawrence, and the Ristigouche into the bay of Chaleurs, and thence into the Atlantic ocean. Other features of the country will be adverted to as I proceed, and as may be found necessary.

The points now in controversy between Great Britain and the United States are as to the locality of the northwest angle of Nova Scotia and the highlands named in the treaty of 1783, and the northwesternmost head of Connecticut river. The latter, contending that the northwest angle of Nova Scotia is at the termination of a line due north from the source of the St. Croix to the highlands dividing the head waters of the river Ristigouche, which flows into the Atlantic ocean, from the source of the river Metis, which flows into the river St. Lawrence. Great Britain, on the other hand, contends that the line due north from the source of the St. Croix should terminate at Mars Hill; that, there is the northwest angle of Nova Scotia; that, there are the highlands intended by the treaty; and that, from this, the line extends westerly along a range of hills to the northwesternmost head of Connecticut river. This claim, however preposterous it may appear, has been pursued with a pertinacity, zeal, and seriousness that perhaps entitle it to a sober answer.

And first with regard to the starting point—the northwest angle of Nova Scotia. Where is it? The terms of the treaty of 1783 inform us; "to wit: that angle which is formed by a line drawn due north from the source of the St. Croix river to the highlands" "which divide those rivers that empty themselves into the St. Lawrence from those which fall into the Atlantic ocean." We are not to stop at the first highlands on the course, nor the most mountainous lands, nor highlands of any description, other than those which divide the sources of the rivers aforesaid. This is an important and highly descriptive adjunct, which cannot be overlooked or disregarded without doing violence to the plainest principles of construction. Without it, the phrase "highlands" would be indefinite and indeterminate. With it, the meaning is too clear and precise to leave any room for doubt or ingenious construction.

But what are the objections taken by the British Government to our position? First, it is said that, as a matter of fact, there are no "highlands" within the meaning of the treaty of 1783, where our north line, from the source of the St. Croix, terminates. Now, if we admit, for the sake of the argument, that there is no mountain or large hill at the termination of our line, yet the denial of the existence of "highlands" at that place would seem to come with an ill grace from those who insist that Mars Hill is "highlands;" for, by a survey of Mr. Bouchette, a British topographical surveyor, made in 1815, it appears that the land at the termination of the American line is over 1600 feet above the level of the sea, while Mars Hill is only 1100. Land, 1100 feet high, is highland, but that which is 1600 feet high, is not highland! To such gross absurdities do our adversaries find themselves driven to support an unjust and groundless claim. But, in relation to this point, we would advert to the circumstances under which this boundary was agreed upon in the treaty of 1783. It is admitted by both of the contending parties, that Mitchell's map, published in 1755, is the only one which the negotiators of the treaty had before them at the time, and by which they were guided. At that time, but little accurate information had been obtained of the face of this part of the country; and, by an inspection of Mitchell's map, it will be perceived that little else beside the rivers is attempted to be delineated. Consequently, by these, the makers of the treaty must have been principally governed. Hence the selection of the very appropriate and significant term "highlands." They perceived on the map two classes of rivers flowing in opposite directions—one class into the river St. Lawrence, and the other into the sea—and that the sources of these rivers were divided by a narrow strip of land. With any knowledge, therefore, of the laws of nature, must they not have regarded this strip of land more elevated than that lying on either side of it? And not being aware of the existence of mountains, none being laid down on Mitchell's map, would there not seem to be a peculiar appositeness in the use of the term "highlands?"

Mars Hill cannot be the highlands intended in the treaty of 1783, (as contended for by the British Government,) because it is entirely destitute of the adjuncts named in the treaty. Instead of being a continuous tract of elevated land, it is an insulated peak, or mountain. Again, and what ought to be regarded as conclusive upon the subject, it does not "divide the rivers that empty themselves into the river St. Lawrence, from those which fall into the Atlantic ocean." So far from this, it is one hundred miles from the sources of the rivers falling into the St. Lawrence, and divides two tributary streams of one river, to wit: the river St. Johns.

Again: it is said by the British Government that the rivers Ristigouche and St. Johns are not rivers falling into the Atlantic ocean, because they empty themselves, mediately, the first through the Gulf of St. Lawrence, and the latter through the Bay of Fundy. This argument, if it prove any thing, proves too much. If this position be tenable, then there were no rivers between the northwest angle of Nova Scotia and the head of Connecticut river, falling into the Atlantic ocean, inasmuch as all of them fall first into bays or sounds: the St. Croix into the Bay of Fundy, the Penobscot into a bay of the same name, the Kennebeck and Androscoggin into the Sagadahock, and the Connecticut into Long Island Sound. But the commissioners who negotiated the treaty, certainly did regard some rivers between the points aforesaid as falling into the Atlantic ocean, for they are so expressly named and described in the treaty. Does it not, then, conclusively follow, that, in the view of the commissioners, a river might be said to fall into the Atlantic ocean, though it first discharged itself into a bay or sound? and if one of the rivers could be so regarded, by parity of reason, might not all the others?

Again: that, the commissioners considered these bays and gulfs as a part of the sea or Atlantic ocean, may be gathered from the terms used by them in another part of the treaty. By the third article, it is provided "that the people of the United States shall continue to enjoy unmolested the right to take fish of every kind on the Grand Bank, and on all the other banks of Newfoundland; also, in the Gulf of St. Lawrence, and at all other places in the sea where the inhabitants of both countries used at any time heretofore to fish." Here, it is perceived, they consider the Gulf of St. Lawrence as a part of the sea or Atlantic ocean.

Besides, the commissioners speak only of two classes of rivers, the first falling into the St. Lawrence river, and the other into the Atlantic ocean. Now, as the Ristigouche and St. Johns certainly do not fall into the river St. Lawrence, to what class can they be assigned, but to those falling into the Atlantic ocean?

But, without relying upon these clear and cogent proofs of the views and intentions of the commissioners, it is believed that the usual and common acceptation of the term sea or ocean embraces the bays, etc. before named. "Sea, in its general sense, embraces the whole body of salt waters on the globe. Its great subdivisions are designated by the names of Atlantic ocean, Pacific, Indian, Arctic, Antartic oceans, etc; and each of these is a general appellation, embracing, when not specially or impliedly excluded, all the bays, gulfs, and inlets, which are only portions of such ocean, being formed by the indentures of the shores to which it extends, or by adjacant islands."

But the claim of the United States, thus clear and indisputable upon general reasoning, will be found not only to be justified, but rendered doubly certain, by reference to the documentary evidence in the case.

In the year 1763, the war between England and France resulted in a relinquishment by the latter of all right to Nova Scotia, and a cession of Canada. England then became the undisputed owner of both Provinces; and, during the same year, a Royal proclamation issued establishing boundaries to the Province of Quebec, or Lower Canada. That portion of the proclamation applicable to this question, was in the following words, viz:

"Whence the said line crossing the river St. Lawrence and the Lake Champlain, in 45 degrees of north latitude, passes along the highlands which divide the rivers that empty themselves into the said river St. Lawrence, from those which fall into the sea, and also along the north coast of the Bay of Chaleurs, and the coast of the Gulf of St. Lawrence to Cape Rosieres."

In 1774, the foregoing boundaries were solemnly confirmed in an act of Parliament, entitled "An Act for making more effectual provision for the government of the Province of Quebec, in North America." The words are as follows, viz: "Bounded on the south by a line from the Bay of Chaleurs, along the highlands, which divide the rivers that empty themselves into the river St. Lawrence from those which fall into the sea, to a point in 45° of northern latitude," &c.

The boundaries of Nova Scotia, as defined also in 1763, in the commission of the Governor, were in the following words, viz:

"Bounded on the westward by a line drawn from Cape Sable, across the entrance of the Bay of Fundy, to the mouth of the river St. Croix, by the said river to its source, and by a line drawn due north from thence to the southern boundary of our colony of Quebec, to the northward by the said boundary, as far as the western extremity of the Bay of Chaleurs, to the eastward by the said bay, and the Gulf of St. Lawrence, to, &c."

Then followed the treaty of 1783, in which our boundaries are described as follows, viz: from the northwest angle of Nova Scotia, to wit: that angle which is formed by a line due north from the source of the St. Croix to the highlands; along the said highlands which divide the rivers that empty themselves into the St. Lawrence, from those which fall into the Atlantic ocean, to the northwestern-most head of Connecticut river, "east by a line to be drawn along the middle of the river St. Croix, from its mouth in the Bay of Fundy to its source, and from its source directly north to the aforesaid highlands, which divide the rivers that fall into the Atlantic ocean from those which fall into the river St. Lawrence." No one can doubt, it is presumed, that, by adopting nearly the same phraseology the makers of this treaty, intended to place the boundaries of the United States where the boundaries of Nova Scotia and Canada were established by the foregoing proclamation, act, and commission, and that the terms and phrases were used in the same sense. Indeed this position has been assumed by the British Government itself, and constitutes the basis of an argument by Mr. Chipman, the British agent, under the treaty of 1794, the object then being to ascertain what river was intended by the St. Croix, and this question about the highlands and northwest angle of Nova Scotia, not then having entered into the imagination of man.

Between the period of the establishment of a separate Government for Lower Canada, (1763,) and the definitive treaty of peace between Great Britain and the United States, (1783,) a great number of British maps were compiled and published, in which the boundaries of Nova Scotia and Quebec are delineated, precisely in accordance with the present claim of the United States: the western line of Nova Scotia crossing the St. Johns, and extending to the highlands; while not one can be found agreeing with the present pretensions of Great Britain. The titles of some of thes maps, with the times of publication, are as follows, viz:

"1763.—A new map of the British Dominions in North America, with the limits of the Governments annexed thereto by the late treaty of peace, and settled by proclamation, October 7th, 1763. Engraved by T. Kitchin, geographer, for the Annual Register of 1763.

"1769.—A new and accurate map of the British Dominions in North America, according to the treaty of 1763, divided into the several provinces and jurisdictions. Projected upon the best authorities and astronomical observations, by Thos. Kitchin, geographer. Engraved for Knox's History of the War in America.

"1765.—A map of North America, by J. Palairet, with considerable alterations and improvements from D'Anville, Mitchell, and Bellin, by L. Delarochette.

"1766.—A map of the British Dominions in North America, as settled by the late treaty of peace, 1763. J. Ridge.

"1770.—British Empire in North America, with the West India isles, annexed to Wynne's History.

"1771.—A new and accurate map of North America, from the famous Mr. D'Anville, &c. Also, the new divisions, according to the late treaty of peace; by Peter Bell, geographer.

"1772.—A map of the British Dominions in North America, according to the treaty of 1763; by Peter Bell, geographer.

"1775.—North America and the West Indies, with the opposite coasts of Europe and Africa. Published according to act of Parliament.

"1776.—A new map of the province of Quebec, according to the royal proclamation of the 7th of October, 1763; from the French surveys, connected with those made after the war, by Captain Carver, and other officers in his Majesty's service. Sayer and Bennett.

"1776.—A general map of the Northern British colonies in America, which comprehends the province of Quebec, the Government of Newfoundland, Nova Scotia, New England, and New York: from the maps published by the Admiralty and Board of Trade, &c.

"1777.—A new and correct map of North America, with the West India islands, divided according to the last treaty of peace, concluded at Paris, 10th February, 1763; wherein are particularly distinguished the several provinces and colonies which compose the British Empire; laid down according to the latest surveys, and corrected from the original materials of Governor Pownall, member of Parliament.

"1777—The British colonies in North America. By William Faden.

"1778.—A new map of North America, from the latest discoveries. Engraved for Carver's Travels."

During this period also, in all the commissions to the several Governors of Nova Scotia and Canada, the description of boundary is the same, corresponding with the royal proclamation of 1763, and all the maps before enumerated.

From 1783 down to 1814, numerous British maps were published, in all of which the boundaries of the United States and the British Provinces correspond with the boundaries between these provinces and Maine, as defined in all the maps prior to 1783; the titles of some of them are as follows, viz:

"1783, Feb. 9.—The United States of America, with the British possessions of Canada, Nova Scotia, Newfoundland, &c. &c. according to the preliminary articles of peace signed at Versailles the 20th of January, 1783. R. Sayer and J. Bennett.

"1783.—A new and correct map of North America, in which the places of the principal engagements during the present war are accurately inserted, and the boundaries, as settled by treaty of 1783, clearly marked. J. Dew.

"1783, April 3.—The United States of America, laid down from the best authorities, agreeably to the peace of 1783. By John Wallis. London.

"1783, July 16.—An accurate map of the United States of America, with part of the surrounding provinces, agreeably to the treaty of peace of 1783. By John Cary. London.

"1783.—The United States of North America, with the British and Spanish territories, according to the treaty. By William Faster.

"1783, October 2.—A new map of the United States of America, with the British American dominions on that continent, &c. By Samuel Dunn, mathematician; improved from the surveys of Capt. Carver.

"Bowles's new four sheet map of North America and the West Indies, exhibiting the extent and boundaries of the United States, the British dominions, &c; the whole compiled and laid down from the best authorities. London.

"1781.—Bowles's new pocket map of the United States of America, the British possessions of Canada, Nova Scotia, Newfoundland, &c. as settled by the preliminary articles of peace signed at Versailles the 20th of January, 1783. London.

"1784.—A new and correct map of North America, with the West India Islands, divided according to the last treaty of peace, concluded at Paris the 20th of January, 1783, wherein are particularly distinguished the thirteen provinces which compose the United States of North America. By Matthew Albert and George Frederic Latter.

"1784.—Brion de la Tour's Etats Unis d'Amerique, &c. Paris.

"1783.—A new map of North America, with the West India islands, divided according to the preliminary articles of peace signed at Versailles 20th January, 1783, wherein are particularly distinguished the United States and the several provinces, governments, &c. which compose the British dominions, and corrected from the original materials of Governor Pownall, member of Parliament.

"1791.—Same map. London.

"1794.—A new map of the whole continent of America, divided into North and South, and West Indies, wherein are exactly described the United States of North America, as well as the several European possessions, according to the preliminaries of peace signed at Versailles January 20, 1783, &c. By Laurie and Whittle. London.

"1794.—A new map of North America, agreeably to the latest discoveries. London.

"1794.—A map of the United States of America, with part of the adjoining provinces, from the latest authorities.

"1795.—A map of North America and the West Indies. By L. D. S. De La Rochette. London.

"1800.—America, divided into North and South, with their several sub-divisions, and the newest discoveries. By Laurie and Whittle. London.

"1798.—D. F. Saltzman's Maine. Hamburg. Carl Earnest Bohn.

"1814.—Map of the British Colonies and the United States of North America. J. Lodge."

Since 1814, several have been published, in which it is believed the old well-known and well-established line is adhered to. At all events, there is one now suspended in the room of the Committee on Foreign Affairs, drawn by Mr. Bouchette, under British authority, in 1815, in which the "Province of Maine" is placed in large capitals across the now disputed territory, and on which the highlands are delineated, as of old.

But I should not be pardoned for dwelling longer upon this point, though there are many arguments, and cogent ones too, not yet noticed. Some of them were pressed upon your attention by my colleague, with a clearness and force I could not equal, should I attempt it. If his arguments upon this point shall have had the effect upon the minds of members which they ought, I shall be satisfied, and the object I have had in view obtained.

And now let me inquire, what mortal can say there is any doubt about the title of Maine to this territory? Is it not established by the most clear and indubitable evidence, and most of it, too, derived from the adversary nation itself? I will not believe, that an individual can be found this side the Atlantic, who will disparage our title, or admit that there is any doubt about it.

If then, the title of Maine is clear and indisputable, why not pass this bill? It asks merely that the line should be run and marked. Is it not the duty of the General Government to maintain the integrity of our territory? No one will deny that it is so, by virtue of the express provisions of our constitutional compact. Why not then take this single step towards discharging a most solemn obligation? What motives or what causes can be assigned to justify a refusal to do what you have agreed to do? I trust that gentlemen will give this matter a proper consideration, and not permit the constitutional rights of Maine any longer to be overlooked or disregarded.

Will any gentleman say that we should continue to solicit Great Britain to enter upon negotiations touching this matter—negotiations not to procure a relinquishment of territory wrongfully wrested from us, but simply to run the line? I would invite such gentleman to examine the correspondence which has been held between the two Governments for the last six years. It will furnish the most indubitable proof that nothing is to be expected from such a course. That, so long as Great Britain is permitted to hold the actual possession of Madawaska, and have free intercommunication between her Provinces, she will be very willing that we should dillydally with negotiations till doomsday.

Let me call the attention of the House to a few of the declarations of the British Government, made in a correspondence with this Government since July, 1832.

After the rejection of the award by the Senate of the United States, Mr. Livingston, then Secretary of State, in a letter to Mr. Bankhead, dated July 21, 1832, invited a negotiation upon the subject for the purpose of settling the line according to the treaty of 1783.

Sir Charles R. Vaughan, in a reply to this, by letter, dated April 14, 1833, says:

"His Majesty's Government regret that they cannot discover in this proposal any probable means of arriving at a settlement of this difficult question. It appears to his Majesty's Government to be utterly hopeless to attempt to find out, at this time of day, by means of a new negotiation, an assumed line of boundary."

Again: in reply to a letter of Mr Livingston, in which he suggests the principle of making courses yield to monuments, Mr. Vaughan says, in a letter bearing date May 11, 1833:

"The undersigned is convinced that it is hopeless to expect a favorable result from a renewed negotiation upon that subject."

Again, in the same letter, he says:

"It is the duty of the undersigned to transmit immediately to his Government the note of Mr. Livingston; but, at the same time, he cannot resist from inviting the Secretary of State of the United States to offer, without waiting the result of the reference, some more prompt and efficient measures for the settlement of the boundary than the renewal of a negotiation on an inadmissible basis, or recourse again to commissioners of boundary," etc.

"Inadmissible basis!" What was that basis? Why, the treaty of 1783. A treaty signed by the British Government, in which our boundaries are agreed upon in the most clear, explicit, and unambiguous terms, is set aside by that very Government as an inadmissible basis for running and settling the line! Will gentlemen, after this, tell us that we should still persevere in our hitherto abortive attempts at negotiation?—that we should coax the British Government a little longer, under the possibility that she may relent at last, and unsay what she has so often and so emphatically said? I will not believe that Maine is to be thus insulted. If there is to be any further negotiation—any new proposition—in the name of a proper self-respect let it come from the British Government.

But let us look a little farther at this correspondence. In a letter of Mr. Vaughan, dated May 31, 1833, he says further:

"It appears to the undersigned that the time is now arrived when this perplexed and hitherto interminable question can only be set at rest by an abandonment of the defective description of boundary contained in the treaty, by the two Governments mutually agreeing upon a conventional line of boundary more convenient to both parties than those insisted upon by the commissioners of boundary under the fifth article of the treaty of Ghent, or the line suggested by the King of the Netherlands."

In the same letter he adds:

"The propositions of Mr. Livingston very justly provides against any deviation eastward from the direct north line from the St. Croix; but the operation which it contemplates is still so restricted to the terms of the treaty, that the basis of it is the same as that which the undersigned has been instructed by his Government to inform the Government of the United States that it was hopeless to negotiate upon."

Here, again, the treaty stipulations are rejected, and it is substantially declared to be hopeless to negotiate further, unless we give up our poor puritanical notions that nations, as well as individuals, should faithfully abide by their agreements.

Notwithstanding all these discouragements, our Government still persevered, earnestly soliciting the British Government to agree upon some mode of settling the line according to the terms of the treaty, and suggesting ways in which it could be done. February 10, 1834, Mr. Vaughan makes another reply, and endeavors to show that although the King of the Netherlands had not decided the main question submitted to him, yet, by way of inference, he had decided seven other points; and he then adds:

"Now, whether the two parties adopt the mode of settlement recommended by the arbiter, and agree to divide between them, in some proportion or other, the disputed territory, or whether they shall still make another attempt to trace a boundary in strict conformity with the words of the treaty, in either case it appears to his Majesty's Government that it would be necessary to adopt these seven decisions of the arbiter as a ground-work for further proceedings; and it seems that no satisfactory or useful result could be obtained from the local survey proposed by the American Government, until the two parties are agreed upon these seven points."

Now I ask the House to look at this proposition in all its naked deformity, and then to say, whether a proposition of a more insulting character could be made. A case is submitted to an arbiter, to wit: to settle a boundary line according to the terms of a treaty. He, pretending to find great difficulties in his way, declines deciding, setting forth his views at large in a report, and closing with his advice to the parties, to adjust the dispute in a particular way, utterly at variance with the terms of the treaty. But, as the arbiter had travelled out of his commission, had advised merely, when by accepting the papers he had agreed to decide, and had confounded "highlands" with the bed of a river, the award is rejected and set aside as of no validity or effect.

Some years afterwards, when another attempt is made to settle the difficulty, one of the parties hunts up the old report of the arbiter, and endeavors to show that the arbiter, arguendo at least, had decided seven points subsidiary to the main question, which he did not decide, and insists that these seven points shall be made the "groundwork for further proceedings;" in effect, insisting on a right to pick out of the award all that they consider as particularly favorable to themselves, and throwing the rest away! Now I ask, what can be more insulting than this? I ask if the history of diplomacy can show its parallel, and if we are willing to submit to this degradation any longer? But this is not all. In a letter of Mr. Vaughan to Mr. Forsyth, dated December 8, 1834, he says: "His Majesty's Government trust that the American Cabinet will be prepared to agree with that of his Majesty as to the construction to be put upon this passage of the treaty, and will concur in deciding that the Atlantic rivers which are to guide the commissioners in searching for the highlands described in the treaty, are those rivers which fall into the sea to the westward of the mouth of the river St. Croix." That is, the St. Johns and Ristigouche are not Atlantic rivers; and he adds: "The undersigned is instructed to represent to Mr. Forsyth that his Majesty's Government consider a clear agreement between the two Governments on this point to be an indisputable preliminary to the establishment of any new commission of survey." And subsequently, he says, after alluding to the arbitration of the King of the Netherlands, the British Government "cannot now consent to refer it to any other arbitration."

Here we have it, in express terms, that the British Government will not submit the matter to arbitration at any rate, and will not consent even to have a survey, unless we will agree to their "indisputable preliminary," to wit: that the St. Johns and Ristigouche are not Atlantic rivers; that is, they will not consent to enter upon a course to ascertain the line, unless we will first admit that we have no case; for I regard the acknowledgment that the St. Johns and Ristigouche are not Atlantic rivers, as equivalent to it. But, to cap the climax in this series of insulting propositions, let me quote once more from the letter of Mr. Bankhead to Mr. Forsyth, dated December 28, 1835. "His Majesty's Government, however, do not the less lament that the advances which they have made have been fruitless; but with their regret is mingled the satisfactory consciousness which they feel, that, in making those advances, they have gone to the utmost extent to which a due regard to the honor and interests of the British Crown could permit them to go." Honor and interests of the British Crown! What sort of honor is that which unblushingly and wantonly refuses to abide by the solemn stipulations of a treaty? But they have a "satisfactory consciousness" in contemplating the "advances" they have made. "Advances!" What advances have they made, but to advance upon our territory, and then insisting upon our agreeing that they are right, before they will consent to inquire into the legality of such an advance. They have, to be sure, made "advances," but they are upon our patience and good nature; they are a wanton trampling upon our rights.

But, sir, I will not occupy the time of the House longer with this branch of the subject. I have not read all from the correspondence bearing upon the point I have been considering, lest I should fatigue the House; but only enough to show that it is utterly "hopeless," as the British Government say, to expect any thing further from invitations on our part to protract this correspondence; and I think every member who has listened to me must be satisfied of that. What, then, shall be done? Shall Great Britain be permitted to remain in the quiet and undisturbed possession and use of our property, without making one single effort on our part to procure its restoration? Shall we tamely submit to the degradation of being plundered of our property, and then spend years in soliciting the plunderer to agree upon some mode in which the legality of his conduct may be tried? I trust not. It will not be in accordance with that spirit which has hitherto distinguished the American character. It would argue a weakness and pusillanimity disgraceful to us in the last degree, and cannot, I am confident, find advocates upon this floor.

What, then, shall be done? Shall we go to war? I answer, no; unless the surveying and marking our line, and resisting all forcible attempts to take our property from us, be war. I profess to be the friend of peace, and would not rashly and unnecessarily embroil our country in difficulties which would result in war; but, in this case, I have not the remotest suspicion that the measure proposed could have so disastrous and unhappy a result. Let this step be taken, and the whole question is settled. Great Britain, when she sees a determination, on the part of the General Government, to have this question settled, and to cause Maine to be restored to her possessions, will agree upon terms at once. When delay shall become dangerous to her interests, depend upon it she will delay no longer. A rupture of the peaceful relations subsisting between that country and this would be one of the last things that Great Britain could regard as desirable. Nor will she permit it, when it is so easily avoided.

The President, in his last annual message, holds the following language upon this subject:

"Of pending questions, the most important is that which exists with the Government of Great Britain, in respect to our northeastern boundary. It is with unfeigned regret that the people of the United States must look back upon the abortive efforts made by the Executive, for a period of more than half a century, to determine, what no nation should suffer long to remain in dispute, the true line which divides its possessions from those of other powers. The nature of the settlements on the borders of the United States, and of the neighboring territory, was for a season such, that this, perhaps, was not indispensable to a faithful performance of the duties of the Federal Government. Time has, however, changed this state of things, and has brought about a condition of affairs, in which the true interests of both countries imperatively require that this question should be put at rest. It is not to be disguised that, with full confidence, often expressed, in the desire of the British Government to terminate it, we are apparently as far from its adjustment as we were at the time of signing the treaty of peace in 1783. The sole result of long pending negotiations, and a perplexing arbitration, appears to be a conviction, on its part, that a conventional line must be adopted, from the impossibility of ascertaining the true one according to the description contained in that treaty. Without coinciding in this opinion, which is not thought to be well founded, my predecessor gave the strongest proof of the earnest desire of the United States to terminate, satisfactorily, this dispute, by proposing the substitution of a conventional line, if the consent of the States interested in the question could be obtained. To this proposition no answer has as yet been received. The attention of the British Government has, however, been urgently invited to the subject, and its reply cannot, I am confident, be much longer delayed. The general relations between Great Britain and the United States are of the most friendly character, and I am well satisfied of the sincere disposition of that Government to maintain them upon their present footing. This disposition has also, I am persuaded, become more general with the people of England than at any previous period. It is scarcely necessary to say to you how cordially it is reciprocated by the Government and people of the United States. The conviction, which must be common to all, of the injurious consequences that result from keeping open this irritating question, and the certainty that its final settlement cannot be much longer deferred, will, I trust, lead to an early and satisfactory adjustment. At your last session, I laid before you the recent communications between the two Governments, and between this Government and that of the State of Maine, in whose solicitude, concerning a subject in which she has so deep an interest, every portion of the Union participates."

In this, the President manifests that friendship for Maine, regard for her interests, and mild but firm purpose to maintain them, which has ever characterized his course upon this subject, in the several capacities in which he has been called to act. The London Times, of December 27th, understands the message as we do. In regard to that part of it touching this subject, it holds the following language: "From the tone and spirit of so much of the message now alluded to as is connected with this New Brunswick controversy, it appears natural to predict that it will not be suffered by the present Government of the United States to remain much longer unsettled." The President says that no nation should long suffer its boundaries to remain in dispute. Does Congress doubt this? or will they cooperate with him in that action which the truth of such a position demands? He says the true interests of both countries imperatively require that this question should be put at rest. Will Congress say it should be kept open? or will they unite their efforts with those of the Executive to put it to rest? He says he does not coincide in the opinion of the British Government, that this boundary line cannot be run according to the treaty of 1783, and that a conventional line must be adopted. Will Congress sustain him in this? or will they tell us to negotiate and make the best bargain we can? I trust not. The time has arrived when some decisive step should be taken. Let there be union, energy, and firmness among the different branches of the Government upon this subject; let them manifest the determination to submit to nothing wrong, as well as to ask for nothing but what is right, and this long-vexed question will be terminated and settled forthwith.

INDEPENDENT TREASURY BILL.

SPEECH OF MR. MORRISS, OF OHIO,

In Senate, March, 1838—Upon the bill "to impose additional duties, as depositaries, upon certain public officers, to appoint Receivers General of public money, and to regulate the safe-keeping, transfer, and disbursement of the public moneys of the United States."

Mr. MORRIS addressed the Senate as follows:

Mr. PRESIDENT: It is but a day or two since I remarked to the Senate that, at the commencement of this debate, I had not the least intention whatever to take any part therein. I should yet adhere to that original resolution, did not existing circumstances now almost compel me to a change. It is neither the pleasure of speaking, or the pride of being heard, that now induces me to throw myself upon the notice and indulgence of the Senate. After so much has been said, after the most eloquent tongues and strongest minds seem to be wearied and exhausted on the subject, it would be arrogance in me to suppose that I can add either force to the argument, or cast any additional light on this long-contested question. I shall not attempt to enter the wide field of debate, which gentlemen have spread before us. I shall confine myself to the mere expression of opinion on the great principles involved in the bill, and in the arguments which have been urged both in favor and against it, and such reasons and arguments as have been suggested to my mind in support of such opinions. I took my seat, Mr. President, in this body, with sentiments formed, and often expressed, as to the nature and powers of this Government, and how far it was connected with, or ought to influence, the Governments of the States. All the arguments that have been used on this important and delicate subject, (the subject of currency,) have more or less involved these important topics. I have, sir, listened with some attention, and examined with some care, the arguments used, and the positions assumed, by gentlemen on both sides of the House; and I have done so, I hope, with an impartial mind, as I know I have for the purpose of correcting my course, should I discover that I have been in error. But, sir, I am compelled to say that I have not been able to discover any substantial or abiding reason to shake the principles upon which I have heretofore relied, or that would justify a change in the course I have steadily and firmly pursued. Sir, to my mind, there has been more of description than of fact; more of fancy than of reason, in all that has been said. Truth has been covered over by fiction, and reason has been lost in imagination; and though we have had peal upon peal of bright and thrilling eloquence, yet let it be remembered that fiction, imagination and fancy, are the fields in which eloquence delights to roam; and in the exercise of its power there, it can most fascinate, control, disturb, and agitate the public mind. Sir, we are told that this is now the state of the public mind in this country; that it is, upon the present question, deeply excited, and violently agitated. Without admitting, I will not, for sake of the argument, deny the fact; but, sir, it is worthy of grave consideration what has been the main cause, and among what portion of our citizens this agitation exists. It is true, that legislative bodies have spoken, that public meetings have spoken; but have the people, the great body of your intelligent yeomanry, spoken? I answer no. It is the politicians and the trading community ALONE that have spoken; and wanting the sure foundation of truth, and the basis of the Constitution on which to rest their arguments, they have resorted to declamation, to fiction, imagination and fancy, to rouse the PEOPLE to their aid. It has been urged upon us that this phosphoric light proceeds from the genuine blaze of public feeling. I cannot believe it.

Sir, allusions have been often made in the debate on this bill, to instructions sent here from the Legislatures of the different States. I feel myself involved in those allusions; and before I proceed to examine the great principles of the question before us, I must ask the indulgence of the Senate to adjust, settle, and cancel this private account, so far as it respects myself. A demand which the Legislature of my own State have made upon me, and, like the banks, I feel disposed to refuse specific payment. It is true, sir, that this honorable body have no particular interest in this matter. It is a question alone between a member and his constituents; but payment is demanded here, and here, if any where, the battle is to be fought, the protest entered, and the answer given. Had my honorable colleague, when he presented the resolution and declaration of our State, have felt it proper to have made any remarks, I should have availed myself of that opportunity to have said then what I feel my indispensable duty to say now. I rejoice that the General Assembly of my State has thought proper to express their opinions and sentiments on the present occasion. I consider it not only the right, but the duty, of the States, to watch, with jealous care, every action of the General Government; for on their vigilance, as well as virtue, must depend, in a great degree, the purity, perpetuity, and safety, of that liberty which was intended to be secured to each and every citizen by the institutions of our common country. It is of no importance, sir, whether I do or do not concur in the particular opinions and sentiments expressed by the Legislature of my State. The great principle of instruction remains forever the same. To protect and preserve the public liberty, promote the interest and welfare of the country, by reproof, admonition, and instruction, to them with whom they have instrusted, even for a short period, a portion of their power, is not only the right, but the duty, of the constituent body. Believing, then, as I do, in the right of instruction, I find myself differing, however, with gentlemen who hold the same doctrine, in the origin, force, and binding efficacy, of that right. I cannot believe that the doctrine of instruction ought to be so exercised as to make void, abridge, change, or alter, the will of the people as expressed in constitutional forms, or to require their representatives to do either a dishonest or dishonorable act. I hold that the Constitution is the every day expressed will of the people, and cannot be altered or changed in any other mode than that provided in the instrument itself. That when the power of the constituent body was exercised in the appointment to office, they had a right not only to the person appointed, but to his then known and expressed opinions also, for the constitutional term for which they elected him. I consider that the man and his political opinions are chosen together. The obligation I consider mutual, that the incumbent shall hold, for the constitutional term, and those who elected him shall have the benefit of his opinion (the very cause, no doubt, of his election) during the same term. The correct doctrine, in my opinion, is, that those who have the power of election, for the time being, in their hands, have the right to the Government of the country during the period for which those elected can hold their official stations. Our safety against the abuse of power, or the existence of any permanent evil in the country, brought upon it by any act of the Government, is found in the frequency of elections. I have always believed, sir, that, under our form of Government, the will of the people, as expressed by their representatives, was obligatory upon all, until altered or abrogated by the same will, expressed in the same constitutional form. I hold, therefore, that the will of the people of the State which I have the honor in part to represent here, as expressed by the Legislature in my election as Senator, is, in all cases in which my opinion was known, at that time, to that body, obligatory during the constitutional term, not only upon myself, but upon the State I represent, so far as my single voice can go, during that term. If this not the true case, I am unable to see any thing like safety or stability in our system of Government. If the present Legislature of my State can justly, by way of instructions, require me to change my opinion, I cannot see why I should not be equally justifiable in saying I had changed myself, and thus play false with those who were my immediate constituents. If doctrine of this kind can be sustained and brought into practice, instead of written laws and constitutions, by which alone liberty can exist, all our rights would depend on unwritten laws, promulgated by the breath of popular opinion, and brought into action by some momentary and exciting cause; and instead of sustaining principle, would operate on men, and would eventually be found to carry into effect its mandates by mobs and violence. The General Assembly of my State seemed to be aware of the great fundamental truths I have suggested, and have disclaimed the power to give binding instructions to their co-ordinate representatives in Congress. That instructions are not legally binding will, I think, be admitted by all; but this, instead of weakening, strengthens the moral obligation to obey. It is that obligation, when required by the voice of public opinion—no matter in what particular form expressed—that enjoins obedience on the representative. Viewing, then, the resolution and declaration of the General Assembly of Ohio in this light, so far as I am concerned, I am willing, nay, I feel it my duty, to acknowledge their instructions, in the same manner as if they had been conveyed in the most positive terms and approved form. I feel satisfied the General Assembly so intended, for they commended the opinions and sentiments therein contained to our consideration and concurrence. I will not, for a moment, sir, deal unfaithfully with my State, or with the Legislature, by taking advantage, by any technical evasion, of what I believe to have been the true intent and meaning of the Legislature in the passage of the resolution they have sent us.

I have given, sir, to this resolution and declaration my most serious attention, and, I trust, I have done so without any party feeling or party spirit; and I am unable to discover but two important objects which the Legislature had in view. The first is the distribution of the proceeds of the public lands amongst the several States, and the other the establishment, by Congress, of a United States Bank. All other propositions assumed or laid claim to, I believe, were considered as auxiliary to these, and of minor importance. I consider the resolution as instructing me to vote for both those measures, should they be brought before the Senate, and against any measure that was calculated to defeat either. The question now for me to decide is, am I bound, or ought I to obey? My answer is, I am under no moral or political obligation to do so. Shall I, then, resign my seat here? Not for this cause. It was, sir, a well known and notorious fact, at the time I had the honor to be elected to a seat in this body, that I was opposed to a distribution of the proceeds of the public lands amongst the several States, and also to the establishment of a National Bank by Congress. I believed then, as I believe now, that both those measures are not within the constitutional power of this Government; and I have no doubt but the members of the present General Assembly of my State will do me the justice to recognise this fact. I contend, then, that this was the opinion of the Legislature that elected me to the office of Senator in this body. I therefore most respectfully beg leave to change the question with the present General Assembly, and in my turn, ask them if they did not expect and believe that every person which they have or should elect to office would faithfully carry out the principles and doctrines which induced his election? And, if it was now the proper time for the election of a Senator to Congress, would they not look for, and select a man who would defend, and faithfully support, and vote for the principles contained in the resolution which they have sent us, and would they not deem him base and unworthy, if for any cause or motive, he would betray the trust thus confided to his hands? Sir, as far as I am personally acquained with the members of the present General Assembly of my State, I know them to be men of honorable minds, and high moral worth; and I believe all the others are of like character, and I will venture to answer for them in the affirmative to the question I have put. If faith thus plighted, and thus relied on, by which an important official station had been conferred was to be broken by instructions afterwards given, the most gross imposition upon the country might, and no doubt would, often take place. An important question is before the public, which must be decided by Congress. A United States Senator is to be chosen who will have a vote on this question; the people have that object in view in the election of their State Legislatures; a large majority of members are returned on one side of that question; they respond to the will of their constituents, and elect a man to the Senate of the United States professedly in favor of the will of that majority; the people have confidence in his integrity, they know his term of service is six years, and no other topic exists in which so deep an interest is felt. Many at the succeeding election neglect to attend the polls; chance, accident, or mere neglect, produces the election of a different set of men, with different political views to the next Legislature. They instruct the Senator, who has but barely taken his seat, to vote against his known, and expressed opinions, expressed at the time of his election, and, of course, against the opinions and principles of those who elected him. Shall he obey, and thus deceive his immediate contituents, and lay a foundation for the practice of every political fraud? I will submit the question, sir, to the people I have the honor to represent here, as well as the Legislature, and I am much mistaken indeed, if the response from both will not be that the representative ought to do his duty faithfully to the best of his ability, as he had engaged to do at the time of his election. No man has a more profound respect for the Legislature of his State than I have for mine, and this respect is not in the least degree abated, nor ought it to be, because the present Legislature is, as I understand, of different political opinions with myself. I view their rights and my duty the same as it were otherwise; and I believe in this particular case, in refusing obedience to the resolution now before me, I am, in fact, but carrying into practice the doctrines which the present legislative body itself would acknowledge correct. In all new cases, or cases in which the opinion of a representative was not known at the time of his election, he ought to obey the instructions of the constituent body, or resign his seat. I speak in no invidious sense when I say I hold the Virginia doctrine correct on this subject. There may be cases, however, in which the representative may be full convinced, that disobedience is the only alternative left him to save his country from some impending danger: in such an event, he ought to throw himself into the breach, but he should immediately thereafter surrender his trust. But, sir, there is no circumstance, in my opinion, that would justify my holding a seat here, and giving a vote that both my judgment and conscience should condemn, because I was instructed to do so by any power upon earth. I regret my peculiar situation has rendered it necessary that the time of the Senate, on the present occasions should be taken up with this explanation of my views; but as other States have instructed their Senators, as to the vote they shall give on the present bill, no one, I trust, will believe that I have, without reason, thus far overlooked the immediate question before us.

What, sir, then, is that question? It is, does there exist a vital inherent power in this Government, that Congress can call into action, for the purpose of preserving and keeping safely the money contributed, by the people, for the purpose of carrying on the functions of Government, between the time of its collection and disbursement in pursuance of law, and that, too, without any foreign or extraneous aid? To a plain and honest man, unacquainted with the intrigues of office, or the wiles of speculators, to ask this question, would be to answer it. Yet such only is the main object of the bill before us, which has met with so much opposition, and been so vehemently denounced by gentlemen on the opposite side of the question. But, sir, it seems to me that gentlemen ought to end their arguments where they begin them. They assume premises which do not exist, and thus claim the exercise of powers by the Government of the most dangerous tendency. The position assumed is, that Congress is bound to provide a currency for the country. I can, by no means, admit this argument, in the sense in which it has been urged in this debate. Congress furnish, in fact, a currency! If so, from what source is that power derived, and in what form is it to be exercised? Congress, by the Constitution, has power to coin money and regulate its value, and the value of foreign coin. This provision of the Constitution by no means authorizes Congress to make or increase the currency by the mere act of the Government, either for its own use or the use of individual citizens. It would be a dangerous practice, and at war with every principle of our Government, for Congress to exercise or possess a power like this. I admit that, in despotic or monarchical Governments, where power is claimed to be derived, not from the people, but jure divino, the power to supply their own Treasury by their own authority is claimed and exercised. It is the peculiar prerogative of the Crown to make its own money. That power, in this country, belongs to the people. The Government can have no money but by their permission. The people have, in their Constitution, provided that gold and silver shall be the material of which money shall be made; and they have given the power to Congress to coin it, and regulate its value. Congress has declared, by law, the shape and size of money, and the inscription it shall bear. They have, also, caused to be erected a mint, a great national workshop, where money shall be made; they have erected machinery, and employed workmen, for this purpose, all at the public expense, and the operation is called coining; but Congress have no power to dig the ore, or purchase bullion, in order to make money for the use of the Government. The mint belongs to the people; it is for their use; it is to make money for them free of personal expense, out of their own metal, and for their own benefit; and how much, or how little, they will have, like all other articles of property, depends upon themselves, and will be regulated by their means, their industry, their fancy, or their taste; and the Government is under no more obligation to afford aid to individuals in this pursuit, than it is to aid them in the rearing of cattle, or in acquiring any other species of property.

It would be as dangerous to public liberty to permit the Government to enter into competition with individual enterprise in this particular, as it would be to enter into competition in the trade, commerce, manufacturing, or agricultural pursuits of the people.

Hence the wise men who framed our Constitution have prescribed that the Government shall have no other income for its support but what the people shall contribute, by taxes, duties, imposts, excise, the sale of the public domain, and the borrowing of money. If I am correct in the positions I have assumed, and upon which I cannot doubt, what becomes of the argument that Congress is bound to furnish a currency for the country? It is lost, having no foundation whatever on which to rest. But those who use this argument contend that gold and silver do not exist in sufficient quantities to furnish a sufficient amount of currency to answer all the requirements of trade and commerce; that a paper currency must exist, and that issued, not by the simple act of the Government, but by a private corporation on its own responsibility, and for the sole benefit of the corporations. Sir, suppose I admit their argument, that a sufficient quantity of currency cannot be obtained by the use of gold and silver only, does it follow that paper is the next best material for this purpose? I say not. Suppose I admit another false and extravagant argument advanced by gentlemen, that whatever Congress receives as money, is money, thus placing the power of Congress entirely beyond that of the Constitution itself. If this was so, why not make a currency of more substantial material than paper? why not use iron, copper, or any other metal? It is true that Congress have directed copper to be coined, which passes as money—a power which I greatly doubt Congress is competent to exercise; yet if it exists, and if Congress can make a piece of copper, of a given form and size, worth the hundredth part of a dollar, Congress can make the same piece equal to the dollar itself, and thus increase the quantity of money in the number of pieces, or by raising its relative value. Sir, gentlemen well know that all schemes of this kind would not only prove vain and illusory, promoting no valuable purpose, but producing much mischief.

But gentlemen urge on us another system, which they call the credit system—a concentrated and corporate credit, which circulates in the form of bank notes, and which, they contend, is the purifier of our morals, the reformer of the age, and whose benign influence scatters peace and smiling plenty on the country, and without which we should retrograde in a short time, at least, to a semi-barbarian age. Permit me, sir, to examine for a moment this credit system. Gentlemen say that the Government is making war upon that system, and thus destroying confidence, upon which the whole prosperity of the country depends. Sir, in my opinion, we have too much instead of too little credit; too many of our citizens are endeavoring to live upon credit, instead of industry. These consist of the trading and speculating classes. And they are asking the aid of the Government to enable them to seize upon the property of the laboring and productive classes, and appropriate it to their own use, by virtue of this credit system. Credit belongs to man in his individual character, not in his corporate capacity; and it is the essence of oppression and tyranny for the Government to bestow upon the few a fictitious existence, in order to give them a credit which they never could otherwise obtain, and for which, in that character, (their individual character,) they are not responsible. It is, to my mind, impossible for the Government to lend its support to the credit of any man, or set of men, without producing injury to others. The Government has nothing of its own intrinsically; what it bestows upon one, it must wrest from another; and it would be as highly impolitic, unjust, and despotic, for the Government to seize upon the individual credit of the country, and force it out of its natural channel according to its pleasure, as it would be to seize upon the entire property of the country for the same purpose. No country can be free where the Government thus interferes with the private concerns of individuals for the purpose of adjusting the balance of wealth among them. But, sir, I am told to look over the face of the country, and see what the credit system has done for its prosperity; to look at my own State, and see the canals and roads with which the credit system has checkered it. Yes, sir, this credit system is a part and parcel, if not the life blood and essence, of what we once condemned under the name of the American system. We were formerly reminded of the great progress of improvement that was taking place under the Governments of the old world, and it was thought strange that Congress should be so paralyzed by the will of their constituents as not to exercise the same power here. I well remember the statement that a public work (a canal) about that time had been completed in Europe by the power of the Government, (the particular place has at this moment escaped my recollection,) of vast magnitude, and in a short space of time, and it was held up as a glorious example for us to imitate; but the glory ended in the sad story that twenty thousand individuals had lost their lives in carrying on that work. The amount of suffering and deprivation by others, though not actually engaged in the work, must have been incalculable, by the change of situation and the transfer of property by the order of Government. This was a species of the credit system carried on by the power of the sword; it differs nothing in principle from that which gentlemen now so earnestly urge upon us, and which is carried on by the power of the purse and the pen. Permit me, sir, to use a borrowed idea. If I am to submit to tyranny, give me the tyrant who struts with a sword by his side, rather than one who rules with a pen behind his ear. I have always believed that the happiness of a country, and the safety of republican institutions, were to be found in an industrious and rich population, with a poor and just Government. All the public works executed and owned by any Government, have a tendency to strengthen its powers, and make it arbitrary and despotic, by reducing the people to the condition of its laborers, dependants, or tenants. It also has the direct effect of increasing official stations and the arrogance of office; and I am well satisfied that if the Government now owned all the canals, railroads, and turnpikes, in the United States, and should reduce the fare, it would not be to the advantage of the country, because it would soon change the nature of our republican institutions. Except we prefer a Government to rule over the people, instead of a Government to be ruled by the people, we might then put off the honest garb of home industry and glitter in the livery of power. Yet this is the elysium of good Government which gentlemen picture in their fancy.

But the argument is still more unfortunate which assumes that we should retrograde in our morals and policy without the use of the banking system. What was the state of the world before the banking system existed? Let history speak on this point. We, at the present day, under all the influence of bank facilities, look back to that period for models of wisdom as well as skill. I hold, then, that banks are neither necessary or proper for the safety or security of that individual liberty which it was the object of the Constitution to secure; that the Government created by that instrument, as I have before remarked, possesses within itself a vital, self-existing principle, capable, without extrinsic aid, of performing all its functions; that the moment this Government shall attempt to lean for support upon banks, it will find them at best but a broken reed, and oft a spear, whose sharp point will pierce its very vitals. I go, then, for a total separation of the banks from the Government. I go for it at once. Now is the accepted time to enrol the decree for a divorce a vinculo matrimonii, breaking the last link in that chain which connects the Government of the country with those private institutions.

From the acknowledged talent and eloquence which has been brought into this debate, I expected to have heard convincing arguments and unanswerable facts. I confess I have been somewhat disappointed. Our fears and our passions have been addressed rather than our judgment and our reason. It seems to me that another panic is attempted to be got up in the country. It is but a mimic, sir, of that of four years since, which I then witnessed with some forebodings. But I predict nothing of the present; it will pass by, and be forgotten so soon as the bill before us is disposed of.

We are told, however, that the country is in deep distress, brought upon it by the Government, and that the complaints of the suffering are reaching us almost daily, and we are warned, in the voice of solemn admonition, to beware the consequences. Sir, none of these things, as yet, have induced me to change my course. From whence do these complaints come? From the large cities; from the trading community; from the speculating classes; from the consumers; from those who live upon the labor of others, and from those whose tables are covered with gold and silver plate, and the very hubs of whose carriage wheels are plated with silver. It is these last who have, by their glitter of wealth, tempted into their employ the honest and industrious mechanic, who they have paid with their credit, (bank notes) and now, when that credit will no longer procure the necessaries of life, and which they refuse themselves to receive and cancel, they ask the aid of the Government for its future support; and that being refused, instead of converting their plate into money, (the legitimate use for which the metal was intended by the Constitution,) and paying their honest debts, they join their dependants, and unitedly send their petitions here for relief from that condition which their own extravagance has brought them into, and even threaten the stability of the Government should they be refused. Sir, I would not lightly speak of any portion of my fellow-citizens; but there is something repugnant to my ideas of equal justice in such a course as this. I have no desire to say, in the language of Jefferson, that great cities are great sores on the body politic; but I will say, that great cities are not congenial to public liberty; they collect together the wealthy and the indigent, the haughtiness of riches, and the submission of dependent poverty; the principles that actuate them are constantly at war with each other, except occasion should offer to make war on a third party for the pecuniary interest of both. These parties are now united against the Government—the one hoping to compel it to sustain its credit, and the other hoping by that means to live upon that credit. These, sir, are the classes who now clamor at your doors for aid. The great body of the people, the agricultural class, are, happily, quiet and contented at home, willing to submit to the decrees of Providence, to earn, as well as eat, their daily bread in the sweat of their face. But we have been often reminded that instructions from our State Legislatures have been sent us to vote against this bill. This is true, sir; and I have examined with some care that branch of the question, because I felt an interest in this movement, having, as I considered, received instructions in the form of a declaration from the Legislature of my own State on the subject-matter of the bill under consideration. I have not been informed that, in a single instance, the Legislatures of any State who have sent instructions here, have themselves been instructed to do so by their constituents; and it is a remarkable fact, that in every such State but one, a majority of the Legislature were decidedly opposed to the present Administration, and in that one, a single vote in the popular branch would have changed the result. I view, then, these instructions as a political movement for effect; not the work of the people, but of the politicians: I fear the great moving cause was the advancement of men, not principles. I would not wish to be understood as speaking disrespectfully of any portion of my fellow-citizens, more especially of legislative bodies; all are entitled to my respect; but all should be judged by the same impartial rule of right. But, sir, all those circumstances are combined together, and presented to us as evidence of great distress pervading every portion of the country. That embarrassment and distress exists in some degree among the trading and speculating classes, I am willing to admit, and that the immediate cause of that distress is the stoppage of specie payment by the banks, and the refusal to discount, must be evident to all.

But gentlemen charge the whole upon the Government, and denounce its measures in the strongest terms. I admit the Government is blameable, in some degree, in this matter. On first taking my seat in this body, I was surprised to hear that the practice had been to permit those who had the public money in their hands to use it in trade or speculations between the time of its collection and disbursement. I expressed myself, in private conversation with gentlemen, who, I know, will do me the justice to acknowledge it, against this practice. Large sums were then being paid into the Treasury for which Government had no immediate use. I was asked if I would permit those sums to lie idle until expended by operation of law? Surely, I would. I thought then, and I think now, that it would be better for the country that they should have been entirely lost, even burnt in the streets of Washington, rather than be used for the corruption of the people. But, sir, other counsels prevailed, the money was ordered to be deposited in State banks, a measure to which I gave an unwilling assent. The banks were told to loan liberally on those deposites. And what has been the consequence? A host of borrowers were immediately found at the banks, who, in the pursuit of fancied wealth, neglected the ordinary and substantial pursuits of life. Loans were obtained, and many estimable young men, who otherwise would have been valuable and useful citizens, became speculators in practice, and gamblers in principle. The Government thus tempted them to leave the sober, honest walks of life for the uncertain pursuit of riches; and they forgot that excellent prayer, the best ever put into the mouth of man, "Lead us not into temptation." Thus this valuable class of our citizens were prevented from adding to the permanent wealth of the country; they became borrowers, poor dependants upon the banks; they forgot that word of truth, and it seems to be forgotten here also, that the borrower is servant to the lender. A gentleman near me, sir, says that slave is the original word; yes, sir, the borrower is the slave of the lender! Who, sir, will dare dispute this? Thus that manly independence of mind that should mark the American character, is exchanged for a miserable dependence on soulless corporations, and in the midst of this wild course of extravagance, the banks themselves became involved; they close their doors, refuse to refund to the Government the money deposited, or to discharge their other liabilities to individuals. What a monstrous picture of corruption does this present to the reflecting mind. But it did not stop here; men of wealth, in order to enlarge their fortunes, engaged in the same borrowing scheme; they employed the laborer to produce for them articles of show, or fashion, and paid them in credit for their work; that credit soon became worthless. These knowing ones then charged the whole blame upon the Government, and all united to raise the cry of distress, and call on Congress for relief. What a moral does this lesson teach. Well has it been said that the love of money is the root of all evil. But, sir, in condemning the principle of connecting this Government with the banking system of the States, I do not feel it necessary, nor do I believe it correct, to denounce, in general terms, the State banks, although gentlemen, on this side of the House, have done so. I cannot join in such denunciation. I think it is calculated to answer no valuable purpose, but may be productive of mischief. The banks are State institutions, created by the laws of the several States, and, to use language used on a former occasion, this Government ought not to intermeddle with State institutions. I use the word now, as I understood it then; meaning that this Government has no right to intermeddle with any institution of a State, exclusive of her own, in any manner whatever, by virtue of any act of Congress.

But, sir, gentlemen, on this occasion, as well as on most others, when questions of importance are under consideration, censure, in no measured terms, the acts and doings of the late, as well as the present incumbent of the Presidential chair. I have often thought in all this denunciation from which they were willing to screen the man, but condemn the officer, there was still not so much directed against the officer himself, as against the system which brought him into office. The blow thus struck, has always appeared to me to be aimed at the elective franchise: the right of suffrage, as exercised and enjoyed by the people at large. How many, sir, have said that the great body of the laboring and productive class, are not qualified for a proper discharge of this important privilege. It has been contended that this class never have, never can, nor never will be competent to understand the proper functions of Government. How often do we hear that "Slam, Bang and Co." meaning the laboring class, are engaged in political affairs? Words are sometimes more full of meaning than at others, and the meaning here is, that these men who are thus designated, are unfit to make a President or any other officer of Government; that such high privilege ought to be left to the handy work of the more wealthy and noble. Enter into private conversation with gentlemen of this class, with whom you are on terms of intimacy; let the feelings of private friendship disarm each of policy; bring the conversation to this point, and you will quickly see the result. A confession in the belief that there is too much liberty in the country. Sir, I charge most of the assaults made upon this Administration to spring from that belief, and I call upon the country to watch with sleepless vigilance the progress of this doctrine, and to check it at every avenue, or they may lament too late its fatal prevalence.

It is contended by gentlemen, if we pass this bill, it will have a serious effect upon the credit of the State banks; and another gentleman asserts that if the bill pass the banks, never can and never will resume specie payments. What are we to understand by all this? That bank rule is to be the order of the day here; that banks shall dictate to the Government the course for it to pursue; and for non-compliance, will defraud their own honest creditors, by the refusing payment of their notes. This is a high handed assumption of the banks; but they go farther: they ask the money of the Government to be sent to their vaults, to be used in payment of their debts, and if no money is to be had, they claim that the Government shall give credit to their notes, in order to induce individuals to receive them. This, sir, is unparalleled impudence, not to call it by a harsher name. Are not banks private property? And what claim have the stockholders upon Congress to advance their interests over that of any other individual or corporation who hold property of another kind? It has been well said that corporations have no souls. The banks appear to have neither souls or conscience. Sir, when these petty institutions shall be permitted to claim for themselves a public character, and prescribe to Government its action, there will be an end of common liberty and common justice. I regret that I feel compelled to speak of State banks, but gentlemen have so thrown them in my path, that I cannot easily get round them, and am, therefore, constrained to give them a passing notice.

But gentlemen contend that the exchanges of the country are in a deranged condition, and that Congress is bound to regulate them. Exchange belongs to the trade and commerce of the country, and not to its monetary system. Let us understand it by the operation of a single case. We are too apt to form incorrect conclusions by looking at things in mass. A gentleman has money in the West, which he wishes to make use of in the East. A friend has money in the East, which he wants in the West. An exchange takes place between them, for mutual accommodation, not of the actual thing itself, but each gives the other an order written upon paper to receive his money where it is; and if one should give the other a premium for his order, this is called the rate of exchange. Does not this simple statement convey a full idea of the exchange business of the country. I so understand it, by all that I have heard on the subject. What, then, Mr. President, is it but a naked simple private transaction between individuals, with which the Government has no more concern than it has in the exchange of living animals between their owners. I cannot discover any obligation imposed by the Constitution upon Congress to keep money in the Eastern cities to exchange with Western merchants for their money at home, for the purpose of saving to them the expense of its transportation, any more than that Congress should pay the carriage of their goods, when purchased, from the East to the West. Sir, emigrants going westward have the same right, in principle, to call upon the Government to provide household furniture and domestic animals for them in the West, in exchange for those they are in possession of, in order to advance the "general welfare," as the trading community have to call on Congress for the exchange of their money, to save expense to them, and which they say Congress is bound to do in order to promote the "general welfare." Born, sir, and cradled in the lap of the Revolution, my infant mind received its first impressions of government from that Constitution under which we now live, formed by the wise and good men of that day. I was taught to believe that the great object of the Revolution, and the end proposed by the Constitution, was the security of individual liberty, not the promotion of individual aggrandizement, or the means of procuring individual wealth. It was to secure the blessings of liberty, of equal rights to each and to all, to themselves and to their posterity forever. All we ask of the Government is protection, security from violence, and the administration of impartial justice, that the domestic fireside may be safe from either internal or foreign aggression; that the bounties of Providence, which we have gathered through the day by the labor of our own hands, may be safe from the midnight robber; in fact, that we all may sit in safety under our own vine or our own fig tree, and none be suffered to make us afraid. We crave neither the vine or fig tree of Government; nor do we wish the power or means of the Government to enable us to avail ourselves of the labor, or possess the vineyard, of another. Riches and wealth should be the reward of individual industry, frugality, and economy, and not acquired by the favor or patronage of Government; yet the whole of the arguments against this bill are based upon this principle—the principle that the Government is bound to furnish the means to the citizens, not only of obtaining a livelihood, but of accumulating a fortune. Sir, this is the language of tyranny and despotism, to promise the people much for the purpose of gaining sufficient power to rob them of all. I heartily agree in the sentiment expressed by the President, "that all communities are apt to look to Government for too much. Even in our country, where its powers and duties are so strictly limited, we are prone to do so, especially at periods of sudden embarrassment and distress. But this ought not to be. The framers of our excellent Constitution, and the people who approved it with calm and serious deliberation, acted at the same time on a sounder principle. They wisely judged that the less the Government should interfere with private pursuits, the better for the general prosperity. It is not its legitimate object to make men rich, or to repair, by direct grants of money, or by legislation in favor of particular pursuits, the losses not incurred in the public service. This would be, substantially, to use the property of some for the benefit of others; but its real duty—that duty, the performance of which makes a good Government the most precious of human blessings—is to enact and enforce the system of general laws commensurate with, but not exceeding, the objects of its establishment, and to leave every citizen and every interest to reap, under its benign influence, the rewards of virtue, industry, and prudence." The President further says: "I cannot doubt that on this, as on all similar occasions, the Federal Government will find its agency most conducive to the security and happiness of the people, when limited to the exercise of its conceded powers. In never assuming, for a well meant object, such powers as were not designed to be conferred upon it, we shall in reality do most for the general welfare. To avoid every unnecessary interference with the pursuits of the citizen, will result in more benefit than to adopt measures which could only assist limited interests."

Sir, these are the sentiments of our Republican citizens, and of that eminent man, whom they have called to preside over the affairs of the country; they are sentiments, in the belief of which I have grown up, and they now form the creed of my political faith, and in the belief of which I expect to die. But, sir, this is not the political doctrine which the opposers of this Administration inculcate. Their doctrine teaches a servile dependence of the people upon the Government for the promotion of individual or local interests. A doctrine which makes the people nothing within themselves; and the Government every thing for the promotion of their pecuniary interests. This is the doctrine of despotism; and the means by which tyrants have always seized upon power. Establish it here, and your boasted liberty will be but an empty sound, a mere delusive phantom, of which you will soon lose even the sight. It has been thundered in our ears that the great question is, whether the people shall have bread or no bread. This sound was first heard from the consuming classes of our great commercial cities; it originated with those, who not only lived upon their own credit themselves, but had sold that credit to their laborers and dependants, and when it failed and became worthless, for want of a "BASIS," they came forward and asked the Government to sustain it in its sinking condition, by permitting them to amalgamate it with the credit of the Government; and because this unjust application is refused they raise the cry of bread or no bread, and declare that the Government is withholding bread from the people; indeed this false and groundless position is assumed on this floor. Gentlemen have asserted the same thing; indeed they have gone still further. It has been said, but I do not deem it necessary to designate gentlemen by reference, that the duty of the Government, as I understand them, is, to provide bread for the people. "The duty of the Government to provide bread for the people!" clothing, also, I suppose! This idea of providing, by the Government, for the private wants of the people, has in it nothing new. It has been long practised by men whose object was to overturn the Government of their country, and we find this scheme resorted to in almost every age of the world. When the unnatural son of the Jewish King wished to dethrone his father, he made use of this same principle; he told every man who had any application to make to the Government that his matters were just and right, but there was no one deputed to hear him; and he, also, told all such if he were made judge in the land, that he would do every man justice. I fear, sir, the same disposition is felt and breathed from many a heart, in this our day. "Oh! that I were made President of these United States, then should every man have bread." I trust the last scene of Absalom's career will not be theirs. And Watt Tyler, too, if I mistake not the name, promised the people of England, in his attempt to break down the Government of that country, that when he obtained rule, a four penny loaf should be sold for two pence, and the price of ale should be reduced; he also endeavored to make the people believe that a change in the Administration would give them abundance of bread. In every age, and in every country in which the people have not relied for their support and comfort upon their own individual industry, but have consented to be fed like cattle from the public crib, the downfall of freedom has been sure, and the establishment of despotism certain. If the gentleman who have urged this doctrine, can prove and sustain his principles, if I was disposed to exchange liberty for inglorious ease, I would not only agree to make him President, but President for life, with (as gentlemen now contend the President has) all the power of the country in his hands; for then we should have nothing to do, but to eat, drink, and praise our good Emperor, and obey his commands! Why, sir, one gentleman has said the banks could resume specie payments to-morrow, if confidence was restored, and that confidence depends on the breath of the Government. This is to me a strange and dangerous doctrine; it is an admission that all confidence depends on the Government. This can by no means admit: confidence depends on moral honesty alone. The Government has not the power to make men either moral or honest, though it may punish individuals for a violation of either.

It has been repeatedly said, that we who are in favor of separating the Government from the banks, are in favor of a Government bank, by which the power of the Executive is to be vastly increased. Yes, sir, the title page of the speech of the honorable Senator from Kentucky, now before me, makes this declaration, which the speech itself was intended to prove. I will read that title page: "Speech of the Hon. HENRY CLAY, of Kentucky, establishing a deliberate design on the part of the late and present Executive of the United States to break down the whole banking system of the United States, and to create on their ruins a Treasury Government bank, etc." Sir, that Senator is decidedly in favor of a bank created by Congress. Prove to me that Congress has power to create a national bank, or to adopt the State banks as fiscal agents, and that this Government cannot carry on its operations without the aid of a bank, and that the people require a paper currency issued by banks, in order to enable them to transact their necessary business with advantage; prove this, and I go for a Government bank at once; just such a bank which seems to excite so much terror in the minds of gentlemen. Pray, why should I not? If Government has the power to create a corporation, and own one-fifth of its stock, as was the case in the late Bank of the United States, it has the power to create a like corporation, and own all the stock. It can create such corporation, owning all the stock, and for its own use, with all the powers of contracting, being contracted with, and the liabilities of suing and being sued, as if it owned but a part of the stock. If such constitutional power exists, which I do not admit, the expediency and safety is clearly in favor of a Government bank. What are the banking operations, but the barter of credit with individuals, in which barter the bank is allowed six per cent. discount on the credit they buy, and for which they give nothing in return but their own credit? The credit of individuals thus bought by the banks amounts, at this time, to upwards of 450,000,000 of dollars; the annual interest on this sum, which is paid by the productive classes of the United States to the banks, is twenty-seven millions. Thus this beautiful system, which gentlemen admire and love so fervently, enables a few bankers to tax, or rather unjustly draws from the people of the United States a larger sum than is required to pay the entire expense of the Government. If the people of this country must sell their credit for a credit more extensively passable than their own, permit them, I beg you, to sell it to the Government itself, and take the Government credit in the form of bank notes, on the same terms as they obtain the notes of existing banks, and thus the twenty-seven millions which is now paid to a few individuals, by which extravagance and luxury is introduced into our country, would go into the Treasury of the nation, and would in a great degree supersede the entire system of taxation. But gentlemen say this would enlarge the Executive power, and strengthen the hands of this Government to a dangerous extent. In my opinion the reverse is the truth of the case. If the Government must be connected with the banking system at all, a Government bank would be the least dangerous, because it would be constantly under the control of the people, through the medium of their representatives in Congress. While, if the Government was ever allowed to attach itself to private corporations, or take them under its care and protection, it might, by their means, set the people at defiance, and rule them by a power beyond their control. This Government can never be too strong for the people while all its powers can be acted on by the elective franchise; but vest any portion of its power in hands from which the people cannot recal it, as is claimed for corporations, and you have a sure foundation laid by which the Government can soon make itself fearfully strong.

But we are also told that the Executive power would be increased by a Government bank. I am not one of those who fear Executive power in this country; that branch of our system has very little original and inherent power which can operate against popular liberty. Most of its actual powers are derived from, and exercised under, the control of the other branches of Government. It can never reach the liberty of the country without their co-operation, and through their means. I said in my place, on a former occasion, and I now repeat it, if the American people ever lose their liberty, it will take place by the act of an American Congress, and the opening scene of the grand tragedy will be on the floor of the Senate. Executive power, nor no other power, foreign or domestic, can ever successfully assail the liberties of this country, if the representatives of the people are faithful to their trust. If, then, we are to have a banking system and a paper currency, give me a Government bank and Government paper. A bank of this kind would be constantly under the power of the people, and subject to their control, through their representatives in Congress. All those appointed to manage its concerns could be chosen by joint resolution; and Executive influence be entirely excluded, if that influence should be thought dangerous in such an institution as this. And why do not gentlemen, who are so anxious for a bank of the United States, propose a scheme of this kind? The answer is obvious; its profits would belong to the whole people, and not to a favored few. It could not be used by political men against the Government, and of course would lose its charm upon those who are striving for place and power. It would not establish an aristocracy of wealth screened behind corporate privileges,

It would not establish castes and distinctions in society, and of course would not suit the taste of those who believe that one class of men will always live upon the labor of others. If the banking system, as now contended for, would not accomplish all this, it would have, I fear, but few friends among those who now advocate it.

We are told, however, that the object which the Administration and its friends have in view, is, to break down all the State banks, in order to secure their favorite project of an exclusive metallic currency. Sir, so far as this charge may reach me, I cannot admit its correctness. State banks are creatures of State power alone, with which this Government has no concern whatever. No act of mine here shall either break them down or build them up, if I can understand correctly what I am doing. I disapprove of general denunciations against them on this floor, and all I have said respecting them has been with the view of showing the propriety and necessity of separating from, and leaving them entirely uninfluenced by, any action of Congress. Their friends, however, contend (which I do not admit) that they need a supervisory or controlling power beyond that of the State which created them; that they need a general regulator to equalize the currency; that a bank created by Congress only can do that.

Sir, in the years 1822, '23, '24, and '25, (or about that time,) the Bank of the United States being in full operation, each city, town, and village, had then, as they have now, a table of depreciation for bank notes. In Tennessee, from a statement before me, made by one of the honorable Senators from that State, who was then President of the Knoxville Bank, bank paper in that State ranged from fifteen to twenty-five per cent. discount. It was more than that, according to my recollection, in Ohio, and stay laws and relief systems was the consequence; which laws always oppress the laboring classes, and benefit the speculator only; and every act of the Government which has for its object the promotion of individual interests, is sure to operate in the same way. No error is so great and mischievous in legislation, as to pass laws with our minds fixed on individual cases instead of general principles. We ought never to judge of principles by cases, but always to bring cases to the test of principle. But, sir, suppose we concede to gentlemen all they have said, and the full force of all their arguments. They contend that the majority here are wrong, and that continually. Will they permit us to borrow their mantle—the mantle by which it is attempted to cover every deformity and every usurpation—the broad mantle that all act for the general welfare? This, if sufficient for them, is sufficient for us; and, like Aaron's rod, it can be made to swallow up every remainining fragment of the Constitution. If we admit the latitude in which gentlemen use this argument, we have nothing left as a means of safety from the usurpation of power. One gentleman has contended that the power to levy and collect taxes or money from the people, is a power, the extent of which is governed alone by this clause of the Constitution, and that it can be exercised by Congress ad libitum, and that the co-ordinate power to appropriate money when collected, is governed by the same rule. I may not state the arguments of gentlemen verbatim, but I feel sure I state them substantially.

Sir, this broad doctrine places the whole productive industry of the country within the power of Congress; it vests in Congress the absolute right to every species of property, making the people the dependants, and not the masters of the Government. For, if this extravagant idea of the taxing power be true, we can at once see that it may be exercised so as to bring the whole property of the people within its grasp, and then parcel it out to retainers and sycophants at its will. Thus changing its very nature, as well as ownership. Who among our constitutents ever dreamed, that in clothing us with the power of a reprepresentative, he gave us an absolute control, for the time being, over his entire estate. Yet to this latitudinarian construction of the Constitution are gentlemen compelled to come to sustain the position they assume, that Congress is bound to furnish a currency for the country. I am, myself, clearly of opinion, that this last position is the most indefensible and dangerous part of the whole system. Give to Congress the power to make at its pleasure a currency for the people, and you vest in and confer upon that body, the highest prerogative claimed by a crown, and one that is in the very face of the Constitution itself. When I cease to oppose doctrines of this kind, I shall do so because I have more convincing arguments in its favor than I have heard on the present occasion, and this I believe no one need expect to hear. I am fully convinced, that, in our Government, the taxing power is to be exercised for specific purposes, and taxes can only be paid in money. I am not entirely without authority on this last point. I find that the Supreme Court of the State New York, in a case reported in 6th Johnson, decided, that the word taxes meant a contribution by the people in money, not labor or other articles, and I contend that this is the true and only meaning of the word, as used in the Constitution of the United States. But gentlemen attempt to get over this palpable truth, by asserting that whatever Congress receives as money, is money. In their imaginations the touch of Congress, like the touch of Midas, turns every thing with which it comes in contact into gold. If we can make the American people believe such fables as these, it is no wonder that they look to Congress for bread.

But gentlemen, in their hostility to the Administration, change even their love for the paper system. They shudder with a kind of political horror at the sight of a Treasury note, and even in this debate have held them up before our eyes in derision of the Government. The Government has done nothing in this case to merit censure from the most fastidious. It has done that which an honest man would do under like circumstances. Permit me, sir, to illustrate my ideas by a familiar and given case. I agree to pay my honorable colleague, who sits on my right, a certain sum of money for services which he is to render. I have the money on hand, and, wishing to keep it safely for that purpose, I deposite it with my honorable friend from Pennsylvania, who sits before me, as one in whom I have entire confidence. My colleague performs the service; he applies to me for payment; I call on my friend for the money I deposited with him; he refuses to return it, and, like the banks, informs me he has stopped specie payment. Sir, I have been deceived, and all I can do is to remunerate, as far as possible, my colleague for his disappointment. I still have credit left, though no money. I give him my note payable at a given period, bearing such interest as will enable him to convert it into money if he should wish to do so. Have I done wrong? No: but I have suffered wrong; and what difference, I pray you, exists between the act of the Government in the issue of Treasury notes and the case I have put? Congress made appropriations of the public money on hand, and, in order to keep it safely, and have it ready to meet those appropriations when the object for which they were made was accomplished, deposited the money in the State banks; with the most solemn assurance on the part of the banks to refund it when called for. The appropriations being needed, application was made to the banks for the money, who very unceremoniously informed the Government that they had stopped specie payments. The Government being thus deceived and imposed upon by these corporations, over whom it could exercise no legal control, informed its creditors that they should have the notes of the Government, bearing such interest as would make them equal to money, making those notes payable in a short time. This is "the whole head and front of the offence" which gentlemen charge upon the Government in this affair. It is no more. The country will soon consider this question, and I have no doubt rightfully decide it. I rejoice in the thought that I live under a Government where gentlemen opposed to its administration, of such great ability and untiring industry, have not been able to produce a charge against it of a more serious character than this, and one which can be no better sustained. The shafts which they hurl most assuredly rebound upon themselves.

I fear Mr. President that I am wearying the patience of the Senate, and my own state of health admonishes me to bring my remarks to a close. What I have said, brings me to the details of the bill under consideration, and my peculiar situation requires of me an explanation on this point. The bill contains two distinct and separate principles. The first provides for the safe-keeping of the public money; for which it is not only the right, but the duty of Congress to provide. The second undertakes to describe the funds to be received in payment of revenue. It contains, in my opinion, this contradictory and unconstitutional provision. That the resolution of 1816, so far as it authorizes the receipt in payment of taxes, duties, sales of the public lands, debts or sums of money accruing or becoming due to the United States, to be collected and paid in the notes of specie paying banks, shall be so modified as that one-sixth part of such sums becoming due the United States, shall upon the 1st day of December next, be paid in the legal currency of the United States, and thus rateably increasing in the same proportion, for the term of six years.

For this provision I cannot vote, because it is contrary to all the settled doctrines and opinions that I have advanced during the whole course of my political life, and because it, also, is at war with the opinions I have expressed, and concedes the whole ground to the Opposition, that whatever Congress calls money and receives as such, is money; and above all, it establishes and gives up the principle that Congress may, under certain circumstances, connect this Government with the banking institutions of the States. If we admit the principle, we give up the whole ground for which we have been contending. It is true, that, at the late session of Congress, I voted for a somewhat similar provision in the bill then before the Senate, on the same subject, but I did so under a kind of duress, and reflection has satisfied me that my vote then was wrong. I voted in a minority of only six at the preceding session, on an amendment offered by the Senator from Virginia, containing the same principle as the substitute he has now offered. I gave that vote without consultation with any human being, and I was much gratified to find myself in the majority when called on to give a like vote at the extra session, I then hoped that this question was settled, and that bank paper would not again be named as a proper receipt into the Treasury, but in this it seems I am mistaken.

My first objection to the constitutionality of the act incorporating the Bank of the United States, was that it permitted the notes of that institution to be received in payment of the public dues. That opinion I have never changed. I am constrained, therefore, by every consideration, to vote against this bill, should this provision be continued in it. It is true, sir, there are other expressions and details in the bill, which, though involving no important principle, I would gladly see altered. I dislike the parade of bars, bolts, safes, and iron chests, and receivers general, which it contemplates; all which are matters of show, more than necessity. They have already here been used as strong objections; and should the bill so pass, we must undervalue the sagacity of our opponents, if they do not use them with more success in the country. The honest, unsuspecting citizen will be taught to believe that those in office are attempting to seize on the public money for their own use; and that all this device is for that purpose; that as soon as these coffers are filled, the Government will declare itself independent of the people.

It is true there is nothing in all this argument, yet, if one election can be gained by it, a valuable purpose, no doubt, to some gentlemen, will be answered. In refusing to promise by law the receiving of bank notes in payment of public dues, it is not intended, in the least degree, to discredit those institutions, which belong exclusively to the States, and subject alone to State power, and State control. That the policy of the country is now, in some degree, connected with the banking system, I readily admit; but this is a domestic policy, operating differently in the several States, not brought upon the people by an act of Congress, nor does Congress rightfully possess the power to regulate it. The condition of the country, brought upon it by the action of the State Governments, never ought to change the principles of the laws to be passed by Congress, or be considered as giving to Congress new and enlarged powers. Constitutional power always remains the same; but expediency is the creature of circumstance. So far, then, as we are in the midst of banking operations, as far as expediency alone may require, I would be willing to go.

In framing a law for the collection and safe-keeping of the public treasure, I would use words of the most plain and obvious meaning: the funds to be collected should be in money, because this is the proper constitutional term to be used for that purpose. I would cause this money to be kept safely between the time of its collection and disbursement, by men appointed for that purpose, and who, for mismanagement or embezzlement, should be liable to all the penalties of this bill. I would place payment for public land on the same footing as payment for taxes, duties, or customs. I would not blame or censure any one connected in the collection of the revenue, if, in its receipt, he acted with that care and sound discretion which prudent and honest men ought, in the management of their private affairs. If a collector took bank notes it should be on the responsibility of himself and sureties; if he, in such receipt, acted honestly, as a private man would act in such case, believing that he could convert such notes into money, at his pleasure, the bank being a specie paying bank at the time such notes had been received, and should afterwards fail, I would willingly release him in such case from all liability. Though I cannot sanction, by positive enactment, such a course as this, yet as bank paper is at present the principal currency of the country, I would, on the ground of expediency, adopt the course I have suggested. I well know that I have not the power to effect any alteration or amendment in the bill before us. I shall not attempt to do so, but submit to that necessity which compels me to vote against it, and leave my course to be judged of, approved, or condemned, by those to whom I am immediately accountable, and by my country at large.

THE INDEPENDENT TREASURY BILL.

SPEECH OF MR. BENTON, OF MISSOURI,

IN SENATE, WEDNESDAY, March 14, 1838,

ON THE BILL TO SEPARATE THE GOVERNMENT FROM THE BANKS.

Mr. BENTON commenced his speech with remarking upon the different manners in which the discussion of the bill had been conducted on the different sides of the House. The chairman of the Finance Committe, [Mr. WRIGHT,] who had reported the bill, and opened the debate, had done it in a most business like manner; his luminous and masterly exposition of principles and details being entirely confined to the subject, and never once deviating into extrinsic matter, or touching upon any topic of party, or partisan character. Not so the speeches of the Opposition Senators. From the very beginning they launched into the ocean of party politics, and made the bill the occasion for a general attack upon the Republican Administrations of General Jackson and Mr. Van Buren, such as we have been accustomed to see for a long time on this floor. The debate has been conducted by them as an attack upon a party, and as a contest for power, and not as an inquiry into the merits of the bill. The speeches they have delivered have been such as might be expected at the partisan encounters of the hustings, on the stump, or at barbecue dinners, in the course of an electioneering campaign for an elective office, and not such as would be looked for in the parliamentary discussion of a legislative measure.

In this attack it has been assumed for granted that the country has been ruined by, what is called, the mad and wicked administration of General Jackson; and that President Van Buren being pledged to carry out his line of policy, is of course pledged to go on ruining the country, and therefore ought to be resisted and overthrown. I propose to inquire into the truth of these assumptions, and to ascertain, first, how far it is true that the country has, in point of fact, been ruined; next, how far this ruin, if any, has been the work of General Jackson's administration; and, after settling these preliminary points, I shall have something to say on the merits of the bill, and something on the peculiar system of party warfare of which this Senate has been the scene for the last six years.

In making my inquiries into the ruin of the country, I am not left to grapple with vague generalities and pointless declamation. Fortunately for me, the Opposition orators have descended to specifications, and have shown wherein this ruin has been perpetrated. Their specifications embrace almost every branch of foreign or domestic policy; and, taking the era of the second Mr. Adams's administration, when themselves were in power, and their cherished national bank was in its meridian—taking this period as the culminating point of our America's prosperity, felicity, and renown, they trace a rapid descent, from that high point of national pre-eminence, down the steep road to destruction, until the entire nation is landed in total perdition in the year of our Lord, 1837. They have given us specifications, but there they stop. No proof, no statistics, no statements, no comparative tables, accompany their specifications to establish their truth. Bold assertion, and terrifying descriptions, occupy the place of proof. These fierce denunciators assume the prerogative of genius; they assume to be independent of facts and of reasons; and they rely upon flights of fancy, dashes of imagination, and fierceness of invective, to supply the place of proof and argument. I have no pretension to this prerogative. I am a plain speaker, and tell what I know, and then prove it. Reversing then the method of our opponents, I shall discard altogether the painted and gilded creations of the imagination, and shall confine myself to the effective logic of facts and figures.

At the head of the specfications of gentlemen, is the article of commerce, both foreign and domestic, each asserted to have been prostrated and sacrificed by the fatal policy of General Jackson's administration. We will test the truth of this bold assertion; and for that purpose will have recourse to data which no gentleman will be at liberty to question. And, first, of domestic commerce. The great West shall be our first field of inquiry, and, casting the eye over the broad expanse of that magnificent region, we see two points at which the commerce of the upper half of the valley of the Mississippi, is subjected to a process which allows it to be annually, and easily, counted and compared. These points are, the Louisville canal for the commerce of the Ohio, and the port of St. Louis, for the commerce of the Upper Mississippi. Referring to the evidence obtained at these two points, and we have exact accounts of the commerce in the two largest sections of the West, and data for estimating the condition of the remainder. In each instance the statement goes back seven years, that is to say, to the second year of General Jackson's administration, and comes down to the first year of Mr. Van Buren's. For the Louisville canal, the official return stands thus:

Abstract of the boats that have passed, and tolls received on the Louisville and Portland Canal.

Year.	Steamboats.	Flat and keel boats.	Tons.	Amount received.
1831	406	421	76,323	$12 750 77
1832	453	179	70,109	25.756 12
1833	875	710	169 885	60,736 92
1834	938	623	162,000	61.848 17
1835	1,256	355	200,413	80.165 24
1836	1,182	260	182.220	88,313 23
1837	1,501	165	242.374	145,424 69
	6,611	2,713	1,103,324	$475,025 14

Mr. B. read over this table, and then commented upon some parts of it. The increase in the number of steamboats which passed the canal had increased four-fold in seven years; and the year of ruin—1837—had presented as large an increase as any preceding one had done. But the number of steamboats was not the most correct criterion; the tonnage is more accurate, especially as it includes flats and keel boats; and, tested by the tonnage, it will be seen that the increase was three-fold in seven years, and that the year of ruin presented an increase of 60,000 tons over that of the preceding year. So much for the prostration of commerce on the Ohio river, and in Kentucky itself, in this black year of perdition and destruction!

The commeree of the port of St. Louis was the second test to which Mr. B. subjected the domestic commerce of the country. St. Louis was a port of entry by law, and a port of destination by position for nearly all the boats which entered it. It was not merely a touching or stopping point for boats bound elsewhere, but was a port of destination for the delivery of cargoes, and the reception of lading. I have the statement of its steamboat commerce for seven years; and this is the result:

Years.	Number of different boats.	Their tonnage.	Number of entries.
1831	60	7,796	432
1832	80	9,250	508
1833	99	12,222	573
1834	110	13,173	607
1835	121	15,470	803
1836	144	19,447	1,355
1837	195	22,794	1,607

Mr. B. remarked upon this exhibit as corresponding wonderfully with that of the Louisville canal, and showing an increase of nearly four fold in the commerce of St. Louis, under the impracticable and outlandish administration, as it was called, of General Jackson, and a large increase in the year of ruin over that of any preceding year—even the bloated year of 1836. The arriving and departing tonnage for the year 1837, was 450,821 tons, the far greater part of it being the growth of seven years, and that not only without banks, but upon the loss of one—the loss of the United States Branch Bank, which wound up after the veto of 1832; and from which time the commerce of the city advanced with gigantic strides, and established itself upon foundations too solid to be overthrown by any convulsion.

The foreign commerce of some of the principal seaports, next claimed the attention of Mr. B. He took the ports of Boston, New York, Philadelphia, Baltimore, Charleston, and New Orleans, as presenting leading points in the different sections of the Union, and compared the imports in those cities during the administration of Mr. Adams, when the Federal party and the Federal bank were in full power, with those, not of 1836, which was a year of bloat and over-action, but with the year of ruin—1837—when the mad and wicked measures of the absurd, impracticable, and outlandish measures of the administration of the Republicans had produced the full measure of their fatal destruction. He presented a table, compiled for him at the Treasury Department, and read it.

Statement of the value of imports into the United States, for the years and ports mentioned.

	1825.	1826.	1827.	1828.	1837.
Boston	15,845,000	14,349,000	11,170,000	12,674,000	17,940,000
New York	49,639,000	38,063,000	38,684,000	41,863,000	78,543,000
Philad'a.	15,041,000	13,543,000	11,212,000	12,884,000	11,680,000
Baltimore	4,751,000	4,917,000	4,400,000	5,620,000	7,857,000
Charleston	1,892,000	1,534,000	1,434,000	1,241,000	2,610,000
N. Orleans	4,290,000	4,167,000	4,531,000	6,217,000	14,020,000

Remarking upon this table, Mr. B. said that, the year of ruin presented an increase of business in every port except that of Philadelphia, far exceeding the proportionate increase of population. Taking the last year of Mr. Adams's administration, as the one most favorable to the Opposition, and it would be seen that, at Boston, the increase of importations was five millions of dollars in value; in New York, the increase was thirty-seven millions; in Baltimore, above two millions; in Charleston, more than double; in New Orleans, doubled, and a million and a half over. Philadelphia, the seat of the great bank, was the only place that exhibited a decline: all the rest exhibited a vast improvement, and the further off from the Philadelphia protector the better. The case of Charleston was particularly striking. The commerce of that city regularly declined from year to year, under the withering influence of the high tariff policy, during the administration of Mr. Adams, and the presence of a branch bank of the great regulator. It declined for four years; then rapidly recovered under the administration of General Jackson; and, in the year of ruin was double the amount of the last year of Mr. Adams's time.

Mr. B. referred to the exports, and imports of specie, to show the further superiority of the year of ruin over the finest year of Mr. Adams's administration, or even the whole of it put together. His averment was, that the gain on the import of specie, over the exports, was, for the year 1837, four millians and a quarter of dollars, while, for the whole four years of Mr. Adams's administration, the gain was but one million. On these points he exhibited these tables:

	Imports.	Exports.
1825 -	$6,150,130	$8,797,955
1826 -	6,880,960	4,704,553
1827 -	8,152,130	8,014,880
1828 -	7,489,741	8,243,476

Making a total of about 30 millions and a half of imports, and about 29 millions and a half of exports. The same test for the year of ruin, exhibited $10,964,432 for the imports, and $6,714,000 for the exports.

Pursuing the tests of the comparative prosperity of the two periods, Mr. B. came to the sales of the public lands, which stood thus:

1825 - -	$1,205,068
1826 - -	1,128,617
1827 - -	1,318,105
1828 - -	1,221,357
1837 - -	7,004,538

Here again the year of ruin appears, said Mr. B. in victorious contrast with the whole period of Mr. Adams's administration. The sales of the single year are equal to six years of such sales as occurred from 1825 to 1828. The sales in Indiana alone, during this year of ruin, exceeded the sales of the best year in Mr. Adams's time, for they amount to $1,565,390. The same may nearly be said of Illinois, where the sales for 1837 amount to $1,266,775. The whole of these sales were for hard money; for the Treasury order was in full operation during the whole year. The entire sum of seven millions was received in specie, and the one half of it after the banks had suspended payment. This fact was the fullest vindication of that order. It showed the error of all the caculations which were made upon the effect of that order. It showed that the farmers had no difficulty in getting hard money to buy lands. The quantity sold in 1837 was bought by farmers, and not by speculators. The Treasury order expelled the speculators, with their bales of borrowed bank notes, from the field. It operated as a pre-emption law in favor of cultivators. It is now operating as a pre-emption law in their favor, and, as such, ought to be sustained and supported by all the friends of the settlers. The respectable Legislature of Indiana had passed resolutions against this order; but the resolutions were founded in mistake, as the land sales of the year and of their own State will fully prove. All that are in favor of settlers against speculators should be in favor of that order; for hard money payment is the only thing which can put the farmer above the competition of the bank facility purchasers.

Mr. B. then exhibited the detailed statement of the sales of the public lands for 1837, to show that, under the operation of the Treasury order, and in the year of ruin, the prosperity of the farming interest, as indicated by their ability to purchase, and to pay for, public lands, was in the ratio of six to one over that of Mr. Adams's time.

The ruin of the currency was the next topic which Mr. B. took up. No money, was the cry. Commerce, labor, industry of every kind, stagnant, languishing, paralyzed for want of money to put the wheels of business in motion! Such is the lamentation which fills this chamber, and is re-echoed every where. But is it true? Is it true that the country is destitute of money, or only that banks and capitalists have locked it up, and laid it away, to create fictitious scarcity, and thereby aid politicians in promoting discontent and in accomplishing a political revolution? This is the question, and let authentic facts answer it. What is the actual amount of currency, paper as well as specie, now in existence in our country? The most recent, and authentic, estimates will place the amount at about one hundred and seventy millions of dollars; namely, eighty millions of specie, and ninety-five millions of bank notes. The specie was computed at that amount a year ago, and has been increased near five millions during the year 1837—the year of ruin, and is now daily increasing; the bank notes now in actual circulation are computed at ninety-five millions by the gentleman in the Treasury Department, charged with collecting the returns and expositions of the banks, and who has made out this statement at my special request, to be used upon this occasion. Precise accuracy he knows to be unattainable, but a close approximation to the true amount is easily accomplished where publicity of bank reports are so general as they now are. The quantum of one hundred and seventy millions may then be assumed as the amount of the currency now in existence in the United States. How will this amount compare with periods proclaimed to have been prosperous, and held up for our unceasing admiration and gratitude? There are two of those periods, each marking the termination of a National Bank charter, and each presenting us with the actual results of the operations of those institutions upon the general currency, and each replete with lessons of instruction applicable to the present day, and to the present state of things. The first of these periods is the year 1811, when the first National Bank had ran its career of twenty years, and was permitted by Congress to expire upon its own limitation. I take for my guide the estimate of Mr. Lloyd, then a Senator in Congress from the State of Massachusetts, whose dignity of character and amenity of manners is so pleasingly remembered by those who served with him here, and whose intelligence and accuracy entitle his statements to the highest degree of credit. That eminent Senator estimated the total currency of the country, at the expiration of the charter of the first National Bank, at sixty millions of dollars, to wit: ten millions specie, and fifty millions in bank notes. Now compare the two quantities, and mark the results. Our population has precisely doubled itself since 1811. The increase of our currency should, therefore, upon the same principle of increase, be the double of what it then was; yet it is three times as great as it then was! The next period which challenges our attention is the veto session of 1832, when the second Bank of the United States, according to the opinion of its eulogists, had carried the currency to the ultimate point of perfection. What was the amount then? According to the estimate of a Senator from Massachusetts, then and now a member of this body, [Mr. WEBSTER,] then a member of the Finance committee, and with every access to the best information, the whole amount of currency was then estimated at about 100 millions; to wit: 20 millions in specie, and 75 to 80 millions in bank notes. The increase of our population since that time is estimated at 20 per cent.; so that the increase of our currency, upon the basis of increased population, should also be 20 per cent. This would give an increase of 20 millions of dollars, making, in the whole, 120 millions. Thus, our currency in actual existence, is nearly one-third more than either the ratio of 1811 or of 1832 would give. Thus, we have actually about 50 millions more, in this season of ruin and destitution, than we should have, if supplied only in the ratio of what we possessed at the two periods of what is celebrated as the best condition of the currency, and most prosperous condition of the country. So much for quantity; now for the solidity of the currency at these respective periods. How stands the question of solidity? Sir, it stands thus: In 1811, five paper dollars to one of silver; in 1832, four to one; in 1838, one to one, as near as can be! Thus, the comparative solidity of the currency is infinitely preferable to what it ever was before; for the increase, under the sagacious policy of General Jackson, has taken place precisely where it was needed—at the bottom, and not at the top; at the foundation, and not in the roof; at the base, and not at the apex. Our paper currency has increased but little; we may say nothing, upon the bases of 1811 and 1832; our specie has increased immeasurably; no less than eight fold, since 1811, and four fold since 1832. The whole increase is specie; and of that we have 70 millions more than in 1811, and 60 millions more than in 1832. Such are the fruits of General Jackson's policy! a policy which we only have to persevere in for a few years, to have our country as amply supplied with gold and silver as France and Holland are; that France and Holland in which gold is borrowed at 3 per cent. per annum, while we often borrow paper money at 3 per cent. a month.

But there is no specie. Not a nine-pence to be got for a servant; not a picayune for a beggar; not a ten cent piece for the post office. Such is the assertion; but how far is it true? Go to the banks, and present their notes at their counter, and it is all too true. No gold, no silver, no copper to be had there in redemption of their solemn promises to pay. Metaphorically, if not literally speaking, a demand for specie at the counter of a bank might bring to the unfortunate applicant more kicks than coppers. But change the direction of the demand; go to the brokers; present the bank note there; no sooner said than done; gold and silver springs forth in any quantity; the notes are cashed; you are thanked for your custom, invited to return again; and thus, the counter of the broker, and not the counter of the bank, becomes the place for the redemption of the notes of the bank. The only part of the transaction that remains to be told, is the per centum which is shaved off! And, whoever will submit to that shaving, can have all the bank notes cashed which he can carry to them. Yes, Mr. President, the brokers, and not the bankers, now redeem the bank notes. There is no dearth of specie for that purpose. They have enough to cash all the notes of the banks, and all the Treasury notes of the Government into the bargain. Look at their placards! not a village, not a city, not a town in the Union, in which the sign-boards do not salute the eye of the passenger, inviting him to come in and exchange his bank notes, and Treasury notes, for gold and silver. And why cannot the banks redeem, as well as the brokers? Why can they not redeem their own notes? Because a veto has issued from the city of Philadelphia, and because a political revolution is to be effected by injuring the country, and then charging the injury upon the folly and wickedness of the Republican Administrations. This is the reason, and the sole reason. The Bank of the United States, its affiliated institutions, and its political confederates, are the sole obstacles to the resumption of specie payments. They alone prevent the resumption. It is they who are now in terror lest the resumption shall begin, and to prevent it, we hear the real shout, and feel the real application of the rallying cry, so pathetically uttered on this floor by the Senator from Massachusetts, [Mr. WEBSTER,]—once more to the breach, dear friends, once more!

Yes, Mr. President, the cause of the non-resumption of specie payments is now plain and undeniable. It is as plain as the sun at high noon, in a clear sky. No two opinions can differ about it, how much tongues may differ. The cause of not resuming is known, and the cause of suspension will soon be known likewise. Gentlemen of the Opposition charge the suspension upon the folly, the wickedness, the insanity, the misrule, and misgovernment of the outlandish Administration, as they classically call it; expressions which apply to the people who created the Administration which have been so much villified, and who have sanctioned their policy by repeated elections. The Opposition charge the suspension to them—to their policy—to their acts—to the veto of 1832—the removal of the deposites of 1833—the Treasury order of 1836—and the demand for specie for the Federal Treasury. This is the charge of the politicians, and of all who follow the lead, and obey the impulsion of the denationalized Bank of the United States. But what say others whose voice should be potential, and even omnipotent, on this question? What say the New York city banks, where the suspension began, and whose example was alleged for the sole cause of suspension by all the rest? What say these banks, whose position is at the fountain head of knowledge, and whose answer for themselves is an answer for all. What say they? Listen, and you shall hear! for I hold in my hand a report of a committee of these banks, made under an official injunction, by their highest officers, and deliberately approved by all the city institutions. It is signed by Messrs. Albert Gallatin, George Newbold, C. C. Lawrence, C. Heyer, J. J. Palmer, Preserved Fish, and G. A. Worth; seven gentlemen of known and established character, and not more than one out of the seven politically friendly to the late and present Administrations of the Federal Government. This is their report:

"The immediate causes which thus compelled the banks of the city of New York to suspend specie payments, on the 10th of May last, are well known. The simultaneous withdrawing of the large public deposites, and of excessive foreign credits, combined with the great and unexpected fall in the price of the principal article of our exports, with an import of corn and bread stuffs, such as had never before occurred, and with the consequent inability of the country, particularly of the South-western States, to make the usual and expected remittances, did, at one and the same time, fall principally and necessarily, on the greatest commercial emporium of the Union. After a long and most ardous struggle, during which the banks, though not altogether unsuccessfully, resisting the imperative foreign demand for the precious metals, were gradually deprived of a great portion of their specie; some unfortunate incidents of a local nature, operating in concert with other previous exciting causes, produced distrust and panic, and finally one of those general runs, which, if continued, no banks that issue paper money payable on demand, can ever resist; and which soon put it out of the power of those of this city to sustain specie payments. The example was followed by the banks throughout the whole country, with as much rapidity as the news of the suspension in New York reached them, without waiting for an actual run, and principally, if not exclusively, on the alleged grounds of the effects to be apprehended from that suspension. Thus, whilst the New York city banks were almost drained of their specie, those in other places preserved the amount which they held before the final catastrophe."

Resuming his remarks, Mr. B. repeated, this is what they say! These are the reasons assigned by those bankers for the stoppage! and what are they? They are, 1. The simultaneous withdrawing of the deposites; 2. Excessive importations of foreign goods on credit; 3. Fall in the price of cotton; 4. Importation of wheat and flour; 5. Some unfortunate incidents of a local nature; of which the death, by supposed suicide, of one of the bank presidents, may be considered as the principal. These are the reasons! and what becomes now of the Philadelphia cry, re-echoed by politicians, and subaltern banks, against the ruinous measures of the Administration? Not a measure of the Administration mentioned! not one alluded to! Not a word about the Treasury order; not a word about the veto of the National Bank charter; not a word about the removal of the deposites from the Bank of the United States; not a word about the specie policy of the Administration! Not one word about any act of the Government, except that distribution act, disguised as a deposite law, which was a measure of Congress, and not of the Administration, and the work of the opponents and not the friends of the Administration, and which encountered its only opposition in the ranks of those friends. I opposed it, with some half dozen others; and among my grounds of opposition one was, that it would endanger the deposite banks, especially the New York city deposite banks, that it would reduce them to the alternative of choosing between breaking their customers, and being broken themselves. This was the origin of that act—the work of the Opposition on this floor; and now we find that very act to be the cause which is put at the head of all the causes which led to the suspension of specie payments. Thus, the Administration is absolved. Truth has performed its office. A false accusation is rebuked and silenced. Censure falls where it is due; and the authors of the mischief stand exposed in the double operation of having done the mischief, and then charged it upon the heads of the innocent.

But, gentlemen of the Opposition say, there can be no resumption until Congress "acts upon the currency." Until Congress acts upon the currency! that is the phrase! and it comes from Philadelphia; and the translation of it is, that there shall be no resumption until Congress submits to Mr. Biddle's bank, and recharters that institution. This is the language from Philadelphia, and the meaning of the language; but, happily, a different voice issues from the city of New York! The authentic notification is issued from the banks of that city, pledging themselves to resume by the 10th day of May. They declare their ability to resume, and to continue specie payments, and declare they have nothing to fear, except from "deliberate hostility"—an hostility for which they allege there can be no motive—but of which they delicately intimate there is danger. Philadelphia is distinctly unveiled as the seat of this danger. The resuming banks fear hostility—DELIBERATE ACTS OF HOSTILITY—from that quarter. They fear nothing from the hostility, or folly, or wickedness of this Administration. They fear nothing from the Sub-Treasury bill. They fear Mr. Biddle's bank, and nothing else but his bank, with its confederates and subalterns. They mean to resume, and Mr. Biddle means that they shall not. Henceforth two flags will be seen, hoisted from two great cities. The New York flag will have the word RESUMPTION inscribed upon it; the Philadelphia flag will bear the inscription of NON-RESUMPTION, and DESTRUCTION TO ALL RESUMING BANKS. Under the one, or the other, of these two flags, all other banks, all citizens, and each political party, will be found arranged. The whole country will divide between them, and no neutrals will be seen. In that great division, I assume to assign no one to a place. I leave it to each to find, and to take his own position. Of political parties, so far as chiefs are concerned, we can all see that their places are already taken. The Federal gentlemen are under the flag of NON-RESUMPTION; the Republicans are under the flag of RESUMPTION. My best wishes attend this latter flag; and, if need be, I shall be ready to give it a lift, and even to strain a point to help it on to victory.

I have carefully observed the conduct of the leading banks in the United States. The New York banks, and the principal deposite banks, had a cause for stopping which no others can plead, or did plead. I announced that cause, not once, but many times, on this floor; not only during the passage of the distribution law, but during the discussion of those famous land bills, which passed this chamber, and one of which ordered a peremptory distribution of sixty-four millions, by not only taking what was in the Treasury, but by reaching back, and taking all the proceeds of the land sales for years preceding. I then declared in my place, and that repeatedly, that the banks, having lent this money under our instigation, if called upon to reimburse it in this manner, must be reduced to the alternative of breaking their customers, or of being broken themselves. When the New York banks stopped, I made great allowances for them; but I could not justify others for the rapidity with which they followed their example, and still less can I justify them for their tardiness in following the example of the same banks in resuming. Now that the New York banks have come forward to redeem their obligations, and have shown that sensibility to their own honor, and that regard for the punctual performance of their promises, which once formed the pride and glory of the merchant's and the banker's character, I feel the deepest anxiety for their success in the great contest which is to ensue. Their enemy is a cunning and a powerful one, and as wicked and unscrupulous as it is cunning and strong. Twelve years ago, the president of that bank which now forbids other banks to resume, declared in an official communication to the Finance Committee of this body, "that there were but few State banks which the Bank of the United States could not DESTROY by an exertion of its POWER." Since that time it has become more powerful; and, besides its political strength, and its allied institutions, and its exhaustless mine of resurrection notes, it is computed by its friends to wield a power of one hundred and fifty millions of dollars! all at the beck and nod of one single man! for his automaton directors are not even thought of. The wielding of this immense power, and its fatal direction to the destruction of the resuming banks, presents the prospect of a fearful conflict ahead. Many of the local banks will doubtless perish in it; many individuals will be ruined; much mischief will be done to the commerce and to the business of different places; and all the destruction that is accomplished will be charged upon some act of the Administration—no matter what—for whatever is given out from the Philadelphia head is incontinently repeated by all the obsequious followers, until the signal is given to open upon some new cry.

The ruin of the exchanges, both foreign and domestic, was the next topic of lamentation which Mr. B. examined. He said that the short interval which had elapsed since the extra session had put an end to one branch of this lamentation—the branch of the foreign exchanges. At that session nothing but the recharter of the National Bank could turn the foreign exchanges in our favor, which, in May, were 22 against us. Gentlemen were just as positive of that, at the extra session, as they now are of the present total perdition of the country; yet in three brief months, and left to the operations of commerce, foreign exchange has regulated itself! and is now at 4 or 5 per cent. nominal, giving a real difference in our favor of 5 or 6 per cent. If the Congress had yielded to the clamor got up for the recharter of the National Bank at the extra session, with what exultation would not this chamber, and the whole Union, have rang! We should never have heard the last of it. As it is, the word foreign exchange is not even mentioned. That branch of the lamentation has ceased. It is the domestic exchanges which now engross all concern. The revival of the great regulator is indispensable to their restoration. To hear these gentlemen, it would be supposed that domestic exchanges were never deranged before; that during the existence of the National Bank, all moneyed exchanges were level, and equal, and equable throughout the Union. Alas! that human memory is so short and treacherous. I have in my hand, sir, a comparative statement of domestic exchanges, in the bank note department, for the glorious year of 1826, when the Federal Administration was in the middle of its reign—when the Federal Bank was in its meridian splendor—when the Senator from Kentucky, who now mourns the ruin of all things [Mr. CLAY] was in the Department of State—and when all the present orators of wo, or woful orators, as the case may be, rejoiced in the plenitude of power which their party then possessed, and celebrated the felicity of man on earth. This comparative table is made up from the prices current of Philadelphia—from the very seat and citadel of the great regulator itself—and what does it say? Listen to it, and it will tell you.

Maine, New Hampshire, Vermont, Massachusetts, Rhode Island, and Connnecticut, from 2 to 2½ per cent. discount in December, 1826; from 1½ to 2 in February, 1838. New York city, par then, and par now. Country banks of New York, 1½ to 2 per cent. discount then; par now. Baltimore, ½ then; ¾ now. Western Virginia, 4 to 5 discount then; 2½ to 3 now. North Carolina, 2½ to 5 then; 2½ to 3 now. South Carolina, 1½ to 2 then; 2½ to 3 now. Georgia, 2½ to 3 then; 3½ to 4 now. Alabama, 10 to 15 then; 9 to 9½ now. Louisiana, 5 to 6 then; 4 now. Mississippi, 10 to 16 then; 15 now. Tennessee, 10 to 20 then; 12 to 12½ now. Ohio, from 4 to 6 then; 3½ to 4 now. Kentucky—(and at the name of Kentucky, Mr. B. raised his voice, and repeated the name with great emphasis)—Kentucky, from 45 to 55, and from 55 to 35 per cent. discount then; from 3½ to 4 discount now! Let no gentleman suppose there is any mistake of figures in this reference to Kentucky. There is more than one person present who was then in Kentucky, and knows that 50 per cent. was the common difference of exchange against her currency. I myself travelled in Kentucky in that period, and know the fact, and often saw the bills of travellers and others made out double—so much in specie, and so much in Kentucky paper—and the latter precisely the double of the former. Such is the result of the comparison between the year 1826 and the year 1838; in almost every instance decidedly in favor of the present day, and in the case of Kentucky ten to one more favorable to her now than then. Yet this Senate is to be lectured, and the people of the United States to be terrified, with a tale of the ruin of these exchanges, brought about by the misrule of a senseless, wicked, impracticable, and outlandish Administration. Such is the result; the same in exchanges as in commerce and in every thing else; the country incomparably better off than it ever was before. And yet grave Senators, or Senators who ought to be grave, are seen to rise in their places, compose their faces for the expression of wo, attune their voices for the communication of lamentable sounds, and then enact the part of Volney, sitting upon the ruins of Palmyra, and bewailing the downfall of states and empires.

I will grant you, continued Mr. B. that domestic exchanges are deranged at present,—much deranged, but not so much so as in 1826; and why are they deranged now? Because specie payments are suspended; let specie payments be resumed, and domestic exchanges instantly regulate themselves, and effect the regulation upon the simple and eternal principle of the expense of freight and insurance in the transportation of metallic money. The freight and insurance of silver, between any two extreme points in the United States, is 2 per cent.; and that is the fair exchange on silver between the extremities of the Union. The exchange on gold is less than half what it is on silver, the freight being so much less; and, in addition to all other arguments in favor of a gold currency, that of being the best regulator of exchange, is one of those which presents itself to the mind of every political oconomist.

Mr. B. would make a few observations upon this subject of domestic exchanges. It was a subject on which every body had got to talking within a few years past, and which was now thrust into every argument upon the question of currency and finance. All this has grown up since the Bank of the United States had undertaken to regulate these exchanges. More had been said and written on this subject since Mr. Biddle became president of the National Bank than in two hundred years before; more in fact than had been said upon it since the day that John Cabot first came in sight of the North American coast. And why? Because in the administration of that bank, immediately after Mr. Cheves left it, commenced the abuse and perversion of the business of exchange, which was soon imitated by local banks, until it has now become a means of extorting usury, transcending all other means of extortion, and brought to bear upon people who wish to borrow money, and not to sell bills, and many of whom never heard of a bill of exchange until they learnt that it was the only way in which money could be got out of a bank. The Legislature of Indiana has just made examinations upon this subject which show the nature of the abuse; but the practice of it was inconsiderable in that State compared to what it was in other places. The returns of the deposite banks, and of the Bank of the United States, show the extent of the practice: and referring to the last of these returns made before the suspension of specie payments, and the mass of dealings in these bills, and their excessive disproportion to ordinary loans, becomes impressively striking. I could name a bank, an interior one, not in a great city, nor even on a great river, in which the purchase of bills was $690,000, while the loans in the old way, on notes, were but $4,728 and 14 cents!

[Mr. BUCHANAN and other Senators here asked for the name of the bank.]

Mr. B. said his object was to expose a general practice, and not to exhibit particular instances; but as the name of this bank was called for, he would give it with the leave of the young Senator from Ohio [Mr. ALLEN]; it was the bank in the town of his residence, Chillicothe. But why mention particular instances where the practice is general? The returns of the Bank of the United States show that twenty odd millions were often out in domestic bills of exchange; the last returns of the deposite banks, before they suspended, showed that they had forty-four millions out in that way; nine of them only had twenty-two millions in these bills; and in looking over the column of suspended debts, it is seen that default in payment chiefly occurred on this description of debts. Much of this is an abuse of exchange. Much of it is a mere mode of covering usurious loans. A citizen is forced to give a bill when he only wants to borrow; if he got the money as a loan on his note, he would pay nothing but interest, but getting it on a bill he has to pay exchange in addition to interest, and then commissions besides. Where the citizen is obliged to have the money, the bank can put the exchange at what it pleases, and so practice extortion and usury to any extent that it is willing. This business, as an abuse, began with the Bank of the United States under the administration of Mr. Biddle. It was one of my original objections to that bank. Its branches were engines for practising this abuse; and its own friends were among the first that ever complained to me about it. In the reform of the banking system, to the necessity of which the public mind is now waking up, this abuse of the business of domestic exchanges is entitled to the first notice. It is a vast system of usury, extortion, and oppression of the community, a total perversion of the business of a bank, and a source of enormous and illicit gains, enabling them, after dividing vast profits, to give to their presidents and cashiers, in many instances, salaries transcending those of our Heads of Departments, Vice-President, and Chief Justice of the Supreme Court of the United States.

Mr. B. then adverted to the ruin of prices, which had figured so largely in gentlemen's speeches on the calamities of the country. Property, produce, labor—every thing, according to them, was now without price. But how was it in the fine times of Mr. Adams's administration? Compare the prices of the two periods. Pork, then $1 25 per hundred, in the western country; wheat, some 30 odd cents per bushel; flour, $3 a barrel; cotton, 8 or 9 cents a pound; and every thing else in the same proportion. The people remember all this, and read with astonishment the distress harangues which go forth from this floor. They know very well that all prices are better now, even when reduced to the specie standard, than they were in the time of the national bank, and under the Federal Administration. They have memory, and can recollect ten or twelve years back. Memory is the lowest attribute of the mind. It belongs even to irrational animals—to cattle. And yet the Federal gentlemen do not seem to know that the people have memory, much less reason and judgment; and here is the fault, or the misfortune, of the gentlemen of the Federal party. They believe they monopolize all the intelligence of the country; and, by consequence, that the people know nothing, and will have to believe all they hear; and, thereupon, they tell them most incredible things. Now this belief of a monopoly of all the intelligence extant, would be a very sweet conceit to indulge in privately, or even to point a Bacchanalian song, or grace a barbecue speech, or to swell the exultation of midnight orgies; but it is fatal to act upon it in the business of life. The fate of the panic-makers of 1833, should warn them of that! when every panic-making candidate for the Presidency, instead of killing Jackson and Van Buren, killed himself off of the list of candidates! And when the tug of war came, they were found to be, what the broken bank notes are in the Treasury,—an unavailable fund! So may it be again. The people have memory, and knowledge, and reason, and judgment; and it will not do for politicians to treat them as wanton boys do young robins, when they throw them gravel in place of bread. The people know their own condition, and they see through the conduct of others. The farmers who were selling their produce in 1826 for the one-third, the one-half, or the three-fourths of what they are getting for it now, will not believe in the ruin of prices with which politicians assail their ears.

Mr. B. finished the comparison, or rather the contrasts, between the year of Republican ruin, and the period of Federal prosperity, with the expression of his confident belief that the fallacy of all the gentlemen's lamentations had been completely shown. There was no ruin, but in their own imaginations. The year 1837, though not equal in the general activity of business to the bloated overaction of 1836, was yet transcendently superior to any year of Mr. Adams's administration. Making a due allowance for an increase of population, and the superiority was still far beyond that increase.

Having vindicated General Jackson's Administration from the imputation of having brought ruin upon the country, Mr. B. proceeded to notice some of the wars which he was charged with waging upon some public institutions, and some branches of industry. He was charged by two Senators on this floor [Messrs. TALLMADGE and CLAY] with having made war upon the late Bank of the United States; and one of these Senators [Mr. CLAY] had charged this war to the base motive of revenge, because he could not succeed in his attempts to seduce this virtuous institution into the field of politics, and into the support of his own political views. The first remark which I have to make upon this imputed war, is upon the new idea which it presents of the right of the bank to be continued in its existence, when to oppose that continuation of existence is deemed a violation of that right, and a commencement of hostilities upon the institution. General Jackson made no movement against the existing charter of the late bank; he made no attempt to impair, or to destroy, the existing charter. The extent of his action was, to recommend to Congress the non-renewal of the charter, and, afterwards, to disapprove the new charter which Congress had granted. This was the extent of his action—directed against a non-existent, and not against an existing charter. According to the Republican reading of the Constitution, the President had a right to do these things: nay more, that it was his duty to make this recommendation, and to express this disapproval, if he thought the Constitution, or the public good, forbid the future existence of the bank. He had a clear right, under the Constitution, to do what he did; but according to the Federal reading of the Constitution, as exhibited by this objection, he had no such right; but was guilty of lawless violence, and waged war upon the institution, both in the recommendation, and in the exercise of the veto. This is the fair inference resulting from the accusation! Such is the progress of anti-republican ideas among us! ideas which go to invest a moneyed corporation with a rightful claim to a perpetuity of existence, and to stigmatize as war the constitutional exercise of Executive rights and duties.

With these remarks, to show the progress among us of ideas towards the royal doctrine of legitimacy, I come to the main inquiry—the truth of the charge itself. Is it true that General Jackson made war upon the Bank of the United States? Is it true that he was in favor of that institution, and only turned against it after his election to the Presidency, and after he had failed in an attempt to convert it into a political machine, to subserve his own political purposes? These are the questions which are now to be answered, and, happily, they will receive answers which will consign the charges to the lowest place in the deepest abyss of political calumnies. These charges first crept into daylight at the veto session of 1832, and attained their full form and shape at the famous panic session of 1833–'34. In both instances they emanated directly from the Bank of the United States itself; and in the matured form which they received in 1833, in a report of a committee of that Bank, approved by the majority of its directory, they imported that, immediately after the elevation of Gen. Jackson to the Presidency, a meeting was held, of the principal chiefs, to consider of the means of perpetuating their new authority; and the possession of the Bank was among the objects of the parties assembled. There was a combined effort to render the Bank subservient to political purposes, and to break it if it could not be bent to these purposes. This was the charge,—one very specific, and very susceptible of proof, if there was any truth in it. No proof, however, has ever been attempted by those who made it, and no other specification under it, but the forty times exploded misrepresentation about Jeremiah Mason, the president of the Portsmouth branch bank. The cabinet meeting, and the application for the removal of Mr. Mason, are fixed for the spring of 1829; and as the whole attempted seduction, or destruction, of the Bank, was then planned, and as far as seduction was concerned, was then fully tried, a date thereby presents itself which becomes the touchstone of the accusation. It is in the spring of the year 1829 that General Jackson has a meeting, and a consultation, and resolves to bend the Bank to his purposes, or to break it; and it is in June of the same year that the vile seduction is attempted, and is so indignantly repulsed! Of course, from that time forward, General Jackson could feel nothing but resentment against the unseducible Mr. Biddle, and Mr. Biddle could feel nothing but abhorrence for the man that had attempted his honor. Now mark what havoc a few stubborn dates, and a few recorded facts, will make of all this fine romance! The spring of 1829 is the date of this ferocious resolution of seduction, or destruction, and of repulse at seduction. Now what does January of 1830 bring forth? A nomination to the Senate of the United States, by General Jackson, of this same Mr. Biddle to be one of the Government directors of the bank; and nominated at the head of the list, which was tantamount to nominating him for the presidency of the bank. In the Senate this nomination is unanimously voted for by the friends of General Jackson, and Mr. Biddle accepts the appointment thus conferred. This is one date and one fact. What next? Why, in January, 1831, President Jackson repeats the same nomination; his friends in the Senate give it the same unanimous vote, and Mr. Biddle repeats his acceptance of this repeated appointment. This is a second date, and a second fact. Is there any thing more? Yes, sir, another nomination—another unanimous vote for it—and another acceptance, in January, 1832. So that three times, in three years, after resolving on the destruction of Mr. Biddle and the bank—after resolving to bend the bank to his purposes, or to break it—this violent man, who will brook no opposition to his will, replaced the same Mr. Biddle as a Government director, and indicated him for the head of the institution; and three times, in three years, after this attempted seduction, did Mr. Biddle receive appointments at the hands of the man whom, he now gives us to understand, he held in abhorrence on account of that attempt.

Mr. President, there are cases in which the wise maxims of the law—the Mosaic, as well as the civil, and the common law—require an immediate cry, and will not listen to a stale accusation. The instance before us is one of those cases. The virgin bank should have screamed in June, 1829! It was too late to begin, faintly, in May, 1832, after it was known that the veto was resolved upon, and only rise to an audible shriek in December, 1833, after the deposites had been removed. Such long delayed complaint of outrage, and then a limping and halting complaint, under such circumstances, looks more like the accusation of revenge than the shriek of injured innocence. It looks like the accusation of Pouphar's wife against Joseph. No, sir! the accusation is false upon its face. It is proven to be false by dates and facts; but the proof does not stop here. I have another piece of evidence in my possession, of character still higher, and of effect still more conclusive, to be produced if the Senate pleases: it is a letter from General Jackson himself; and being a letter, it cannot be read except by the leave of the Senate. [Cries of leave, leave, leave, from different parts of the chamber.] Mr. B. would avail himself of the leave which was granted, and would read the letter; but he first chose to explain the circumstances under which it came to be written. We have many prophets in this time, said Mr. B. but most of them are ex post facto performers in the art of divination—foretelling most accurately the whole event after it had happened. I, on the contrary, have undertaken to practice a little in the old way—to divine ahead—to prophetize of a coming event; and so, when on my way to Congress last fall, I wrote to General Jackson from my steamboat in the Ohio river, to inform him of this attack which was to be made upon him in the Senate, and to say to him that if he chose to answer it himself, and would write me a letter to that effect, I would dramatize the scene, when the attack was made, by introducing him to speak for himself. The attack has been made; and here is the answer, a letter from the Hermitage, dated November 29, 1837, all written in the old General's own hand, and written with the vigor and rapidity of an arm that was driving the British and the Indians before it. This is the letter:

"HERMITAGE, Nov. 29, 1 37.

"The charge made of my being friendly to the Bank of the United States until I found it could not be used to subserve my political purposes, when I turned against it, is one of the basest calumnies ever uttered. Such must all pronounce it who know any thing about me. I have ever opposed the establishment of this bank on grounds of both constitutionality and expediency.

"When the aristocratic few at Nashville first made a movement to obtain a branch there, they were forestalled by a law of the Legislature, imposing a heavy fine upon any bank that should attempt to do business within the limits of the State without being first chartered by the Legislature thereof. This provision of the Legislature had my cordial approbation, and prevented, while it continued in force, a location of the branch of the bank at Nashville; but it was afterwards repealed. I was absent at the time the subject of repeal was discussed, but reached the seat of Government the night before the final vote on its passage in the State Senate, and in time to expostulate with Robert C. Foster, esq. then the presiding officer over that body. I warned him of the danger of repealing that law, and stated to him that the object of those who favored the repeal was the introduction of the United States Bank, and that the results of the operation of this institution in Tennessee would be to drain the State of its precious metals, for the benefit of the foreigners who held its stock. The circumstance that there was at this time but one or two individuals in this State who owned any stock of the institution, enabled me to press the argument on this score with considerable force. But Mr. Foster, if now appealed to, must vouch for the fact that my objections to the bank were founded principally on my conviction that its charter was not authorized by the Constitution of the United States. My admonitions were, however, unheeded; the penalty was repealed; and, as I foresaw and predicted, steps were soon taken to obtain the location of a branch at Nashville. A memorial to this effect was presented to me for my signature, which I peremptorily refused to sign. General Cadwallader shortly afterwards came to Nashville as agent of the bank, and visited and dined with me. My opposition to the bank, and repugnance to its establishment at Nashville, were, on this occasion, as free and unreserved as they had been before.

"Some short period after the visit of General Cadwallader, when the branch was established, a recommendation for the appointment of two gentlemen to fill the places of its president and cashier was shown to me, with a request that I should state my knowledge of the character of these two gentlemen. The bank being established, and the people liable to be cursed with all its attendant evils, I expressed my confidence in the two gentlemen referred to, believing them to be honest, and that, as far as they had control over the institution, it would not be wielded for corrupt political purposes. This recommendation, I have been informed, has been used to prove my approbation of the establishment of this bank. So also has my agency in forwarding a memorial from the mercantile interest of Pensacola, in the year 1821, when I was the Governor of Florida. On this last occasion, my hostility to the bank was freely expressed, but this did not restrain me from forwarding a memorial of the citizens for the establishment of a branch. As Governor of the Territory, I deemed it my duty to make known the wishes and feelings of the people, however different they were from my own.

"Having early imbibed the jealousy of those who framed the Constitution, in respect to the dangers of monopolies to the freedom of the citizen, and to the sovereignty and efficacy of our State Governments, I have been always unfriendly to the Bank of the United States. Nor have I stopped here. My views have been equally repugnant to the establishment of State banks of mere paper issues, as all must recollect who have any knowledge of my conduct as a citizen of Tennessee, and particularly of the part I took when its late State bank was incorporated. My position now is, and has ever been since I have been able to form an opinion on this subject, that Congress has no power to charter a bank, and that the States are prohibited by the Constitution from issuing bills of credit, or granting a charter by which such bills can be issued by any corporation or other body."

Having read the letter, Mr. B. said he should make but three remarks upon it; first, that it contained a peremptory contradiction of this whole story of turning against the bank, because he could not bend it to his purposes; secondly, that it shows General Jackson to have been always opposed to any Bank of the United States, and against the recharter of the late one; thirdly, that it carries home a knowledge of all this to the bank itself in the person of its confidential agent, its frequent director, and the friend and connection of Mr. Biddle.

General Jackson is cleared of the foul imputation, and how stands the matter of fact with that bank? Is it, or is it not, a political machine, and as such constantly working with a political party, and with that party whose tenets favor the fundamental principles of that corporation? I hold the affirmative of these inquiries, and shall insist that the bank was created for a political machine; that it always has been, and forever will be, such a machine; and that it belongs to the party whose latitudinarian doctrines, and whose passion for a strong and splendid Government, find a natural support in an institution whose principle are—concentration of wealth, exclusive privileges, monopoly, perpetuity of existence, irresponsibility to the people, and succession of membership. National banks owe their establishment, in these United States, to General Hamilton—a frank and a brave man, who scorned to deny or to dissemble his objects. He made his first report to Congress, in favor of a national bank, in December, 1791; and in that original proposition for creating the institution, he boldly avows its political character. These are his words: "Such a bank is not a mere matter of private property, but a POLITICAL MACHINE of the highest importance to the State." Created then for a political machine, it immediately entered upon the fulfilment of its destination; and this first bank, thus created, is said by Marshall, in his Life of Washington, "To have contributed to that complete organization of those distinct and visible parties, which, in their long and dubious conflict for power, have since shaken the United States to their centre." A political machine, defining parties, and acting with the Federalists during the whole period of its existence, the first Bank of the United States sunk under the odium of its party character. The Republicans, in the ascendant, refused to renew its charter in 1811. The question of renewal, as the debates of the time fully show, largely turned upon the political character and conduct of the institution; and a member of the Senate, then and now on this floor, [Mr. CLAY,] characterized the Federal Senators present as the Macedonian phalanx of the bank.

The creation of the second bank, in 1816, was also contested as a political institution, but with an almost total reversal of parties. Mr. Madison's administration, in putting down the first bank, had committed the great error of falling back upon the local banks for a national paper currency. Instead of re-establishing the currency of the Constitution for the Federal Treasury, and especially restoring the gold currency, by correcting the erroneous standard of that metal, and thereby preserving an adequate supply of the precious metals for the use of the whole country, the great error was committed of falling back upon the paper currencies of the States. The fruit of that error was, the speedy reduction of the Federal Government to the use of broken bank paper, the involvement of the whole community in the same calamity, and a resort to a second National Bank to supply a national paper currency. The second bank was brought forward, in the extremity of their distress, by the Republican Administration, to hlep them out of the mud and mire of a broken bank currency, and to aid them in the operations of the Government. It was then to be a machine on their side. As such, it was supported by Republicans; as such it was opposed by Federalists; a reversal of party position having taken place in relation to the bank, and each party having fallen into the delusive belief that a National Bank could be the supporter of a Republican Administration! Parties changed position, a few individuals standing firm on each side; but the masses crossing over, taking each others places, and freely dealing out the accusations of, inconsistency—desertion—abandonment of friends—compromise of principle, &c. &c. It would be tedious to verify this statement by a citation of speeches, and the reading of yeas and nays; nor is it necessary to cite much. A single quotation from the speeches of the two eminent members, one of the Senate and one of the House, and both present members of this body—then on opposite sides in relation to the bank, now both on the same side in favor of it—will illustrate the point in issue, and establish every thing necessary to be known about it. By one of these speeches the creation of the bank was advocated as a political power, necessary to be possessed by the Federal Government, as a counterpoise to the political power which the local banks gave to the States; and the loyalty of the State in which the mother bank was placed, was relied upon to prevent a concurrence in any scheme for subverting the Federal Government. By the other speaker, the creation of this bank, with a participation in its management and direction by the appointment of five directors—its capital of thirty-five millions—and the control and influence which the Government would have over it, presented it as an object of vice and deformity; and as giving to the Government a power over the institution, and over individuals, which would enable it to bring any man into terms, and to compel the bank itself to do whatever the Administration pleased.

Mr. B. then read a passage from a speech of Mr. CLAY delivered in Kentucky, after his return from Congress in 1816, and explaining the reasons for his change of opinion in relation to a National Bank. The passage was in these words:

"If political power be incidental to banking corporations, there ought, perhaps, to be, in the General Government, some counterpoise to that which is exerted by the States. Such a counterpoise might not, indeed, be so necessary, if the States exercised the power to incorporate banks equally, or in proportion to their respective populations. But that is not the case. A single State has a banking capital equivalent, or nearly so, to the one-fifth of the whole banking capital of the United States. Four States combined have the major part of the capital of the United States. In the event of any convulsion in which the distribution of banking institutions might be important, it may be urged that the mischief would not be alleviated by the creation of a National Bank, since its location must be in one of the States. But in this respect, the location of the bank is extremely favorable, being in one of the Middle States, not likely from its position, as well as its loyalty, to concur in any scheme for subverting the Government; and a sufficient security against such contingency is to be found in the distribution of branches in different States, acting and reacting upon the parent institution and upon each other."

Mr. B. then read a paragraph from a speech of Mr. WEBSTER, delivered in the House of Representatives, April 4, 1836, in opposition to the charter of the second Bank of the United States:

"Mr. WEBSTER said this was a subject on which a great change of opinion had taken place on both sides of the House, and animadverted on what he called a compromise of principle on a great moneyed institution, and the desertion, not only of principles, but of friends, which had characterized the proceedings on the bill. He then spoke some time against the bill, which he pointedly condemned, on account of the participation of the Government in its direction and management. If, said he, instead of the little scraps of amendments, which were very well as far as they went, but very trifling, and only served to cover the vice and deformity of the scheme, the Senate had returned the bill healthy, in all the beauty of the original institution, it would have passed through the House swifter than the current of the Potomac. * * * * That control and influence over a great banking institution should not be possessed by the Government. The degree of that influence was not material, the principle remaining the same, be the influence more or less extensive. * * * * Could it be doubted that, with this capital, and this power over it, the Government could bring any man into terms, and make the banks act as they pleased!"

Such are the grounds on which the establishment of the second Bank of the United States was contested in 1816. The Republicans advocated it, because they saw no other way to get out of the slough of irredeemable paper money; the Federalists opposed it, because they feared the bank would be an engine of power and influence in the hands of the Republican Aministration. A few years' experience dispelled this fear. At the first reorganization of parties, the bank developed as a political power on the Federal side. This was at the Presidential election, in the House of Representatives, in February, 1825. The bank then took the field, on the side opposed to the candidate who had the plurality of the people's votes in his favor. It has kept the field ever since; and if it is now unable to resume specie payments, it must be principally on account of expenses and losses incurred in thirteen years' warfare against the people of the United States, against their form of Government, and against the persons whom they have elected to carry on the Government. The bank is now the head, and the support of the Federal party, all the Federalists who opposed its creation, have gone over to it. It is their leader, and their pointe d'appui. Any catastrophe to it, would be destruction to them, and would annihilate them as a national party. Away then with vain denials, of which nobody is the dupe. The bank is a political machine—a Federal political machine; and no denial of the fact can alter or conceal its truth. The leopard had as well deny the spots on his body—the Ethiopian had as well deny the color of his skin, as for this bank to deny its politica character, its anti-Republican nature, and its thirteen years' warfare upon the people and their form of Government.

War upon the local banks is the next accusation upon General Jackson and his successor. After putting down the Bank of the United States, he went to work to destroy the State banks. So say the Opposition speakers, [Messrs. TALLMADGE and CLAY.] Now let us examine into the truth of this accusation. What was the conduct of General Jackson to the local banks? In 1833 he removed the public deposites to these banks, and gave them the benefit of the immense accumulations of public money which then took place. At the same time, he released their notes from that state of exclusion from the Federal Treasury to which they had been subjected during the whole time of the Bank of the United States. For the first time, in near twenty years, their notes were received and paid out in the receipts and disbursements of the Federal revenue. At the panic session, when the whole Opposition exerted themselves for so many months to excite a run upon the local banks, and to blow them up, who defended them, here and elsewhere, but General Jackson and his friends? Who defended the Safety Fund banks from the dead set which was then made at them? General Jackson and his friends! Who rejoiced in the explosions of the District banks, and the Maryland Bank, and announced the joyful tidings on this floor? The Opposition! And who grieved over these failures? General Jackson and his friends! And when the time came for him to deliver his last annual message, what was his language in relation to these banks? Was it that of vengeance, or was it the language of kindness, of confidence, and of support? Listen to it:

"Experience continues to realize the expectations entertained as to the capacity of the State banks to perform the duties of fiscal agents to the Government. At the time of the removal of the deposites, it was alleged by the advocates of the Bank of the United States that the State banks, whatever might be the regulations of the Treasury Department, could not make the transfers required by the Government, or negotiate the domestic exchanges of the country. It is now well ascertained that the real domestic exchanges, performed through discounts by the United States Bank and its twenty-five branches, were at least one-third less than those of the deposite banks for an equal period of time; and if a comparison be instituted between the amounts of service rendered by these institutions on the broader basis which has been used by the advocates of the United States Bank, in estimating what they consider the domestic exchanges, the result will be still more favorable to the deposite banks." * * * * * * "It is believed that the law of the last session, regulating the deposite banks, operates onerously and unjustly upon them in many respects; and it is hoped that Congress, on proper representations, will adopt the modifications which are necessary to prevent this consequence."

This was the language of the last Message, and this is called war upon those banks. Certainly war should be made of sterner stuff! But, Mr. Van Buren! he carries on war against them also! so say the same Opposition Senators. But, here again the charge is met by proof which annihilates it. Mr. Van Buren has spoken for himself on this point, and his whole conduct corresponds with his declared sentiments. In his letter to Mr. Sherrod Williams, he says:

"Although I have always been opposed to the increase of banks, I would, nevertheless, pursue towards the existing institutions a just and liberal course, protecting them in the rightful enjoyment of the privileges which have been granted to them, and extending to them the good will of the community, so long as they discharge, with fidelity, the delicate and important public trusts with which they have been invested.

"But all experience having shown that there is no delegated power more liable to abuse than that which consists in chartered privileges of this description, I would be astute in watching the course of the banks, and vigilant and prompt in arresting the slightest aspiration on their part to follow a bad example, by seeking to become the masters, when they were designed to be the servants, of the people."

Such has been the language and the conduct of Gen. Jackson, and Mr. Van Buren, towards these banks; a conduct and a language utterly disproving the imputation of making war upon them. But this is not all: other proofs of forbearance, of indulgence, and of benefits extended to them, remain to be stated. When the deposite banks stopped payment last spring, the Government continued to receive their notes, at par, in payment of balances due, although these notes were 5, 10, 15, and in some instances 18 per cent. below par. This was a gain to them of that much, and an equal loss to the Government creditors, to whom they were paid out, and an immense injury to the character and popularity of the Administration itself. Again, when Congress met at the extra session, extended time was given to all these institutions to pay up their balances—a time which has not yet expired, and which has enabled them to give time and indulgence to their own debtors. Far from injuring them, the Republican Administrations have confided in them to their own cost, and to the great injury of their own popularity. They had the confidence of Government when the public money was put into their hands. In placing the public money with them, the fate of the Administration, in a large degree, was committed to them. We wished them well, upon the same principle that we wished ourselves well. Since our wishes have been disappointed, and the Administration and the country have been the chief sufferers, we make no war, but grant indulgence, exercise forbearance, and ask for peace. We want peace—that safe and permanent peace which results from separation of interests, and absence of all the causes of collision. True, General Jackson, and Mr. Van Buren, and all their friends, wish to see the banking system of the United States reformed. They wish to see great reforms introduced into the system; and, if it is not done, they believe that great mischeifs must eventually result to the community, and great injury to the banks themselves. They look for a great catastrophe, if great reforms are not effected.

A war upon the merchants is another of the offences charged upon General Jackson; and what is the evidence of it? The commerce of the country nearly doubled since he became President; nearly one half of the whole amount of imports made free of duty; the duties greatly reduced on all the remainder; indemnities obtained from France, Spain, Denmark, and Naples, for spoliations committed under former administrations, and which former administrations in vain solicited; ships of war sent into every sea for the protection of mercantile interests; ministers and consuls sent to new points, and to further points than they ever went to before; outrages punished on the opposite side of the globe, even among the antipodes; time given to merchants for the payment of their bonds; debentures paid to them in specie, while they withhold specie from the Government! Such are the evidences of this war upon merchants, of which we hear so much. So far from making war upon them, General Jackson's administration has done more for merchants than any one, or any two administrations, that ever preceded him. He has been their beneficent benefactor; and this is known to every citizen who knows the history of his country, and is acknowledged by every merchant whose heart is American. The imputation of hostility to merchants is an old Federal accusation against Republicans. It was made against Mr. Jefferson; and his "terrapin policy" was long the theme of the politician, the press, the jester, and the caricaturist.

No, Mr. President, General Jackson made no war either upon banks or merchants; not even upon the Bank of the United States, for he never attacked its existing charter; and his opposition to a new one can only be looked upon as aggressive, and as amounting to war, by those who consider the bank above the Government, and entitled, like a royal progeny, to a perpetuity of existence. That great man made no war upon any institution; or upon any interest; but, sir, we have seen some wars made—there are some still making—and I will take the liberty to enumerate a few of them.

First, there was the war against the local banks generally, during the whole panic session, in which no term of reproach was too odious to be lavished upon them, and no statements to discredit them, no assertion to destroy confidence in them, no attempts to excite runs upon them, and to blow them up, were too shameless or too unscrupulous to find authors, abetters, and aiders, in the ranks of their present most officious friends.

Next was the war upon the safety fund system, and the safety fund banks, of the State of New York, which, for two or three sessions, raged with such violence on this floor. During all that time, nothing so corrupt as this system, nothing more certain than its rottenness and explosion, and nothing so dreadful as the prospect of having it imposed upon the whole Union in the event of an election of a certain citizen of the State of New York to the Presidency of the United States. In this war, I had the honor to extend a feeble aid to the Senator from New York, [Mr. TALLMADGE,] in his patriotic defence of the institutions of his State against the repeated and violent assaults of his present coadjutor in politics from Kentucky, [Mr. CLAY.]

Then came the war, which still continues, upon the constitutional currency of the country—a war in which gold and silver has received all the abuse which, in other countries, would be lavished upon counterfeit money. First ridiculed as visionary and impracticable; then denounced and stigmatized as a barbarism; then attempted to be forced out of the country by deportation; then attempted to be imprisoned, and shut out from the light of day, by shutting down all the banks upon it; then attempting to drive it off by turning loose upon it a pestiferous issue of shin-plasters and small notes; and now straining might and main to keep it down by keeping up irredeemable paper, preventing a resumption of specie payments, and forcing a currency of broken bank notes into the coffers of the Federal Government.

Another war which we have seen going on ever since the veto session, six years ago, and which we still see, is upon the general business of the country; turning off laborers, reducing wages, stopping work, shutting up factories; expanding and contracting the paper currency, so as to make money plenty one day and scarce the next; monopolizing bread and fuel, to double their price, while diminishing the capacity of the laborer to purchase; fabricating distress by every act of real oppression, and aggravating it by every art of fictitious exaggeration; looking forward to an "awful winter" as to a banquet of intellectual enjoyment; scarcely concealing their dissatisfaction with Providence for giving mildness instead of severity of weather, and insulting the victims of their oppression by doling out to them an ostentatious and contemptible charity.

Another of these wars, one which we have witnessed ever since the Presidential election in the House of Representatives, in February, 1825, is that which has been so appropriately denounced by the Senator from Ohio, who sits to the left, [Mr. MORRIS,] and which exceeds all others in enormity, because it is a war upon the fundamental principles of our Constitution, and upon the form of the Government under which we live. The revival of this war dates from the election of Mr. Adams by the House of Repressntatives, in 1825, but its origin is coeval with the foundation of the Government. Up to the first election of Mr. Jefferson, in 1800, this war was carried on openly and furiously, and the sentiment contained in the elder Mr. Adams's book on the American Constitutions, that the British Constitution, with its king, lords and commons, was the most stupendous fabric of human invention, had its open and public defenders. The second election of Mr. Jefferson sunk Federalism too low. It drove it into a state of hibernation, far north, from which it did not emerge for many years; and which left it without distinctive character, or object, until the Congress election of the second Mr. Adams. Then the ancient principles of the party revived, and the war recommenced upon the principles, and upon the form, of our Government, in the attacks which were made upon the capacity of the people to choose their own Presidents. This war then recommenced, and has continued ever since; for what is this eternal denunciation of General Jackson, but a denunciation of that immense majority of the American people, who have three times preferred him for President, and a fourth time approved his policy in the election of his successor? What is this infinite accumulation of degrading epithets upon the mad, wicked, outlandish, and ruinous administration of General Jackson, but an application of the same epithets to the people who elected him, and who have approved his Administration? What is this cry for a change of the "experimenters," but a cry for a change of the voters who elect them? Beyond doubt, the capacity of the people to choose thier representatives, is attacked in these incessant assaults upon their representatives; and the zeal and unanimity with which this war is carried on, make it high time to consider it in its true aspect, as a deliberate waging of hostility upon the principles of our Constitution, and the form of our Government.

Finally, we see a war against an individual, against a retired citizen, an aged man, one that has done the State some service—a war of which there are but few examples in the annals of Christendom, or within the boundaries of the civilized world. General Jackson is no longer on the stage of action; he is no longer in any man's way. Through the portals of everlasting fame he has made his exit from the stage of public life, and has gone into that retirement never more to be withdrawn from it, which he has always sought, and from which his country has so often recalled him. Repose is the only boon that he now asks of the world, and such a man has certainly a right to tranquillity—a right to be free from invasion—in the evening of his days, and in the shelter of his own house. But he is not free from invasion. Persecution follows him. A war of unexampled ferocity is waged against him; and the destruction of his character, public and private, and the laceration of his feelings, seem to be the relentless design of the assailants. That I may do no injustice to any one by mistaken recitals, I will here exhibit some specimens of this warfare, as I find them preserved and perpetuated in the printed copy of a speech delivered on this floor. I read from a revised copy, bearing every mark of authenticity, and of deliberate preparation.

"War and strife, endless war and strife, personal or national, foreign or domestic, were the aliment of the late President's existence. War against the bank, war against France, and strife and contention with a countless number of individuals. The wars with Black Hawk and the Seminoles were scarcely a luncheon for his voracious appetite; and he made his exit from public life, denouncing war and vengeance against Mexico and the State banks."

When Mr. B. had read this paragraph, Senator LINN inquired of him from whose speech he was reading?

Mr. B. said he would answer the inquiry authentically, by reading the title page of the speech. He read:

"Speech of the Hon. Henry Clay, of Kentucky, establishing a deliberate design, on the part of the late and present Executive of the United States, to break down the whole banking system of the United States, commencing with the Bank of the United States, and terminating with the State banks, and to create on their ruins a Government Treasury Bank, under the exclusive control of the Executive, and in reply to the speech of the Hon. J. C. Calhoun, of South Carolina, supporting that Treasury Bank. Delivered in the Senate of the United States, February 19, 1838. Printed by Gales and Seaton, Washington City, 1838."

Sir, this is the speech from which I read. The paragraph is a brief one, but it is comprehensive; and in the eagerness of the speaker to get at the victim, the public interests, the existing interests of the country, are overlooked, and endangered. Who can now look for any indemnities from Mexico, or for any submission from the Seminole Indians, until after the next Presidential election is over? Who can now count upon the quietude of Black Hawk, the removal of the Cherokees, or the peace of the Western frontiers? The foreign and domestic policy of General Jackson is set down to the love of strife, and the spirit of vengeance; this must excite all foreign nations, and all Indians, to resist his policy. His personal difficulties are said to be countless, although we can count the whole population of the Union; they are said to be endless, although he is known to have had no such difficulties for a quarter of a century, and to have become the friend and benefactor of many of those with whom he has had dissensions. Granted that he has had personal difficulties, and violent ones, yet they can be counted, and they have ended. Violence subsides; malice never dies! and that is the difference between General Jackson's feuds, and those of some other persons. Sir, I have some knowledge upon this subject; and this letter, (holding up one from General Jackson) delivered to me since I rose to speak, the seal yet unbroken, can attest that his animosities are not endless. "War and strife, endless war and strife, &c. &c. were the aliment of the late President's existence." And this is to be said of a citizen who, at the early age of thirty-three, resigned the place of Senator on this floor to go home, and live upon a farm so retired as to merit, and to receive, the name of Hermitage; who, being called thence to the bench of the Supreme Court of his State, resigned that station to return to his farm; who, being called again to lead an army to victory and to glory, and to be made Governor of an important Territory, with a high salary, a third time resigned to go back to his farm; who, being for the second time placed as Senator upon this floor, still resigned to go back to his farm; who, being offered embassies and departments, refused to touch them; and who, being twice called to the Presidency of the United States, availed himself of the first moment of the expiration of his office again to return to his farm, never more to be dragged away from it. This is the man whose aliment is strife, whose luncheons are wars, who went off breathing vengeance!

But to continue the reading:

"His Administration consisted of a succession of astounding measures, which fell on the public ear like repeated bursts of loud and appalling thunder. Before the reverberations of one peal had ceased, another and another came, louder and louder, and more terrifying. Or rather it was like a volcanic mountain, emitting frightful eruptions of burning lava. Before one was cold and crusted; before the voices of the inhabitants of buried villages, and cities were hushed in eternal silence, another, more desolating, was vomited forth, extending wider and wider the circle of death and destruction."

And this is the Senatorial description of General Jackson's administration! that Administration which has filled the country with prosperity at home, and covered it with honor abroad, and which has revived and restored the Republican spirit of our Government, and rallied the Republican party on the ground which it occupied under the illustrious Administration of President Jefferson.

Sir, it is not my intention to analyze this description, or to inquire into the truth of the allegations it contains. I leave that work to the moral sense of the community! I leave it to those who have witnessed these astounding measures—heard this appalling thunder—seen this volcanic mountain—and beheld this frightful river of burning lava! I leave it even to those "voices hushed in eternal silence"—to the voices of the inhabitants of the cities, towns, and villages, buried, crusted over, and cold, under the volcanic eruptions vomited forth by this desolating mountain!

And what has General Jackson done to draw upon him this relentless and undying persecution? Sir, he has done nothing but let the people elect him President, and then so administered the Government as to carry the star of his civil fame to the highest point in the political firmanent, there to remain forever, searing the eyeballs of envy, but cheering the heart, and guiding the footsteps of patriotism, and shedding its benign influence on the freedom, happiness, prosperity, and glory of his country.

Mr. President, I have answered some of the attacks on the Republican party which have been brought forward in this debate. They are such attacks as we have been accustomed to see for many years, and which have given to this chamber more the appearance of an electioneering hustings than a hall of legislation. We opened the debate on the merits of the bill; Opposition gentlemen have converted it into a canvass for the Presidency, and a contest for power. We have been obliged to follow them in this unparliamentary course, so far at least as to repel some of their attacks. Having done this, I take up the bill, and shall limit myself to a brief examination of its principles, and to a defence of some of the points on which it is assailed; and shall conclde with some observations upon the conduct of parties, and the political prospect ahead.

The bill contains two principles, and but two. 1. The exclusion of all banks from the use and custody of the public moneys. 2. The exclusion of all bank notes from the receipts and expenditures of the Federal Treasury. These are the principles; all the rest is detail. Against these two principles a strong division of this House rises up; among them a few of our own political friends, but the mass and body of the division are the friends of the Bank of the United States. The justice of this opposition, and especially in the quarter from which it chiefly comes, can well be judged of by recollecting that both these principles have been in full force against all the State banks for nearly forty years out of the forty-eight that our Government has been in existence They were so enforced during the whole time that the two Banks of the United States have existed. I have not got the by-laws of the first National Bank, but I have the charters of both, and the by-laws of the second. By these charters, the two Banks of the United States were entitled to the custody of the public moneys, to the exclusion of the local banks; and, by their by-laws, the notes of these local banks were excluded from payments to and from the Federal Treasury. I have a copy of these laws, as passed by the second Bank of the United States, and merely adopted from the code of the first one, in which this exclusion is enacted, and which runs in these words:

[Here Mr. B. read the 24th and the 25th articles of the by-laws of the Bank of the United States, passed immediately after the establishment of the bank, and excluding the notes of all State banks from all payments to the United States, except the notes of the specie-paying banks situated in the same place with the branch; and directing the notes of those thus excepted to be presented to the bank that issued them for payment, at least, once in every week.]

This by-law was enacted in the year 1817, and was rigorously enforced until the removal of the deposites in October, 1833; it was therefore seventeen years in force under the second bank; and having been twenty years in force under the first bank, it results that this exclusion of State bank notes from the Federal Treasury has actually been in force nearly forty years out of the forty-eight which our Government has existed. The slight exception in the non-receivability of these notes was an exception to the prejudice of the local institutions; the exception was limited to the few banks located in the same town which contained the branch bank, and was an injury to these banks; for it caused their notes to be taken out of circulation, and to be presented to them in masses for immediate payment. Thus the great mass of the banks were peremptorily excluded from all receivability of their notes; and as for the few which were nominally excepted, the exception was an injury to them, and to my knowledge was complained of as such. Now, what was the conduct of the local banks under this forty years' exclusion from the use and custody of the public moneys under the provisions of National Bank charters, and this forty years' exclusion of their notes from Federal receipts and expenditures under the enactments of National Bank by-laws? What was their conduct under these long and double exclusions? Sir, it was the conduct of contentment, of satisfaction, of entire acquiescence! They made no complaint; they asked for no change. On the contrary, they endeavored to perpetuate it, and have always celebrated the period of their exclusion as the finest era of our currency, and the safest state of the Federal revenues. This they did in 1832, when our tables groaned under memorials from local banks to recharter the Bank of the United States; this they did again in 1833, when they prayed for the restoration of the deposites to the Bank of the United States, and actually refused to receive them; and this they do now in praying for another National Bank.

A celebrated French satirist has made us acquainted with a most worthy country gentleman, who had talked prose all his life without knowing it; so of these local banks. They have been ruined for forty years without knowing it. During the whole period of the existence of the two National Banks they were in as tate of total exclusion—absolute divorce—from all connection with the Federal Treasury. With this divorce, thus effected by corporation by-laws, they were contented and happy, nay, wished it to be eternal! but the moment the same divorce is proposed to be effected by an act of Congress, the banks are in arms against it, and declare themselves ruined if it is done. This is a noble instance of consistency—of submission to a Bank of the United States, and of resistance to the Government of the United States. The same of politicians—of all that class of politicians who advocate a National Bank. They go for the divorce of the by-laws, and against the divorce by a law of Congress. They support a Bank of the United States in excluding the local banks from all connection with the Government, and they support the local banks in resisting the Government of the United States in proposing the very same disconnection. They are now altogether for the local banks, and no praise too high for them; three years ago they were against them, and no abuse too low for them. When these banks resisted the panic, and did well, these politicians denounced them; now that they have stopped payment, and injured the country, and deprived the Government of its revenues, these same politicians exalt them to the skies. This is inconsistency—inconsistency in the means, not in the object. The object is to re-establish the National Bank; and the means are, to have another loss of Government revenues, and thereupon, another argument to restore their idolized institution. This they declare! for they tell us, with the defiance of over-confidence, that they take these local banks as a half-way house—as a house half-way to the Bank of the United States—where they will lodge and refresh a night, and then gallop into the Chestnut street palace, as a breakfast ride, the next morning. And so it will be. Trust them again! and the State banks will fail again, as they did during the war, as they did in 1819, as they did in 1837, and as they are now doing in 1838. They will fail again; the Federal Government will lose its revenues again; and then the cry will be redoubled for a National Bank.

Mr. President, I have opinions upon this subject—opinions not of recent adoption, or hasty formation. Their origin dates far back—a full quarter of a century; and they have been receiving confirmation ever since. I was in the public service during the late war—witnessed the failure of the State banks, and saw the calamities of a Government, and of a people, destitute of specie. The first Bank of the United States had expelled specie—it had done what Mr. Madison said it would do, in that masterly speech of 1791, which never has been, and never can be, answered. In that speech he placed at the head of the list of the disadvantages of such a bank, these prophetic words: "First: Banishing the precious metals, by substituting another medium to perform their office." At the expiration of its charter, in 1811, it had completely effected this work. It had banished the precious metals. There was but ten millions of specie left in the country! Two great errors were then committed: first, in not replenishing the country with specie, and especially with gold; secondly, in falling back upon the paper of local banks for a national currency. In this condition, destitute of specie, and relying upon the notes of local banks, we went into the war. The result was inevitable—the explosion of our whole monetary system—the bankruptcy of the Treasury—the ruinous use of depreciated paper—a resort to Treasury notes, on which the creditor often lost 33⅓ per cent.—loans on oppressive terms—and the Government forced to make common cause with broken banks for the mutual support of each others credit. All this I saw. I saw the calamities, the humiliation, and the sufferings of the country; and I heard the loud and insolent triumphs of the Federal party—that part of it which opposed the war—exulting over an empty Treasury, an impaired public credit, a depreciated paper currency, and the national degradation for want of solid money. I saw all this; and my head, and my heart, both told me that the country ought never to be subjected to such a fate again.

This was my war experience; and now for the experience of peace. After three years of war, peace came, and with it, came revival of business, and a multitude of local banks, and, at their head, that immense charlatan of the monetary system—a National Bank! Off went the whole together; specie payments resumed; confidence restored; the credit system in all its glory, and every branch of business distended to the bursting point. To judge of every thing by a single instance, it is sufficient to name the public lands, of which the amount of TWENTY-EIGHT millions of dollars was sold in a single year! and nearly all on credit, payable in safe and solid specie paying bank notes. In two years the whole of these banks, the charlatan among the rest, were swamped. Then we had a repetition of the scenes of seven years before. No specie; no notes equivalent to specie; no credit; no revenues; no price for property! Tender laws—property laws—replevin laws—stay laws, the order of the day! An entire stagnation of business followed, not fictitious, but real; and such was the fall in the price of all produce, all property, and the wages of all labor, owing to the failure of the banks, and the absence of specie, that all debtors were placed in the jaws of ruin, and most of them entirely ruined. There was no Treasury order then; no removal of deposites; no veto; no Jackson administration to ruin the country; yet the distress and suffering was actually then, what it is falsely said to be, and wickedly attempted to be made, at present. There is no comparison between the state of things then and now.

At this epoch, this second explosion of the paper system, I came into the Senate of the United States. I came here in the autumn of 1820. I travelled from the Mississippi to the Potomac amidst the crash of falling banks, the wrecks of a paper currency, and the lamentations of a suffering nation. I arrived here to see a Government without a dollar, and borrowing money to pay its daily expenses, which, the year before, boasted a revenue of forty-seven millions, and tormented itself with schemes to get rid of surpluses! I commenced my Senatorial career under these circumstances—circumstances to make me meditate, and to make me feel. Happily, my associations were with the fathers of the Republic—with Macon and Randolph, whose intimacy I enjoyed, and whose friendship I possessed. My reading was that of the early history of the Government—the Revolution, the Confederation, the formation of the Constitution of '89, and the workings of the machinery of the Federal Government under the administrations of the earlier Presidents—Washington, Adams, and Jefferson. The result of this association, and of this reading, was a thorough conviction, 1. That the Federal Constitution was formed by hard-money men, and was intended to be a hard money Government; 2. That it had been converted into a paper money Government, contrary to the genius and intention of the Constitution; 3. That this departure from the Constitution was the cause of the moneyed calamities during the war, and again at that time; 4. That the remedy for these calamities was to return to the plain meaning of the Constitution, as expressed in the revenue act of 1789, and to confine the receipts and expenditures of the Federal Government to gold and silver coin only. These were my convictions; and as soon as circumstances were auspicious for action, I commenced a series of measures, all tending to carry back the fiscal action of the Government to the intention of the Constitution; fully believing that if the Federal Government would require gold and silver for its own Treasury, it would cause enough to be brought into the country, and to remain in the country, to supply the whole body of the people with hard money for all their common and ordinary dealings and transactions. It was not until General Jackson's administration, that I was able to take any strong and direct measures towards the accomplishment of the great object which presented itself to my view. The sagacious Mr. Macon often said to me that it was in vain to attempt any reform, unless the Administration is with you. The election of General Jackson gave such an administration. From that time there was a President, not only to favor, but to take the lead in the great business of restoring the constitutional currency, and my part became subordinate and easy. I had only to explain and defend the great measures which his sagacity and patriotism conceived and recommended.

It is not necessary to dwell on these measures, much less to enter now into any defence of them. A brief enumeration will suffice. 1. No more National Banks. They had been found to be the great exporters of specie; and their chartered right to pay the Federal revenues in their own notes, was in itself a clear breach of the Constitution, and banished gold and silver from the Treasury, and, by diminishing the demand for it, expelled it from the country. 2. To restore the gold currency, by correcting the erroneous standard of gold. 3. The repeal of the act of 1819, rendering uncurrent, with a few exceptions, the gold and silver coins of all foreign countries. 4. The multiplication of the mints, both for the purpose of coining money in different parts of the Union, and for becoming places of deposite and safe-keeping of the public moneys. 5. The suppression of all local bank notes under twenty dollars. Having no direct power over the banks of the States, the only mode of accomplishing this object was by the revenue regulations of the Federal Government, and by operating on public opinion in the different States. My own limit was one hundred dollars, but I did not attempt to establish it because I knew that I could not succeed. My conviction is now clear that there ought to be no bank note under one hundred dollars.

Such were our measures for restoring the currency of the Constitution to the coffers of the Federal Treasury, and supplying the country with gold and silver for all the common and ordinary transactions and dealings. The success, notwithstanding a powerful combined political and mo-neyed opposition, was astonishingly great. The recharter of a National Bank sunk under the veto, sustained by public opinion. The act for the correction of the gold standard hit the point of correction with such perfect accuracy, that the two coins, gold and silver, issuing from our Mint, have precisely the same value in the money market. Under the auspicious operation of that act, our gold coin has risen, in little more than three years, from nothing to fifteen millions, and will probably rise to twenty-five millions before the termination of Mr. Van Buren's present term. The act for repealing the act of 1819, and for restoring foreign coins to circulation, has sent Mexican dollars into every part of the Union, and has enabled other foreign coins, both gold and silver, to make some progress in penetrating our country. Silver has increased three fold since 1832, and silver and gold together, four fold. Our specie was twenty millions then; it is eighty now, with the prospect of exceeding a hundred millions before the present term of Mr. Van Buren is out. Our currency in existence is more abundant and more solid than it ever was before; but the specie part of it is suppressed by the power and policy of the Bank of the United States, combined with the politicians and that part of the banks which follow its lead. Acts of Congress had passed to operate upon small notes, and to exclude those under twenty dollars from revenue payments altogether, and to exclude all others which were not convertible into gold and silver "upon the spot," at the will of the holder, and without loss or delay to him. Public opinion had been awakened on the subject of small notes; and the Republicans every where were moving towards the suppression of all under twenty dollars. Such was the progress, and such the success, of our measures in May last, when eight hundred banks stopped payment at once, shut down close upon all the specie in their vaults, denying a ninepence, a picayune, a five cent piece, even, to the Government whose thirty millions of deposi es they held, or to the community who held a hundred and twenty millions of their notes! In the midst of profound peace, general prosperity, under a Government without taxes and without a public debt, with four times as much specie as was in it five years before, came this crash of the banks. It came like a clap of thunder in a cloudless sky. In one moment, as it were, a Government, with thirty millions of revenue on hand, was left without a shilling: in one moment, a nation of fifteen millions of souls was deprived of ninepences for the market or the post office. As if to proclaim their design to banish all specie from the land, a simultaneous and universal deluge of small notes and shin-plasters was poured upon the people; and the significant cry was set up, that specie payments could never be restored until a National Bank was established. This cry explained the main cause of the general stoppage, and the sole cause of the shin-plaster and small note issue.

All this took place in May, 1837. It was a repetition, without the excuse of war, of the bank explosions of the war in 1814; it was the second explosion of the banks since the war, and in profound peace. It was expected to astound, terrify, subdue, distress, and coerce the country into a submission to the re-establishment of the National Bank! a result that would have been inevitable had it not been for the eighty millions of gold and silver which Jackson's administration brought into the country, and which has so well kept up the value of bank notes that those which are in good credit are now no more than one or two per cent. below par. This third explosion in twenty-five years—this second explosion in time of peace—this loss of national revenues, as if by enchantment—this disappearance of specie, as if touched by a magic wand—roused and electrified the continent. The public mind came at a bound to the conviction that the Federal Government ought to be disconnected from the banks, and from their paper currency. The conviction was general, almost unanimous, among the Republicans; a few only among them were for trying the local banks and their paper once more, as if three failures in twenty-five years were not sufficient; as if another failure was not inevitable, and as if another failure must not end in the restoration of a National Bank, with the restoration of the political party, with all their principles and measures, who go with that bank. The Federal party, of course, with some honorable exceptions, oppose the disconnection. They oppose whatever the Republicans propose, no matter what. They were opposed to the junction of the Government with the State banks three years ago, when those banks were doing well; they are for compelling the Government to stick to them now that they have done ill. This is the state of parties: the Republicans almost universally for the divorce of Bank and State; the Federalists, almost universally, for the conjunction of Bank and State. In this division and subdivision, I find myself with the mass of my own party, and with the Administration itself. I find them now where I was many years ago. I believe them to be right, and shall stand by them, and abide their fate. If they sink in this contest with the banks and the Federalists, I shall go down with them.

I stand upon the two principles of the bill—1. The United States to use the money of the Constitution in the receipts and disbursements of the Federal Treasury; 2. The United States to receive their own money, to keep their own money, and pay out their own money. I stand upon these two principles; I cannot surrender them, though I could consent to take them one at a time. The details of the bill are open to compromise. There I am ready to give and to take—to surrender and concede—to do every thing, consistent with the preservation of the principles, to conciliate the support, or to purchase the forbearance of friends. In some particulars I would prefer a change of details; I would prefer additional branch mints in place of the Receivers General—mints that would answer the double purpose of keeping the money of the Government, and coining money for the people.

The principles of the bill I hold to be founded in the clearest reasons of propriety, and constitutionality, and sustained by the fullest voice of trial and experience. Every Government should be, at all times, the master of its own property,—money and every thing else. A Government should not be put to the delays and contingencies of asking for its own, much less of sueing for it, and above all, of having to sue where State laws may interpose to delay, or to defeat the recovery. The revenue of a Government is its daily support,—it is like the daily support of a family,—it cannot be stopped, or withheld, without affecting the existence of the Government itself. Every Government upon earth, our own excepted, puts its money where it can go and take it. All other Governments put their money where they can command it, where they can seize it, if necessary, and punish a delinquent holder. We do the same with all our property, except money. Our ships and forts, our military and naval stores, our public lands, and public edifices, are all in our own custody. We do not have to beg, or bring suits at law, to recover their possession. We keep them, subject to our own order, because the existence, and the operations, of Government, which holds civil society together, and prevents mankind from relapsing into anarchy and violence, will not admit of interruptions and delays. If this is true of property, how much more true is it of money—that daily pabulum, without which Government cannot exist a day? This fundamental axiom, true of every Government, is preeminently so of ours. Our Government is complex—State and Federal—and each should have their own Independent Treasury. The present Constitution grew out of the Independent Treasury question. Other causes helped on to the formation of the Constitution; but a revenue of its own—a revenue independent of the States, and of course independent of corporations—was the exciting and controlling cause which led to its adoption. The whole history of the confederation, from the close of the Revolution to the year 1789, proves this. Yet where is the Independent Treasury, where is the Federal Treasury, if corporations are to hold our money, may refuse to pay it when they please, and shall be backed by their State Legislatures when they refuse to pay? To commit our money to the custody of such corporations, is to forego the end for which the Federal Government was formed; to commit it to such corporations again, after the experience which we have had, and during the experience which we now have, is to repeat a folly for which we have been three times punished, and to exhibit a fatuity which announces a doom to destruction. Upon the clearest principles of reason, of constitutional obligation, and of experience, the Federal Government is bound to take into its own hands the keeping of its own money. This is one principle of the bill; the other is the use of hard money in the receipts and disbursements of the Federal Government. This principle is the ally of the other. They go together, and can hardly live separately. To receive the promissory notes of the banks, is to receive nothing but their promises to pay money. If they break that promise, the only resource is to take what they choose to give; that is to say, more broken promises to pay money, or to sue them; and, if suit is brought, State laws may interpose to protect the bank, and to compel the Government to take its pay in more broken promises to pay. Far better to take the promissory notes of the citizens. They would not refuse payment, as the banks have done; and if they did, the State Legislatures would not interpose to shield them.

The Federal Government ought to use the money of the Federal Constitution. Its duty to the Constitution requires it to do so; its duty to the country equally requires it. By using that money, two great advantages would always result: 1. The Government would always have in its coffers real money; 2. The country would always possess an abundant supply of the precious metals. Certainly the Federal Government owes great duties to itself and to the country, in relation to the currency. It should not abdicate those duties, nor delegate them. It should not expel specie from the country by abandoning the use of it. The experience of forty years shows that a cessation of demand for specie, on the part of the Federal Government, banishes gold and silver from the country. This was the result both under the first and second banks of the United States. On the other hand, the experience of five years shows that a demand for specie by the Federal Government attracts it to the country; that we have increased our supply from twenty to eighty millions in five years, under that demand; and that a continuation of the demand will continue the increase until the country is adequately and fully supplied. This is the way to regulate the currency. A hundred and twenty or thirty millions in gold and silver will regulate the banks and the exchanges; and that amount can be attained, and ought to be attained, in six or seven years, by a continuation of General Jackson's policy.

An adequate supply of specie for the country, is one of the highest duties of the Federal Government. By the Constitution, it is made the conservator of specie; by abdicating its duties, it had banished from the land that which it was bound to preserve. The States delivered to this Government, in 1789, an adequate currency of gold and silver. The first revenue law ever passed by Congress, enacted that the revenue should be paid "in gold and silver coin only." There was then no complaint of scarcity. General Hamilton's order for evading that law, did not turn upon the ground of scarcity of the precious metals, but on the plea of convenience in handling bank paper, and upon the policy of increasing the quantity of bank circulation. There was no complaint of the inadequacy of specie until the first Bank of the United States had banished it from the country, as Mr. Madison and others predicted that it would do.

Large mercantile payments always have been, and for ever will be, made in bits of paper, representing masses of property. He is a ninny, or believes others to be ninnies, who talks about merchants spending their time in counting piles of dollars, one by one. If masses of specie are to be paid, it is done in bulk, in kegs, or bags, or by weighing, or by a transfer of credit on the books of a bank. Bills of exchange, receipts, or certificates, representing masses of cotton, tobacco, rice, grain, flour, beef, pork, lead, cattle, &c. make the great payments. So far as large mercantile operations are concerned, specie is but an inferior part of the means of payments. With the body of the community, it is different. Specie is, or should be, the main part of their payments, and with every Government, it should be the sole instrument of payments. As to banks, it is in vain for them to expect to live upon confidence. Those that attempt it will share the fate of the Irishman's mare, which her master undertook to make live upon a straw a day. One-third in specie, for all its liabilities in circulation and deposites, is the rule of the Bank of England. With less than that proportion the bank holds herself to be unsafe; with that proportion in hand, she expects to make up the other two-thirds, if ran upon, out of the debts due her, her credit to borrow, and Government aid in exchequer bills. Scarcely a bank in the United States undertakes to come up to the Bank of England standard of safety. The Legislature of Louisiana is the only one that I have seen attempting to establish that standard.

There is a concerted attempt at this time in the United States to decry specie; to ridicule it, to villify it, to suppress it, and to banish it. Gold, especially, is the object of the villification of this party—that gold which stands first named in the Constitution of the United States, and which, from the earliest records of the human race, has been the chosen money of the world. I do not envy that party their assiduous labors in the defamation of the precious metals. I do not fear the success of their exertions. I do not fear even that they will ever succeed in making themselves turn their backs upon the smallest piece of gold or silver which is offered for their acceptance. The necessity of an adequate supply of the precious metals is known and felt by the whole human race. It is the only money which it is safe for the body of the people to handle. It is the main basis for the operations of a bank; and it is the only standard or measure of values. One of the highest functions of money is to measure values. That is a function which paper cannot perform. The measure of values must itself possess intrinsic value, and must itself be free from sudden or material variations of value. It must have a uniform, and a universal value. As well might you attempt to make a measure of lengths out of that which has no length, a measure of weights out of that which has no weight, a measure of quanties out of that which has no capacity to hold any quantity, as to endeavor to make a measure of values out of that which has no intrinsic value. The precious metals alone can constitute a measure of values; paper money can measure the value of nothing, not even of itself; its own value is eternally measured by its relation—by its convertibility—into specie. Its want of intrinsic value, its liability to be made in any quantity, or to be diminished in any quantity, and its liability to total destruction, entirely disqualifies it for the high function of a measure of values.

The Constitution of the United States has vested Congress with authority to prescribe a uniform standard of weights and measures for the whole Union. Congress has not exercised that power; but the common feeling of the people has supplied the defect of Federal legislation. In all parts of the Union, they use the same weights and measures. A pound is a pound, a bushel is a bushel, a yard is a yard, from one end of the country to the other. The Constitution has also vested Congress with authority to regulate the value—not of currency, for there is no such word in the Constitution, nor any word which can be made to include paper currency—but to regulate the value of the coin of our own mint, and also of foreign coin. This power for forty-five years, that is to say, from 1789 to 1834, was so erroneously exercised as to under-value gold six and two-thirds per cent. The consequence was the total exclusion of gold from our circulation. In 1834 this error was corrected; and the consequence is, that gold is in the full process of restoration to its constitutional place in our currency. With respect to foreign coins, instead of making them current, as the Constitution intended, they were nearly all excluded from circulation by the act of 1819. This false legislation was also corrected in 1834; and foreign coins now enter largely into our circulation. The year 1834—the second year of General Jackson's second Presidential term—will be an era, a proud and glorious era, in the history of our constitutional currency. It will be the era of the reformation of the metallic currency. The year 1835, the last year of General Jackson's second term, will be another glorious epoch in our financial history. It was in that year that the promissory notes of a corporation ceased to be a lawful tender to the United States in discharge of all taxes, debts, and duties due to her. The year 1836 is the epoch of this deliverance of the Federal Treasury from the dominion of a corporation; but the year 1832 divides the honor with it; for in that year was the blow struck—the heroic veto applied—which effected the deliverance. Three noble acts have been performed; but a fourth remains to be achieved to consummate the duties of the Federal Government in relation to the currency. The error of Mr. Madison's administration, at the expiration of the existence of the first Bank of the United States, must not be repeated. The notes of the local banks must not be made a national currency! That error ruined the currency in 1814 and in 1819, and the repetition of it again ruined it in 1837. Three times, in twenty-five years, has that error deprived the Treasury of its revenues, the country of a measure of values, and rendered nugatory the uniformity of weights and measures, in which the whole Union had agreed. The effect upon the community has been the same as if every seller had possessed the privilege, and had exercised it, of altering his weights and measures at his pleasure; lengthening or shortening his yard stick; enlarging or reducing his bushel; diminishing or increasing his pound weight with every sale, and precisely as it suited his own interests in every instance. This is an enormous and a crying evil, the parent of unnumbered impositions upon the whole community, and especially upon the weaker part. In paying double for the necessaries of life, the effect has been precisely the same as if the purchaser had received but half a pound, half a yard, and half a bushel, when he paid for a full pound, a full yard, and a full bushel. But, sir, I drop this disquisition. The pursuit of it would carry me too far, at the present moment, into the workings of the paper system. I drop it with remarking, that the arbitrary debasement of the current coin, formerly practised by some European Kings, and latterly by some Turkish Sultans, was innocent and harmless, compared to the mischief done in our own country by the loss of a measure of values, and the consequent, or equivalent, destruction of all the measures of quantities. The thoughtless and inconsiderate man, invested with no legislative character, may say, that paper money is lighter than gold and silver; that paper will buy any thing that gold and silver will buy; that he does not care what his money is made of, provided it will pay his debts. The unreflecting man may talk in this way; but the statesman must look at money in its exalted character of a measure of values; and if that measure is lost or destroyed by his management, he commits a great error, and inflicts a great injury upon the entire community. We have lost that measure. The Federal Government has occasioned its loss. The use of paper at the Federal Treasury has banished coin—has set an example which has been followed by all the States, and by every individual—until paper has banished coin, and made itself a forced tender in every payment. Paper money is now the actual currency of the land. It is the medium of all payments; and, being no measure of values, there is no stability of prices. Every thing fluctuates. Trade is subjected to the hazards of gambling. The remedy for this evil—the means for the re-establishment of the measure of values—is for the Federal Government to use the true measure itself. In supplying itself with the true measure, it will cause the whole country to be supplied. No nation can saturate itself with gold and silver more easily than the United States. The hundred millions of exportable products, annually sent abroad—to say nothing of domestic mines, and the supplies brought in by emigrants—will bring back an annual supply of 12 or 15 millions. We have but to invite its presence, by creating a demand for it, and 8 or 10 millions of this amount will annually remain with us until the national supply is full and complete.

Mr. B. would examine some of the objections to the proposed bill. The able speeches which had been delivered by the numerous friends of the measure abridged his labor in this respect, and he should confine himself to brief notices of a few of the principal points. At the head of these objections stands the imposing assumption that the passage of the bill will inflict a severe wound upon the State banks, and entirely disable them to resume specie payments. This assertion is made by the whole body of the speakers on the opposite side; but they deal in assertion only. No explanation is given to justify it, and to show how it is that an array of eight hundred banks is to be thus mysteriously and powerfully affected. The amendment of the Senator from Virginia [Mr. RIVES] only proposes to distribute the deposites among twenty-five banks, so that seven hundred and seventy-five would remain unprovided for, and, consequently, subject to ruin under that plan. But there is a readier answer to this objection. The bill only proposes to remit these banks to the condition they were in under the dominion of the Bank of the United States. They were then in a complete state of divorce from the Federal Government, having no share of the public deposites, or any share in the privilege of paying the Federal revenue with their notes. They were contented with that condition, and affirm that they flourished under it; and such of them as wish for the establishment of a National Bank, are still in favor of that condition, and of being divorced from the Government. The only difference is that they will submit to a divorce imposed by the by-laws of a Federal Bank, but will resist it coming from Congress. This answer is enough to explode the objection. It not only puts an end to it, but makes it ridiculous. No further answer is necessary to be given; but a further answer is at hand, and will be given. It comes from an authoritative source. The report of the committee of the banks of New York, on the resumption of specie payments, made on the 28th of February last, and approved in a general meeting of the banks of the city, holds this language:

"In contemplation of the resumption of specie payments by the banks of the city of New York, on or before the tenth of May next, and under the uncertain contingency of a simultaneous or early resumption by the banks of some of the other great commercial cities, it is incumbent on those of New York to adopt all the measures within the limits of their resources, which may enable them not only to resume, but also to maintain specie payments."

* * * * * * *

"The fall in the rate of foreign exchanges, now considerably below par in our city paper, renders it absolutely certain, that no exportations of specie can take place, and more than probable that a considerable influx may be expected. This fact, now indisputable, must have an effect on public opinion, and ought to remove the apprehensions of those who may have believed our efforts for an early resumption premature. Secure, as all the banks in the United States are, against foreign demands, we are justified in expecting their co-operation. If this is obtained, we do not perceive any obstacle to an early, easy, and safe resumption of specie payments."

* * * * * * *

"A continued suspension, on the part of some of the other great commercial cities, can alone render the resumption on our part difficult, and may prevent a free application of the legitimate resources of New York. Yet, such is the favorable relative state of the balances between this and the other parts of the Union, that for the present, at least, but little need be apprehended from the effect of natural causes. Of deliberate acts of hostility, as there could be no motive for such, there should be no apprehension on our part. We trust that, supported by the community of this city, and by the State, the banks will be able to surmount all obstacles, and on or before the tenth of May to resume and maintain specie payments."

From this authentic report, it is seen that the banks of the city of New York have determined to resume specie payments on or before the 10th day of May next; that they ask nothing but the co-operation, or forbearance, of other banks, and are afraid of nothing but the deliberate hostility of some non-resuming banks in other cities, that is to say, Mr. Biddle's bank in Philadelphia. This is the language of the banks in New York. They ask nothing, and they fear nothing, from the Federal Government. They fear nothing from the Sub-Treasury bill. They declare their only danger to be in the conduct of the non-resuming banks of some neighboring cities. Now, which is entitled to most credit in this contradiction of opinion, the New York banks, or the politicians on this floor? Certainly it is a case in which the opinion of the banks must prevail. They know their own condition; they know the condition of others; they have the work of resumption to perform, and they say they can perform it. If they can, all other banks must be able to do it likewise, or must have imposed falsehoods upon the country when they stopped payment last May; for all then declared that they did not stop from their own weakness, but from the example of New York; and that they would be ready to resume whenever her banks did. This was the language of all, and of none more publicly and positively than that of Mr. Biddle's bank. The banks, then, upon their own showing, are all able to resume, and it is not for politicians, who cannot be admitted to know the condition of the banks as well as the banks do themselves, and who have their own political objects to accomplish by prolonging the suspension—it is not for them to discover excuses for the future failure of the banks in the acts of a Government, the whole of whose acts are, in their eyes, full of folly and ruin. Even if these politicians stood before the country as sound judges, their judgment could not come in competition with the opinion of the banks. But they do not so stand. They do not stand as sound judges, but as frail and fallible partisans, whose habitual vaticination of ruin from every act of the Government—whose thousand and one mistakes heretofore committed—whose burning desire to get into power by destroying the credit of those in power—must reduce them to the condition of permanent prophets of wo, predicting destruction, as a matter of course, from every thing which their adversaries do.

The establishment of a Treasury bank is the next great objection to the bill. It is declared to be a Treasury bank; and then a frightful picture of the evils of such a bank is drawn by each speaker, and held up to terrify the people. I thank them for this objection; it kills off four others which this party have made against this Administration, and on each of which they have have insisted with all the vehemence with which they now urge this one. It kills off the whole charge of intending to establish a National Bank in New York; the whole charge of intending to impose the safety fund system upon the whole Union; the whole charge of intending to govern the country, by a corrupt league of pet banks; and the whole charge of intending to impose an exclusively metallic currency upon the country. The establishment of a Treasury bank is inconsistent with these four charges, and, being the last charge, it kills off the others. In this, it does us good service. It shows what stuff the gentlemen's charges are made of. It kills off four of their most serious charges at a blow; and now we will kill it off, and so finish five together. This can be done with two words; in the first place, there is not one feature of a Treasury bank in the bill; in the second place, I pledge myself to vote to eradicate it, if gentlemen can show me a single feature.

Sensible that there is nothing in the bill to justify the objection, gentlemen fly off to suppositions, and charge a future design to erect a Treasury bank upon the foundation of an Independent Treasury, and to furnish the Government with boundless supplies of money, by the issue of exchequer bills in the shape of Treasury notes. To these imaginations of the gentlemen, I can only oppose positive denials, and wait for time to perform its office upon this accusation as it has done upon all that they have made for eight or nine years past. For one, I shall never vote for such a bank, nor for nother issue of Treasury notes.

A third objection is to the insecurity of the public moneys in the hands of the Government agents. Gentlemen suppose that the moneys will be much safer in the keeping of the banks, than in the custody of the officers appointed by the Government to keep them. This is an objection which both reason and experience rejects. Reason teaches us that a number of men acting together, will do that which each one of them, individually, would scorn to do. Thus, a board of bank directors would do an act which each member of the board, in his own individual case, would spurn to do. Take the case of the thirty millions of public deposites in the hands of the banks in May last. They were in the custody of boards of directors; and, as boards, the directors acted in refusing the restitution of these deposites to the Treasurer of the United States, and to the disbursing officers in whose names they stood. But suppose these thirty millions had been deposited with the members of the same boards in their individual capacities, their personal honor, to say nothing of their bonds and securities, bound for the restitution—they would have restored the amount to the last dollar, and felt the deepest humiliation at the slightest delinquency. Such would have been their conduct. An individual is a safer depositary than a board; and far better would it be to confide the public deposites to any one single director of a bank, than to the whole together as a corporation. A corporation has no soul and no conscience: an individual director has both; and these, with his bonds and securities, would be the highest pledge for his fidelity. This is what reason teaches us. Now for experience. We have Treasurers of the United States, and but one Treasurer at a time. These Treasurers have passed through their hands, counting from the foundation of the Government, about eight hundred millions of dollars. Has any part of these eight hundred millions been lost in their hands? No: not one cent! Again: we have Treasurers of the Mint, one at a time. These Treasurers have had the actual keeping, counting, and paying out, of seventy-three millions of dollars in gold and in silver. Has one piece of it been lost in their hands? No: not one! Under the bill before us, the mints are to be made depositories of the public moneys. Experience shows them to be safe places; their peculiar occupation makes them proper places; and I wish we had three or four more of them, and then all the public moneys might be deposited in them.

But gentlemen, in support of their objection, made an assertion, and started an inquiry which has ended in the total overthrow of their position. They ventured upon a question of fact—a question of figures and records—a question to be answered by documentary evidence. It was as to the comparative amount of past losses; whether the Government had lost most by using banks, or by trusting to their own fiscal agents; and in this inquiry gentlemen were bold in their affirmation that the comparison was to the disadvantage of the Government agents, and entirely in favor of the banks. How unfortunate for their argument this attempt to do honor to the banks! It has led to official inquiries at the Treasury Department, and here is the answer. It is a communication from the Secretary of the Treasury, dated February 28th, of the present year:

"In answer to the first inquiry, as to 'the amount of balances against all banks which have been used as public depositories that is not secured, or will probably be lost, adding thereto the estimated loss that has accrued by taking on public account depreciated bank notes,' I would observe, that it is computed those balances so lost will be about $1,000,000, and the loss by taking such notes about $5,500,000; making, in the aggregate, $6,500,000. This is without the addition of any interest, as are the subsequent statements. If interest was cast on the above sums, the aggregate would exceed $13,000,000.

"The data on which this computation rests are, that the nominal balances against banks that have been public depositories, and in default, are now, though excluding what stands to the credit of disbursing officers, about $7,000,000. Of this sum near $1,076,000 stands against old bank depositories, and the residue against recent ones. The loss to the Treasury by taking depreciated notes in 1814, '15, '16, and '17, is estimated at quite $5,500,000; and there is now on hand of such notes, then received and never paid away or collected, about $80,000 more, as is more fully detailed in a report to the Senate from this Department, made the 1st instant. These constitute an aggregate of $12,580,000."

To these losses from local banks is to be added the sum of $233,422, for the principal and interest of dividend due from the Bank of the United States, and withheld on a pretexted claim for damages on the protested bill of exchange on the French Government. The answer to the second branch of the inquiry stands thus:

"In answer to the second inquiry, as to 'the amount of balances against all kinds of collecting officers which has not been secured and will probably be lost,' I have, after careful examination, computed that it will not exceed from $900,000 to $1,200,000. From the long period covered by these balances, connected with their great number, it must be obvious that the amount which has been wholly lost cannot, in many cases, be ascertained with accuracy.

"But the data for this estimate are as follows: The nominal amount of such balances is about $2,500,000. Schedules of most of them late as October, 1837, with certain explanations, may be seen in a report to the House of Representatives, made by this Department on the 15th January last; and another, with more detailed explanations, is now preparing, in conformity to a resolution of the Senate, passed the 15th instant. From the whole amount, there should first be deducted a sum for what has been ascertained to be probably secured or paid. This ranges from $1,000,000 to $1,150,000.

"Of the nominal balances, a further sum, equal to near $300,000, has never been put in suit; and, in most cases, this is believed to have arisen from a knowledge that nothing would appear to be due when the vouchers were all offered, and the allowances made which were considered legal."

Thus stands the comparison between the banks and the collectors and disbursing agents; and the difference is more than five to one in favor of the collectors and these agents. In both instances, the comparison goes back to the foundation of the Government, and it is to be observed that the losses among the collectors almost entirely accrued under the old system, before the four years' law took effect—that law which brings the accounts of every moneyed agent to a close every fourth year. Thi law, with other regulations at the Departments have nearly put an end to losses by collectors. In the War Department, in the disbursement of one hundred millions in the last fifteen years, there has not been the loss of a dollar. The other Departments have also been greatly improved. If the comparison had been confined to the last fifteen years, since the new law and the new regulations have been in force, it would have resulted still more to the discredit of the banks and to the honor of the Government agents. But it is not by the losses appearing on the Treasury books that this great question is to be answered. Those books only show the direct losses to the Government from the use of bank paper and banks as depositories; the indirect losses to the Government, and the losses to its creditors and to the whole community from the use of depreciated paper, must also be taken into the account; and then the mischiefs from the use of these banks and their paper money appear in their enormous, incalculable, and appalling amount. Gentlemen of the Opposition have recurred with great commendation to the report of a committee to the House of Representatives, of which Mr. McDuffie was chairman, some seven or eight years ago, to show the evils of a Treasury bank—that phantom of which there is no existence any where but in their own imaginations. They produce his report with every commendation; of course they cannot object to its authority; and here is a paragraph taken from it which should begin to open their eyes, or the eyes of the country, to the magnitude of the losses from Government reliance on local banks and their paper money.

"The Government borrowed, during the short period of the war, eighty millions of dollars, at an average discount of fifteen per cent. giving certificates of stock, amounting to eighty millions of dollars, in exchange for sixty-eight millions of dollars in such bank paper as could be obtained. Upon the very face of the transaction, therefore, there was a loss of twelve millions of dollars, which would, in all probability, have been saved, if the Treasury bad been aided by such an institution as the Bank of the United States But the sum of sixty eight millions of dollars received by the Government was in a depreciated currency, not more than half as valuable as that in which the stock given in exchange for it, has been, and will be redeemed. Here then is another loss of thirty four millions, resulting incontestably and exclusively, from the depreciation of the currency, and making, with the sum lost by the discount, forty-six millions of dollars."

Mr. McDuffie says, and says truly, in his report that this loss of forty-six millions was only one item in the catalogue of losses—that the loss to the community, and to the Government creditors, from using depreciated paper was beyond calculation. His remedy for these losses was a National Bank; mine is an adequate supply of gold and silver, and especially of gold; and if it is asked how much gold will be sufficient, I answer, that so far as the currency of a National Bank is concerned, twenty odd millions would be enough; for that is the maximum amount of currency that she ever furnished. A supply then of twenty odd millions of gold would meet all objections arising from the withdrawal of her currency, and that amount will be in the country before the present term of Mr. Van Buren's Administration expires, and double that amount in seven or eight years.

The loss to Government creditors was incredible from the use of depreciated paper during the late war. Even the Treasury notes were depreciated, in some parts, as low as 33⅓ per cent. The loss to creditors from the use of bank notes, since May last, has also been great. The public moneys in the hands of the deposite banks were then 30 millions; the Government has been paying it out ever since, to the great profit of the banks, to the immense discredit of the Government itself, and to the heavy loss of many of its creditors.

But the money test cannot complete the comparison between the two classes of agents. Other considerations of great weight, and some of still graver character, belong to the subject. First, in point of amenability. The Government officers are amenable to the Government, subject to its laws and its orders; liable to summary proceedings for default, and to be pursued by execution wherever they go, and responsible in person and in property, themselves and all their securities, for all that is owing by them. Not so with the banks. They are the creations of the State Governments, subject to State laws, and having great influence over the enactment of State laws which concern themselves. The States may protect them, and have protected them, against the Federal demands. They have passed acts to prevent the recovery of damages which the charters had fixed; and to prevent execution against the banks themselves, unless the creditors would consent to receive his debt in current bank notes. This is what has been done; it is what is now done; and here is the evidence of it.

Mr. B. then exhibited a document, obtained from the Department of State, containing the acts passed by the legislatures of different States since the suspension of specie payments in May last. They were passed in States where there were deposite banks, then holding about thirty millions of public money, standing in the name of the Treasurer of the United States, or in the names of disbursing officers. These acts, in some instances, reduced the damages which depositors and holders of notes were entitled to recover; and, in some instances, denied execution against the bank, unless the creditor would endorse upon it that current notes should be receivable. Mr. B. said he had seen no instance in which these acts made any exception in favor of the United States; and he read the titles of several of the acts, and the names of the States in which they were passed, and referred to the Senators from those States to say whether there were any exception. No Senator answering in the affirmative, Mr. B. resumed, and said that here was an insurmountable objection to the future employment of State banks as public depositories, or to the reception of their notes in the payment of the Federal revenue. The States had interposed between the Federal Government and the holders of its moneys. They might interpose again and for ever. By so doing, they injured the United States, and laid a ground for complaint and collision with the State Governments. Every consideration of harmony and mutual independence should forbid the possibility of such occurrences for the future.

Again: The deposite banks, whether a National Bank or catalogue of State banks, were the friends of high taxes and low appropriations. They went for surpluses, for the accommodation of themselves and a few of their friends. They went for taxing the nation to the uttermost, and stinting appropriations to the minimum, that enormous surpluses should remain in their hands for loans to themselves and friends. He (Mr. B.) had a table in his hand, obtained from the Treasury Department, and showing the annual amount of balances in the Treasury from the foundation of the Government to the present time, and which he would read. It was valuable for two purposes: 1. To show how little need the Government has for large balances; 2. How large these balances became when the banks were powerful and the Government connected with them. In the first years of the Government, the banks were few in number, and comparatively weak; and then the surpluses stood thus:

Year.	Balance.
1789	$28,239
1790	570,023
1791	973,905
1792	783,444
1793	753,661
1794	1,151,924
1795	516,442
1796	888,895
1797	1,021,899
1798	617,451
1799	2,161,867
1800	2,623,311

Thus, during this period of twelve years, when the National Bank had but ten millions of capital, and State banks were few and weak, the average surplus for twelve years did not amount to one million of dollars. Now for a different picture. Behold the years 1815-'16-'17.

Year.	Balance.
1815	13,106,592
1816	22,033,519
1817	14,989,465

These three years covered the brief season of bank omnipotence after the conclusion of the late war. The second National Bank, with its thirty-five millions of capital, was then just created; State Legislatures littered local institutions by the forty at a time. Bank influence was predominant every where; and no where more powerful than in Congress. Its irresistible influence here was well described at that time by the intrepid and sagacious Mr. Randolph. This is what he said:

"Every man you meet, in this House or out of it, with some rare exceptions, which only served to prove the rule, was either a stockholder, president, cashier, director, attorney, clerk, or door-keeper, runner, engraver, paper maker, to a bank.

"We are tied hand and foot, and bound to conciliate this great mammoth," [the banking interest.]

Such was the power of the banks at that time; and the consequence was, an average surplus of near seventeen millions per annum. To be sure it only lasted three years; and the reason was, that the banks only ruled the country for three years. It was a short ride, and a merry one; and now for a plunge. Let us see the next four or five years.

Year.	Balance.
1818	1,478,526
1819	2,079,992
1820	1,198,461
1821	1,681,592
1822	4,237,427

Here the average is reduced to about two millions per annum; and why? Because the banks had lost their dominion over the country and the Government, and had neither the means nor the influence to inflate the Treasury. It was the season of their first catastrophe in time of peace; and every thing went down in proportion to their own great fall. It was the season of a general collapse. Let us pass on to the next ascension, to the next perihelion, of this ballooning of the banks. About the year 1833, when the National Bank had lost the prospect of a re-charter, but expanded its business, and when local banks were increased in unprecedented numbers, and as many as ninety of them became the depositories of the public moneys, their power and influence again became immense. The result, on the Federal Treasury, was:

Year.	Balance.
1833	11,702,995
1834	8,892,858
1835	26,749,803
1836	46,708,436
1837	35,759,630

Here is another season of five years of great power in the banks, and of close connection with them by the Federal Government. The result is, an average balance, that is to say, an annual surplus, of about twenty-seven millions of dollars! What a comment upon the connection between Bank and State! A connection which exhibits the Federal Treasury as a mere appendage to a rising, flying, plunging and falling balloon. We who have been here for some years have seen the inside working of this connection, and have seen the votes which created these enormous surpluses; votes to promote all taxation—to prevent all reduction of taxes—and to prevent all possible appropriations, even for the defence of the country, and for the completion of the fortifications; and we have seen these votes regularly coming from the friends of the banks. To complete the picture, it is sufficient to say that the banks had their second catastrophe, in time of peace, in May last; and that now the balance in the Treasury is low enough!

Mr. B. said, he had for years pointed out the Bank of the United States, while the depository of the public moneys, as the ally of taxes, and the enemy of appropriations; he had made the same remark upon the local deposite banks almost as soon as they were in operation; and he had now given the evidence to show the justice of the application of this character to them both. It was a most fatal objection to all connection with those banks; an objection from which the Government agents would be wholly free. With the mints and individual officers, to keep the public moneys, there would be no interest here to create surpluses for the benefit of banks and their favorites.

A third answer to this objection is, that it goes to the form of our Government, and impeaches the capacity of the people to administer their own Government. The objection is, that the agents selected by the Government, and responsible to it, cannot be trusted to keep the public moneys; and, therefore, the custody of the money must be confided to bank directors, who are not appointed by the Government, nor responsible to the people. This is the objection; and, upon its face, it impeaches the capacity of the people to administer their own Government, and to take care of their own property. This is an inevitable inference; and, perhaps, another inference will also result; namely, that if banks are necessary to the Federal Government, she will have the same power to create as to adopt these institutions.

A fourth objection made to the Independent Treasury is, that it will hoard specie—that it will cause the Government to become an immense miser, hoarding in the deep recesses of vaults, and confining with bolts, bars, and safes, a vast accumulation of gold and silver. Sir, the table of balances which I have read explodes this objection. It shows that the Government has no balances of any consequence, except when it is connected with banks. When free from that connection, or when the banks are too weak to exert an influence over the public counsels, the surplus on hand is next to nothing; a million per annum in the earlier stages of the Government, and two millions per annum in later times. The table shows how little need there is for any surplus; for it is notorious that the Government machine worked far better when it was a touch-and-go business with the Treasury, than it ever did with its ten, twenty, thirty, and forty millions of surplusses. There will be no surplus to be hoarded if the Government can succeed in breaking its connection with the banks. Economy can then be practiced, as well as professed. It can then be practised by those who are really in favor of it.

Mr. B said, that at the extra session he had given it as his opinion that the payment of the Federal revenues in gold and silver would not occasion more than four or five millions of dollars to be taken out of circulation; in other words, that four or five millions would accomplish the annual payment of the whole revenue. A further study of the subject, and a view of the table of balances which he had just presented, induced him to believe that two or three millions would be sufficient. One million was found to be sufficient in the first twelve years of the Government, and two millions in the five years from 1818 to 1822, inclusive. The same amount would have been equally sufficient at all other times. He was against surpluses; he was against any financial calculation for leaving any amount whatever in the Treasury; he was opposed to any scheme of finance which had for its basis any reserve of money in the Federal Treasury. This was an old subject with him [Mr. B.] He had made his acquaintance with it twelve years ago. He had then tried his young hand, for the first time, on a financial subject, and on resolutions submitted by himself to repeal so much of the Sinking Fund act of 1817 as directed a reserve of two millions per annum to be kept in the Treasury. He had then shown it to be an unnecessary precaution; that it was far better to cut down taxes to the estimated expenditure, and invest the Government with a contingent authority to borrow the two millions in the event of a need for it to meet appropriations before Congress would assemble. This was his opinion twelve years ago; it was his opinion now. He was opposed to any plan for leaving a surplus dollar in the Treasury; he was opposed to the issue of Treasury notes to supply deficiencies; he was for the contingent authority to borrow, if necessary, a small sum to meet appropriations, and then paying it off out of the first surplus. In this way, and by increasing and diminishing the amount for the flexible objects of expenditure, such as fortifications, ships, harbors, light-houses, &c. the small, occasional, and alternate deficiencies and excesses in the revenue could be easily, safely, and economically met and provided for.

Not specie enough in the world to supply the demand which this bill would create, and not time enough in the year to count it, if there was enough, is another of the objections to this bill. This is relied upon by many speakers, and grave calculations are gone into to show that the three hundred and sixty-five days in the year would be too short a time to suffice for the counting in and counting out the Government revenues, if paid in gold and silver. Sir, there is a species of argument which the logicians call the argumentum ad ignorantiam—an argument to ignorance; but this argument goes beyond that, for it is an argument to the lowest degree of ignorance. If any answer was due to it—the counting part of it—it might be found in the act of 1789, when the revenues were directed to be paid in gold and silver coin only; and also, in a speech delivered on the floor of the House some years ago, when the collection of the revenues in hard money was so strenuously urged by a gentleman, now so entirely opposed to it.* But no answer is due to it. Every body knows better. Neither individuals, or nations, ever lost time in counting masses of specie. Ordinary sums are counted without loss of time, and masses are transferred by weight, or in kegs or bags.

With respect to the other part of the objection—the impossibility of getting an adequate supply—it is an objection refuted by the experience of all nations, and particularly by our own experience. At the close of the Revolution we had nothing but depreciated paper; in six or seven years afterwards we had an adequate supply of gold and silver. So of France: In 1800 she had nothing but assignats, depreciated as low as our old continental bills. In seven years afterwards she had a specie currency of five hundred and fifty millions of dollars. So of England: In 1819 she had nothing but depreciated paper; Parliament passed an act for the resumption of specie payments, and allowed four years for the banks to supply themselves. In two years the Bank of England reported an acquisition of twenty millions sterling in gold—one hundred millions of dollars—and that she was ready to resume. The same bank now, at this moment, has made an acquisition of six millions sterling—thirty millions of dollars—in the brief space of nine months. In May last, her supply was three and a half millions sterling; in January, it was nine and a half. But to come to our own country. Our custom-house returns show that specie flows in upon us annually in large masses, and either remains with us, or goes off again, precisely as it suits our own policy to retain it or not. Our correct returns of imports and exports of specie go back to the year 1821, and this is the result:

	Imports.	Exports
1821 - -	$8,064,890	$10,478,059
1822 - -	3,360,846	10,810,189
1823 - -	5,897,896	6,372,897
1824 - -	8,379,835	9,014,553
1825 - -	6,150,765	8,797,955
1826 - -	6,880,960	4,704,553
1827 - -	8,152,130	8,014,880
1828 - -	6,489,741	8,242,476
1829 - -	7,400,612	4,924,020
1830 - -	8,155,964	2,178,773
1831 - -	7,305,945	9,014,931
1832 - -	5,907,554	5,656,340

This includes a period of twelve years. The imports for that period amount to the large sum of $83,356,000. The average import was about seven millions of dollars per annum. If the specie policy of General Jackson had then been in force, a large proportion of this import would have remained in the country; but the paper money policy was then in the ascendant. The Bank of the United States was then omnipotent; and her policy was to export specie, for the double purpose of making a profit on the export, and creating a vacuum at home, to be filled by her own notes; and, above all, to deprive the country of specie, and reduce the local banks to the use of her notes for their capital; so that when she wished to upset the Government, to rule the elections, or to convulse the moneyed world, she would have nothing to do but to order a curtailment of two or three millions a month, and charge it upon any act, no matter what, of the Federal Government. This was the policy which then prevailed, and accordingly, large as the import of specie was in these twelve years, the export was still larger: it was $84,280,000. Thus, instead of retaining any part of what came in for the use of the country, there was actually sent out about a million more than came in.

The next period of five years shows the effect of the specie policy. The imports and exports for this period stand thus:

	Imports.	Exports.
1833 - -	$7,070,368	$2,614,951
1834 - -	17,911,662	1,676,258
1835 - -	13,131,447	5,748,174
1836 - -	12,166,372	4,435,815
1837 - -	10,954,432	7,714,990

Behold the difference! Our imports for five years amounting to sixty-two millions; our exports almost nothing. The average import for the whole five years, including 1837, amounting to about twelve millions and a half of dollars; and our exports, except for the extraordinary year of 1837, only averaging a little over three millions. This is the state of our own experience. It shows that, without any demand for specie, it flows in upon us at the rate of seven millions per annum, but flows out again; that with a demand for it, it flows in at the rate of twelve and a half millions per annum, and nearly all remains with us. This is the effect of a demand for specie for the Federal Treasury. Let that demand continue. Let the Government continue to collect, and above all, to pay out, specie, and in a few years the national supply will be complete. The country will possess as much as it can use, be it a hundred, a hundred and twenty, or a hundred and fifty millions. The supply will find its own level, and the excess will flow off.

These, sir, are the main objections to the bill. They are the principal ones which have been urged. They will not bear examination. Every argument resulting from them is an argument in favor of the bill, instead of being against it. And what is the alternative proposed by those who object to this bill? By the Federal gentlemen the alternative is openly proclaimed to be a National Bank: that is to say, Mr. Biddle's bank; for they mean no other. By a few of the Republicans, a resort to the State banks is the alternative. The Federal gentlemen agree to take this latter alternative for the present—as so much gained towards their National Bank—as a half-way house to that institution. This is candid in those gentlemen. It is candid, if it is not wise. They will go with a few of our friends to the half-way house, knowing that Mr. Biddle can blow up that house any night that he pleases, and that the Chestnut street palace must then become the refuge of the terrified inmates of the demolished stopping place.

Mr. B. would not dilate upon the dangers of this alternative. To learn danger—to take warning—from an enemy, is a maxim of great antiquity, and one which has its full application on this occasion. If neither the conduct of the Opposition, their language, their speeches on this floor, can warn gentlemen, it would seem to be almost in vain to appeal to past experience, to witness the present, or to contemplate the future. The State bank deposite system, with the use of their paper money, has failed us in time of war and in time of peace. It has twice failed in time of peace. It is now in a state of failure. The late deposite banks now owe the Government six and a half millions of dollars, which an empty Treasury in vain calls for. To rely upon them again, is to walk into the pit in broad day with the eyes wide open. Our banking system, always on fallacious principles—always unsolid and delusive—is now becoming worse than ever. It becomes worse daily, and in many instances, is made so on purpose, that another catastrophe may be produced, and then charged upon the Administration. Issuance of small notes, even down to a dollar; issuance of post notes; connection with party politics, and with that party whose connection has been fatal to all its associates; subjection to the policy of the Bank of the United States, on the part of a great many banks; such is the downward course of our banking system at present. Timely and prudent reformation might save it; but all reformation is resisted and baffled. To make all worse, seems to be the policy of those who have most power over the subject. Under these circumstances, what fatuity in the Government of the United States to connect its Treasury again with these institutions, big with inherent dangers, and beset by a tremendous foe!

I have gone over some of the objections to the plan for an Independent Treasury. I have spoken to some parts of the bill before the Senate; but the merits of that bill are no part of the real question. The contest is for power. Political power is the object of the Opposition—abuse of the bill, the means of attaining it—and a panic the grand desideratum. Panics are the aliment of the Federal party—terror their engine for governing the people. The mythological god Pan is the divinity of their worship. To him they look for help—to that grotesque and hideous deity, half man and half goat, whose bare apparition in ancient times would put whole armies to flight. This is the tutelary divinity of the Federal party, and always has been. Panics were their resource from the foundation of the Government; and, forty years ago, the French Revolution was what the Republican administrations now are, the great magazine of horrors from which they supplied themselves with "gorgons' heads and chimeras dire," to alarm and terrify the nation. Mr. Jefferson, in his memoirs, has described that period, emphatically called the Reign of Terror. He has given many pages to the description of it; but declares that no person, who did not witness it, can form any idea of the terrorism with which the Federal party then surrounded itself, and the rudeness and violence with which they browbeat and insulted the Republicans. Some extracts from his description of that period may bring up useful recollections at this time, when the violence of the revived Federal party so far transcends all that was witnessed forty years ago. He says:

"The horrors of the French revolution, then raging, aided them mainly, and using that as a raw-head-and-bloody-bones, they were enabled by their stratagems of X, Y, Z, their tales of tub-plots, ocean massacres, bloody-buoys, &c. to spread alarm into all but the firmest breasts. These transactions, now recollected as dreams of the night, were then sad realities; and nothing rescued us from their Iiberticide effect but the unyielding opposition of those firm spirits who sternly maintained their posts in defiance of terror. · · · · · The usurpations and violations of the Constitution at that period, and their majorities in both Houses of Congress were so great, so decided, and so daring, that after combating their aggressions, inch by inch, without being able in the least to check their career, the Republican leaders thought it would be best for them to give up their useless efforts there, go home, get into their respective Legislatures, embody whatever of resistance they could be formed into, and if ineffectual, to perish there as in the last ditch. All, therefore, retired, leaving Mr. Gallatin alone in the House of Representatives, and myself in the Senate, where I then presided as Vice President. Remaining at our posts, and bidding defiance to the browbeatings and insults by which they endeavored to drive us off also, we kept the mass of Republicans in phalanx together, until the Legislatures

*Extract from Mr. Webster's speech on the Bank of the United States Charter Bill, February, 1816.

"No nation had a better currency than the United States. There was no nation which had guarded its currency with more care; for the framers of the Constitution, and those who enacted the early statutes on this subject, were HARD MONEY MEN; they had felt, and therefore duly appreciated, the evils of a paper medium; they therefore, sedulously guarded the currency of the United States from debasement. The legal currency of the United States was gold and silver coin; this was a subject, in regard to which Congress had run into no folly. · · · Gold and silver currency, he said, was the law of the land at home, and the law of the world abroad; there could, in the present state of the world, be no other currency. In consequence of the immense paper issues having banished specie from circulation, the Government had been obliged in direct violation of existing statutes, to receive the amount of their taxes in something which was not recognised by law as the money of the country, and which was, in fact, greatly depreciated. · · · ·

"As to the evils of the present state of things, Mr. W. admitted it in its fullest extent. If he was not mistaken, there were some millions in the Treasury of paper which were nearly worthless, and were now wholly useless to the Government, by which an actual loss of considerable amount must certainly be sustained by the Treasury. This was an evil which ought to be met at once, because it would grow greater by indulgence. In the end, the taxes must be paid in the legal money of the country, and the sooner that was brought about the better. · · · ·

If Congress were to pass forty statutes on the subject, he said, they would not make the law more conclusive than it now was that nothing should be received in payment of duties to the Government but specie; and yet no regard was paid to the imperative injunctions of the law in this respect. The whole strength of the Government, he was of opinion, ought to be put forth to compel the payment of the duties and taxes to the Government in the legal currency of the country." could be brought up to the charge; and nothing on earth was more certain, than if myself particularly, placed by my office of Vice President at the head of the Republicans, had given way and withdrawn from my post, the Republicans throughout the Union would have given up to despair, and the cause would have been lost for ever. By holding on, we obtained time for the State Legislatures to come up with their weight; and those of Virginia and Kentucky particularly, but more especially the former, by their celebrated resolutions, saved the Constitution at its last gasp. No person who was not a witness of the scenes of that gloomy period, can form an idea of the afflicting persecutions and personal indignities we had to brook. They saved our country however. The spirits of the people were so much subdued and reduced to despair, that they could have sunk into apathy and monarchy, as the only form of Government which could maintain itself."

Such, Mr. President, was the terrorism with which the Federal party surrounded itself forty years ago; such its mode of action then; and such its manner of acting on the public mind now. The Presidential election of 1796 was carried by terror, extracted from the French Revolution; the election of 1800 came within three votes of being carried by the same means. The second election of Mr. Jefferson prostrated Federalism—sent it into a state of hibernation far north, and with it the mythological deity of its worship, and the whole machinery of terror and alarm. The appearance of General Jackson, at the head of the list of Presidential candidates, in the winter of 1824–25, and the events of the election of President at that time by the House of Representatives, revived the two primitive political parties—the Republican and the Federal—and with the latter, its distinctive passion for terror, alarm, and panic. From that day to the present, a succession of alarms has agitated the public mind. Raw-heads-and-bloody-bones have stalked in solemn procession over the public stage. First, it was the military chieftain, who was to put an end to the Republic at once, with the sword. Then Congress was to be turned out of doors, neck and heels. Then the liberty of speech was to be put down—to be suppressed by main force: afterwards it was to be choked down by corruption. Then came a fright about pocketing bills. General Jackson did not return the land bill, which was sent to him too late to be returned; and, thereupon, all bills were to be pocketed, and all Federal legislation destroyed. After that, we had the Maysville Road bill veto alarm; and such was the effect of this fright for some months, that many good people believed that there was going to be a general destruction of all roads, and that all travelling would be reduced to scrambling through the woods, camping out at night, and swimming creeks and rivers like otters. Quick upon the heels of this fright, came the National Bank bill veto alarm. Then there was no mistake. Destruction had arrived. National wo had arrived. The price of all produce and property was to sink to nothing; every man's estate was to perish on his hands; black desolation was to sit upon the land. From the contemplation of this ruin, the nation was suddenly roused up to the apparition of the French war. For three months, this spectre of a French war kept its place on the public stage, to the extreme irritation of the nervous system of aged ladies, and with vast expenditure of ink and paper to the peace societies. The arrival of the gold indemnities put an end to the fantasies of this poor spectre. These brief and various little panics were preludes to the great one—the deposite-removal panic of 1833–34. This was a panic indeed, not only great in itself, but the prolific parent of a progeny of subaltern alarms. Orators here, and bank screws elsewhere, worked up the nation to a paroxysm of consternation. Great was the terror excited, and great the mischief inflicted. For six months, this chamber was the laboratory of alarm; the distress flag flying, the tocsin beating, and the alarm guns firing; all the while the Bank of the United States turning the screws on her debtors, to the sound of our music, and, with each scream of its suffering victims, exultingly demanding if the distress had not arrived?

The revolution without bloodshed—the expulsion of this body from its chamber by a military force—and the Protest, which was to wipe out the Constitution—were among the prominent scenes of that magnificent panic. The revolution was, in itself, a curiosity. It began in the middle, carried itself on without bloodshed, and ended without a catastrophe. That it has ended, I myself do know. I know it of my own knowledge, and can tell you how. You remember, sir, we were then informed that, in revolutions, there were no Sabbaths. Now, I have seen Sabbaths since that time myself. I have seen the people at church, worshipping, and keeping the Sabbath. This is conclusive; it is proof incontestible that the revolution has ended. Bloodless, we know it to have been. Without a catastrophe, we know it was. There was no list of killed and wounded; but there were some crippled and lamed—a certain catalogue of Presidential candidates, architects of panic, were gravelled on that occasion. They became what the "safe and solid specie-paying" bank notes are in the Treasury—an unavailable fund! They ended with finding themselves hors du combat; not horses of combat, as a worthy friend of mine is accustomed to read that French phrase, but stabled animals, withdrawn from the turf, tied up to the rack, solitary and alone, to digest their provender at their leisure.

The Senate expulsion panic, though severe at the time, is hardly to be regretted, on account of the noble spirit which it caused to be developed in this body. When the first tidings arrived of General Jackson's design to expel the Senate by force of arms, then was seen what stuff our hearts were made of. Incontinently patriotic indignation rose to the highest pitch, and courageous resolutions exhibited themselves in daring forms. Some proposed to go forth, and bravely meet the advancing danger. Others preferred to arm the doorkeeper, the messengers, and the boys with sticks and staves, and to plant them behind the jambs of the doors. Others, like ancient Romans, deemed it more senatorial to abide the event; in a sitting posture, not in curule, but in their leather back chairs. While still in this fearful condition, the portentous Protest arrived, to heighten the exciting scene, to multiply its perils, and to superadd alarm for the safety of our beloved Constitution to the personal consternation we endured on account of our own necks and limbs. How the Senate became relieved from this double peril is matter of history, which the tongue of eloquence has already immortalized on this floor, and which the pen of truth will faithfully transmit to a remote generation. Virginia came to the rescue! Hanover county did the business! We all remember that day when an orator of this body, rising in his place, announced to us the glorious results of the precinct elections at Long Tom, Slow and Hungry, Negro Foot, and Hell Town; and concluded with a declaration that he had heard the last knock of the hammer on the last nail in the coffin of Jacksonism. At this annunciation our spirits rose. The Senate breathed freer and deeper. We all began to feel like Brutuses, ready to brandish high our gleaming steel, and call on liberty, and bid the fathers of their country hail! for, lo, the tyrant down, and we again all free. But, alas! the mutability of human events! quickly we found ourselves in the condition of the poor fisherman in the Arabian Nights, who had corked up the terrific genie in a bottle, from which the giant spectre had emerged to fill all space with the expansion of his boundless form, to overshadow the whole earth with his endless height, and to menace the luckless fisherman with instant annihilation. So of the Senate, and its coffined Jacksonism. We had it in the coffin; we nailed it up; we were sure of it. We considered Jackson done for ever; yet he reappeared on the political stage with more power than ever, and with such effect upon the vision, that those who affirmed to us on this floor that they saw him coffined, now declare that he is still President of these United States, ruling the country with a rod of iron, and menacing all existing institutions with instant ruin.

Subordinate to these great alarms, Mr. President, were three small ones, which filled up the year 1834. There was the gold bill alarm, which was to debase the currency, and deprive the country of silver; the Safety Fund system alarm, in which the Albany regency were to extend corruption and intrigue to the uttermost boundaries of the Union; and the pet bank alarm, in which the country was to be ruined precisely to the same extent, by a conjunction with the banks, that it now is by a separation from them.

After so much agitation there was repose for a little while. We rested nearly two years, until the year 1836. In that year, the Treasury order appeared, and the occasion was deemed a favorable one for the revivification of panic and distress. A signal gun was fired from the Chestnut street palace, in the form of a letter from the president of the Bank of the United States to an ex-President of the United States. A response to that signal echoed from Kentucky, in the shape of a barbecue speech. Congress met; the proper resolution was introduced; panic speeches were let off. A brave effort was made, but to no purpose. The country refused to take fright, and that experiment upon the public nerves died out.

The expunging panic then took its turn. It was a hard struggle for an alarm, but no progress could be made at it. The people could not see the destruction of the Constitution, in the purification of the Senate journal. They could not see the destruction of the journal in the erasure of an iniquitous sentence from it. Far from being frightened at the act, they ordered it to be done; and the branded page will stand for ever as the evidence of a factious outrage on one side, and a monument of national reparation on the other.

The Treasury order and the expunging panics both failed. They were abortive experiments upon the nervous system of the people. Nothing disheartened, however, we find the Opposition gentlemen now bravely engaged at the fabrication of another. The Sub-Treasury bill panic is now the order of the day; and the total destruction of all banks—the total destruction of all credit—the sudden erection of a Treasury bank upon the ruins of all others—the exclusive imposition of Treasury bank paper money currency upon the people, and, at the same time, the exclusive imposition also of a hard money currency upon them; these are the raw-heads-and-bloody-bones which are now paraded before the eyes of the people. A certain speech delivered on this floor, the title page of which will claim a prominent place in the next emission of coffin handbills, is the congeries of these new horrors—collected, compounded, and conglomerated into one huge and frightful mass. With the delivery of that speech went forth the authoritative mandate for the new panic; but in vain. The people are tired of being scared. They refuse to take fright any more. Calm as a summer's morning, they read with indifference the programme for the alarm, and view with contempt the marshalling of the procession of the hobgoblins, phantoms, and spectres which are put in requisition for the ensuing elections. The country is quiet. But, behold the symptoms of panic in another quarter! The panic makers themselves are beginning to take fright! The tenth day of May approaches; and with it the elevation of that RESUMPTION FLAG which will cheer the hopes of all Republicans, and impress with terror the fainting hearts of the broken bank and shin-plaster party.

Thus we have gone on ever since the appearance of General Jackson on the political stage, and the coincident revival of the old political parties of 1798. Terror is the chosen agent of action upon the public mind now as it was then; but with this great difference, that the phantoms then brought forward to frighten the people into measures, were solely directed to the nervous system, and never combined with any attack upon the business operations of the country. People were then to be frightened out of their votes, but not deprived of work and labor, or ruined in their trade and occupation. Now the assault is double—it is both upon the nerves of the man, and upon his bread. The famous Queen Elizabeth, in stopping the income of the refractory Earl of Essex, said, an ungovernable beast must be deprived of his provender. So of the present Opposition tactics in our own country. Stop his bread—make him feel—turn him out to graze; this is the language of the day. An immense moneyed institution, able to create the distress which it foretells, has brought this Queen Elizabeth ingredient into the composition of modern Federal panics; and now every successive attempt at alarm is accompanied by an attack on the business of the country co-extensive with the power, and the ramifications of the power, of the Bank of the United States. Laborers dismissed—work stopped—factories closed—wages reduced—bread and fuel monopolized, and the price augmented—bank accommodations withheld from small dealers and hard workers, and profusely granted to capitalists, shavers, and speculators—specie payments suspended—exchanges deranged—actual distress created by every act of oppression and aggravated by every act of exaggeration—distress meetings—distress orations—distress committees—and the whole charged by its own authors on the Republican Administrations; such is the infusion of demoniac ingredients which bank vengeance has superadded to Federal panics, and by which the elections are to be governed, and the people scourged into submission to Federal and Bank domination.

It is now about six years since these attacks have been going on. They commenced with the famous veto session of 1832—the marble palace in Chestnut street, Philadelphia, being the source from which they emanate. The nearer to that source, the more the country is affected and injured; the farther off, the less. Thus, the South and West are less injured than the Northeast; and, in some particulars, the South and West are gaining under the effect of these attacks on business, while the States and cities North of the Potomac are losing. It is time for reflecting men to consider the consequences of this unnatural warfare upon the business of the country. It is time for them to ask themselves what its effects must be on the population, the manufactures, and the commerce of the Northeast, and on the banks themselves, which either become the criminal agents, or the unfortunate victims, of this diabolical policy. History informs us that the revocation of the edict of Nantes deprived France, in three years, of three hundred thousand souls, who carried to foreign States the arts and manufactures of their own native country. History also informs us that the tyranny of the Flemish manufacturing corporations transferred the woollen manufacture from Flanders to England. Already an effect similar to that of the revocation of the edict of Nantes on France, and of the tyranny of the Flemish corporations on Flanders, is beginning to be visible in the effects of this war upon the business of the country in the Northeast. Great is the number of respectable and useful artisans and laborers—great the number of enterprising young men—numerous the heads of families, with their sons and daughters, and promising train of young children, which have already bid adieu to the troubled scenes of the Northeast, and sought repose and independence in the rich and tranquil regions of the far West. Never was the emigration to the West so great. The roads, rivers and canals—all the western communications—are filled with moving masses, pressing into the great Valley of the Mississippi. "Westward the star of empire holds its course." A continuation of the causes of this emigration must augment the emigration itself; and in a few years the effects must be felt on the population and manufactories of the Northeast. To the banks themselves, whether the agents or the victims of this unnatural warfare, a continuance of such conduct must be fatal. Political associations for any purpose, and with any party, must be dangerous to banking institutions; but an association with that party whose connection has been fatal to two National Banks, and to every thing else that it ever touched, and an association to govern elections by breaking up the business of the country—such an association, must be fatal indeed, not merely to the culpable banks engaged in the work, but to many innocent ones which avoid their policy. To the great importing cities, and especially to New York, a continuance of this course; with a repetition of bank suspensions, derangement of exchanges, and interruption of credit, must be highly deleterious. The early loss of the Southern and Western trade may be the penalty of such conduct. Habit, and adventitious circumstances, now carry the Southern and Western merchants to the Northeast to purchase goods; and to purchase them at all the disadvantages of a second hand sale, loaded with the costs, charges, profits and losses of an intermediate sale. Direct purchases in Europe are as easy for the South and West as this second hand operation, and far cheaper. They have the capital—the real capital—in their hundred millions of annual exportable productions. They sell at hard money prices in Europe, and purchase at paper money prices in the United States. The paper system, always hard upon the exporting States, becomes ruinous to them in its derangements. The South and West have only to begin direct importations, and the natural channels will vindicate their own rights forever afterwards. Venice, Genoa, Alexandria, Cairo, once entrepôts of Asiatic and European commerce, had as well look for a restoration of that commerce after the Cape of Good Hope had been doubled, as that New York, Philadelphia, or Baltimore, shall look for a continuation of Southern and Western trade, when once the Liverpool and Havre markets shall be in direct communication with New Orleans and Charleston.

Mr. President, I have said but little—comparatively little—on the merits of the bill before you, because I know, as I have already said, that the merit or demerit of the bill, is not the question before us. It was the question which we presented; it is not the question which gentlemen of the Opposition have discussed. They bring forward another question—one of party, of political power, of restoration of themselves to power. They fly to all the topics of party warfare; they arm themselves from the magazine of party politics; and the Presidential election of 1840 is the object in view. The struggle is for the recovery of a lost charter, and restoration to lost power. The party which got into power, without the consent of the people, in 1825, and which has since been evicted from power by the voice of the people—that party now nerves itself for the dying contest of 1840. At its side is its well beloved cousin and ally, the denationalized National Bank, collecting all its energies for the recovery of a charter which a hero President, and a patriot people, refused to renew in 1832. This double recovery is the object; and the question which really presents itself, is this: ought the evicted Federal party, and the vetoed Federal Bank, be restored to the possession of the political and the pecuniary power of these United States? This is the question, and I hold the negative of it; for, of all Governments under the sun, restorations are admitted to be the most abominable and insufferable! They are the worst Governments ever known. Vengeance and persecution are their ruling passions, and indemnification for lost time their main occupation. It has been so in all ages and in all countries, and will be so for ever. Ancients and moderns—in Asia, Africa, Europe, and America—the same passions govern the restored party, modified only by the different degrees of civilization which prevail. With the Romans, it was proscription and exile—the aquæ et ignis interdictio. In Asia and Africa, the restored chief gluts his savage vengeance in acts of brute violence upon his helpless enemies. In Europe, more courtly methods accomplish the degradation, and, if need be, the destruction of the defeated party. In England, the restoration of the Stuarts was the signal for infesting the country with delators, informers, and spies; for fabricating meal-tub and rye-house plots; for sending the Sidneys and the Russels to judicial slaughter; for filling the prisons with patriots, the Parliament with bills of attainder, and the King's palace with bullies and assassins. In France, the restoration of the old Bourbons brought with it executions, exiles, persecutions, infringement of chartered liberties, and war upon every liberal idea. Here, in our own America, we have constitutional guarantees for the protection of personal rights; but of what avail against the passions and the power of party, let the fate of President Jackson—adjudged unheard by his enemies on this floor—convicted of an impeachable offence without the form of a trial—let his fate tell! Yes, sir! restorations, of all Governments, are the most odious and intolerable. No country has been able, in modern times, to endure one of them. The English chased off the Stuarts; the French chased away the old Bourbons. What sort of Government should we have, in these United States, under the restored dominion of the Federal party, so violent in Mr. Jefferson's time, and so much more furious now? What sort of a National Bank would that institution make which is now boiling over with vengeance against every Republican who has not "crooked the pliant hinges of the knee" to its divinity? Imagination shudders at the though of seeing the political and the pecuniary power of this Union fall into the hands of such a party, and such a bank.

Is their restoration probable? I think not. Temporary and partial success, the delusive fruit of terror and deception, may gild their banners for a while. They may carry some counties, some cities, some States. They may continue to exult in the issue of some local elections, as they have done heretofore. But to succeed in the main object—to carry the Presidential chair in 1840—that I hold to be impossible. I go upon my knowledge of the American people. I know them to be for their country, and believe that they can never elevate to power the party which builds its elevation upon the calamities, the humiliations, and the misfortunes of their country. They can never elevate to power the party which in every contest, foreign and domestic, is found on the wrong side of the question—on the side of the British, the French, the Indians, the Mexicans, the non-resuming banks, and the shin-plasters. Such a party cannot succeed; and I announce to them their fate in advance—a Jackson defeat for the month of November, one thousand eight hundred and forty.

REMARKS OF MR. JOHNSON, OF VIRGINIA.

In the House of Representatives, March 10, 1838—On the bill to restore Circuit Court powers and jurisdiction to the District Courts in Western Virginia.

Mr. BEIRNE had moved to strike out the first section of the bill, when

Mr. JOHNSON rose and remarked:

I regret exceedingly that my honorable colleague should have deemed it his duty to submit a motion to strike out the first section of the bill now under consideration. I can but think that, upon this occasion, he has in some measure departed from that expanded and liberal course which has hitherto marked and characterized all his legislative acts as a member of this House, and that, in his great zeal to to promote the supposed convenience of a portion of his immediate constituents, he has overlooked the great and abiding interest of Western Virginia.

It will be recollected that, as early as 1819, Congress passed an act establishing a United States Court west of the mountains, in the State of Virginia; that, previous to that date, all persons residing in the West, and having business in the Federal Court, were subjected to the irksome and expensive necessity of travelling some three or four hundred miles from their homes to the city of Richmond, that being the place where the court was holden.

To remedy this acknowledged inconvenience, the act of 1819, a copy of which I hold in my hand, was passed, by virtue of which act four courts were established in the West, and located at the following places: Clarksburg, Staunton, Lewisburg, and Wythe Court-house. This arrangement produced the most beneficial results, and gave general satisfaction to all concerned.

But, Mr. Speaker, by the provisions of the act of the third March, 1837, entitled "an act to amend the judicial system of the United States," a Circuit Court was established at Lewisburg, in the county of Greenbrier, and so much of the act of 1819 as invested the District Courts with Circuit Court powers and jurisdiction was repealed; and moreover, all actions, suits, prosecutions, causes, pleas, process, and other proceedings, relative to any cause, civil or criminal, then pending in the District Court, which might have been brought, and could have been originally cognizable in a Circuit Court, or returnable to the several District Courts, were transferred to the Circuit Court established at Lewisburg. The injurious consequences following in the train of this impolitic measure, is to leave the District Courts mere skeletons, having no business to do, over which they can exercise jurisdiction.

A reference to the relative powers and jurisdiction of the Circuit and District Courts, and a view of the geographical position of Western Virginia, will, at a glance, show the cause of the loud complaint on the part of the people in that region of country. The jurisdiction of the District Courts extends only to crimes and offences cognizable under the authority of the United States, and committed within their respective districts or upon the high seas; in civil cases of admiralty and maritime jurisdiction; where aliens sue for a violation of the laws of nations; or a treaty entered into by the United States, etc.; and again, suits at common law, where the United States is a party, and the matter in dispute amounts to one hundred dollars; suits against consuls, etc.: while that of the Circuit Court extends to all cases where the subject in controversy amounts to five hundred dollars; wheret he United States, aliens, or citizens of differentt States, are parties; and also, concurrent jurisdiction with the District Courts in most cases where crimes and offences have been committed against the well being, and in violation, of the laws of the United States.

If I am correct in the view here taken relative to the separate powers and jurisdiction of the Circuit and District Courts, a geographical survey of Western Virginia must satisfy all, even the most skeptical, that, situated in the interior—severed from the Atlantic by the lofty chains of the Alleghany, and remote from the seaboard, few cases can arise over which the District Courts have jurisdiction; but, restore to the court circuit powers and jurisdiction, and then what would be the result? Our courts would be in the zenith of usefulness, having full power to adjudicate and settle all controversies between citizens of the different States. There is Maryland, Pennsylvania, and Ohio, on the North; Kentucky, Tennessee, the Carolinas, on the South, thus situated: suits are continually springing up for adjudication in the Federal Courtt.

It is a fact known to all my colleagues who practice in that court, that, prior to the passage of the act of the 3d March, 1837, most of the suits brought in that court were by citizens of adjoining States, for the recovery of lands claimed, lying in Virginia. The unfortunate mode selected by the State for disposing of her western lands has, and must continue for years to produce a vast number of suits; consequently much litigation, depending chiefly upon questions of fact in regard to identity of survey, length of possession, date of patent; all of which it becomes the province of a jury to investigate and settle.

The facility with which dubious claims to land in Western Virginia can be obtained, has prompted many speculators to engage in that business. The consequence is, that innumerable claims are now held by persons having a right to bring their suits in the United States Court. Nevertheless, it is believed that but few of those claims can be sustained, provided a full, fair, and impartial development of all the facts can be aad. But, Mr. Speaker, if our citizens are to be drawn into court, remote from their residence, from their witnesses, and from the depositories of the record evidence, upon which, in most instances, their title depends, and this can only be found in the archives within the limits of their own counties; I repeat it, if they are forced some two or three hundred miles from home, subjected to all the additional cost and inconvenience incident thereto, it follows, as matter of course, that the most rational alternative would be for the wealthy to abandon his claim, as a poor man would be forced to do, rather than attempt to surmount the difficulties attendant on the prosecution of a suit, under such unequal and disadvantageous circumstances. But, sir, will the rich, unrelenting speculator surrender his claim? Will he abandon a field which affords so many facilities for over-reaching his less wealthy and more humble competitor? Will he forego consummating advantageously to himself, his nefarious speculations? No, sir, he will not; and we have much reason to fear that many claims, which are now dormant, or abandoned, will be purchased for a trifle, revived under false pretences, and suits instituted against the poor, honest occupant, not with the view of prosecuting him to the final issue, but for the heartless purpose of coercing an unfair and ruinous compromise.

I repeat, sir, that by the operation of the act of the last Congress, the district courts are left with original jurisdiction over maritime causes, etc. embracing none which are likely to arise in an inland country like that of Western Virginia. Another consequence is, that this entire district, forming a territorial area of four or five hundred miles in extent, is left with one solitary court, instead of four, placed at convenient points, as heretofore. Not only is the whole business of the country concentrated at remote and inconvenient points, but the delay of justice and expense of litigation enormously increased.

The bill under consideration does not abolish the Circuit Court at Lewisburg. With that we have nothing to do. It only provides for the restoration of circuit court powers and jurisdiction to the District Courts, and thereby restores to the people their rightful privileges and immunities, of which they have been unjustly deprived, by the operation of the law of the last Congress. The public voice throughout the State requires it, with the exception of my honorable colleague [Mr. BEIRNE] and his constituents in the immediate vicinity of Lewisburg. I will add that the public interest demands it. So far as I am informed, judges, lawyers, litigants, the people, all unite in asking this just right, this boon, at the hands of Congress. I ask the favor of my honorable colleagues to rise in their places and state the views of the people in their respective districts: for that purpose I now yield the floor.

REMARKS OF MR. BYNUM,

OF NORTH CAROLINA,

In the House of Representatives, February 12, 1838—On the resolution to raise a committee of investigation to inquire into the charges of corruption against a member of Congress, made by "the Spy in Washington."

Mr. BYNUM addressed the House as follows:

Mr. SPEAKER: I do not rise to enter into the discussion of the merits or demerits of the resolution, which, in my judgment, sir, has been most unfortunately brought before this House. With me, personally, it is a matter of the least consequence whether it is adopted or not. I have, individually, no fears of the most rigid scrutiny into any part of my conduct here, and consequently have no personal regard in the passage or rejection of the proposition contained in the resolution. I am perfectly willing that it shall pass in any form or shape that its friends, in their wisdom, may deem it proper to give it.

But, sir, I have risen here in my place, as the Representative, I hope and believe, of a virtuous and intelligent people, deliberately and solemnly, to enter my protest against the propriety and expediency of arraigning the members of either House of this, or any other Congress, upon such evidence as has been referred to in this debate. Were it from a more unquestionable source, it is, in my judgment, entirely too vague and indefinite to justify this House in going into an investigation of the character and conduct of its members. I earnestly believe that the institution of such an investigation, upon such evidence, can terminate in no practical benefit to the members of the House, the individuals concerned, or to the country at large. I solemnly protest against the propriety of every idea, of every project, and every attempt, to institute investigations here, into the conduct of members, upon the charges of any irresponsible hireling letter-writer, or of every licentious, dissolute editor of a partisan newspaper—a practice which, if established, must be pregnant with the most disastrous consequences to this House, to the nation, and all concerned. It will obstruct the whole important business of the House, and prove detrimental, in the highest degree, to every important public interest. Adopt your resolution, carry out your principle, let it grow into a precedent, and my life upon it, sir, you will soon have a scene exhibited here, of brawls and riots, hitherto unexampled in the history of this Government.

This hall will exhibit a spectacle, of crimination and recrimination, of charges and reputations, involving individual character, to the almost entire exclusion of every other important business of the people of this nation. The attempts to blacken and whitewash character here, must terminate in the final humiliation and degradation of your Congress, to the dishonor and disgrace of the nation. Human ingenuity could not devise a plan better calculated to bring into disrepute the character of this body, nor one more subversive of its peace and harmony, if not its very existence.

The argument that has been advanced by several honorable gentlemen who have preceded me, that, when charges were made against members of this body, they should be immediately investigated as a matter of right, involved a variety of considerations, and should depend entirely upon the circumstances of the case; but that it was right or proper to institute investigation here, except upon charges of a most specific character, founded upon evidence equally definitive, emanating from a high and responsible source, I am compelled from every consideration of its expediency and propriety to deny. An investigation of this character should never be undertaken, without a full determination to the impeachment or expulsion of the individual if found guilty, and should therefore never be resorted to, except upon charges from the highest and most responsible sources, and founded upon evidence most clear and explicit. It was no ordinary transaction to arraign a member there for a high crime and misdemeanor, and the House should revolt at the idea of doing it upon such vague, indefinite, and irresponsible authority, as had been alluded to in the course of the debate on this ill-omened resolution.

What distinguished man, I ask, has ever taken an active part in the transaction of the public business here, that has not been slandered, calumniated, and villified by hund eds of the most infamous charges, emanating from the same or similar sources, such as wanton licentious presses, and the foul irresponsible hired scribblers that have for years (or since the reign of the banks) haunted this capitol?

How many distinguished and illustrious names have ever escaped their calumny? Did Washington, Adams, Jefferson, Madison, or Monroe? No, sir! no, sir! None are exempt from their scandal, though their characters were more pure than the icicle. Scandal, sir, is the very food upon which those loathsome insects live and fatten—it is the mire in which they wallow in generating their corruption. And is it from such a source as this that charges are to come, and to be treated by this august body with seriousness, that are to set members of Congress "by the ears;" to involve this House in strife and confusion? Sir, surely gentlemen cannot be serious in attaching importance and consequence to such sources. Nor can they be aware of the consequences that must grow out of giving importance to such authorities: they certainly cannot foresee the LEVEL that they are about to bring down this House to. Nothing appears more clear to my mind, if you carry out your principle, than that it must eventuate only in anarchy and confusion, and overwhelm the whole country with gloom, degradation and disgrace.

Is it for us now to learn that a regular system of scandal and detraction had been carried on here, under the influence of these banking corporations, for years, by the most profligate characters, and to subserve the interest of some of the most licentious partisan newspaper presses? Was it not their daily vocation to pimp and pander in the myriads of foul rumors that were constantly in circulation in this city? It was their dependance for daily bread; and should such accusers receive the deliberate attention of an American Congress? I cannot believe that the least good can possibly result from any investigation founded on the charges of such creatures as we daily witness here moving about in by-places and the cuddles and recesses of your Capitol? The least notice of such things would be to make men of them, and attach to them a pride of place, upon which they would look as a most distinguished honor, should it result even in an escort of them to the prison or the penitentiary. I cannot, sir, therefore, see to the bottom of the depths of degradation to which the adoption of such a course must ultimately, in my judgment, reduce the once high character of this House.

But the source from whence these swarms of insects issue. Was it not known here that these hireling scribblers regularly flocked hither at the beginning of every session of Congress from most of the large cities, employed either directly or indirectly by the banks, or other incorporated companies, to defame and write down any member of this House who should dare oppose their interests? Was it not at the hazard of the denunciation and defamation of such creatures that any here ever rose to speak in favor of the interests of the honest laborer, or planter and ploughman of the soil? With the herd of such idlers, it is a crime to doubt whether they and their employers have a rightful claim to live on the profits of the laboring man and planter of your fields; and he who has the stubborn courage to stand here and speak in their defence, must expect to receive all the odium and defamation that their malignance and their ingenuity can invent. The most of them were hired and sent here by those banking corporations, no doubt, to slander and hunt down every Republican speaker that could not be either intimidated and seduced, or purchased over to serve their purposes, and to promote their interest, at the expense of the interests of the great body of the laboring and planting people of this country. They are the friends of these classes that these defamers are employed to traduce and villify, with the sole object of upholding themselves and their employers in living in idleness, and upon the earnings of the honest laborer. The people abroad should be informed of the means here resorted to by certain presses and bank corporations to sustain their interest, to the prejudice of the great body of the people of this nation.

But who are those hirelings that have been for years endeavoring to pit members of Congress against members, in that House, and to make them act the part of mere tussey boys of this servile crew? Sir, they are your "Spies in Washington," and anonymous, irresponsible correspondents of those base and mercenary institutions that do neither labor nor sweat for the pelf they enjoy. Was it possible that any man, a member of that House, could debase himself so low as to be played off on, and set on, by such a crew? I cannot, I will not, for a moment believe it. The low, disgraceful, and degrading system of espionage which they were trying to carry on over the conduct of every Republican member of this House, as well as the different officers of the Government that did not give in allegiance to their employers, called aloud, in my humble estimation, for the bitterest indignation of an insulted public.

"Spies" and "informers" had ever been held up with public reprobation by every intelligent people of whom the earliest historians give account; and why now should they be looked on with such peculiar favor as guardians of the public interests? Sir, it "omens badly;" there is a sickly disease in the times. For my own part, I have ever shunned them as I would have done a viper or a spotted toad. All seem to consider it a disgrace to be found in company with them; yet they speak and write as though from authority, justified by the closest intimacy with every member of this House. Nor did they stop even there: if they were to be believed, they were perfectly intimate with every Executive officer, from the President down; and not the least passed at any time in the Cabinet but what they either had been advised with and consulted on. All, too, professed to be perfect masters of belles-lettres and rhetoric; and no orator spoke with approbation who had not previously consulted them as to mode, enunciation, emphasis, gesticulation, etc. Such, sir, is the character that these refined gentlemen assume for themselves, and upon the consideration of whose charges and evidence this House is to be involved for days, and perhaps weeks. Sir, the very places of their resort are enough to brand their charges with ridiculous futility and falsehood. They are never to be found except in the bar-rooms and tippling-shops of your city; there belching forth and disgorging, and receiving again, the many idle, unfounded reports and rumors that they have collected in their daily vocations.

Nothing could have astonished me more than to hear an honorable gentleman, a few days since, from Massachusetts, [Mr. CUSHING,] say that a statement had gone forth from this city on the authority of one who calls himself a "Spy," and that he could not resist making the inquiry on such authority! Is it possible that that honorable gentleman could have been in earnest? Can he seriously think that this House should consume its important time by instituting an examination upon the vague and indefinite charges of an irresponsible letter-writer, who has taken upon himself the self-styled denomination of "The Spy in Washington?" Surely he must appreciate the despatch of public business as of little value, to entertain, for a moment, an idea so extraordinary. Is it possible that that honorable gentleman can be blind to the humiliating condition to which such a course would reduce this body, and the embarrassment of its necessary business? Sir, this new attempt to bring into this hall a new set of political gladiators, astounds me, and will astound every thinking man in the nation. Whom do your "Spies" represent here? From what district have they come? By what interests are they sent, that they should, more than others, undertake the special care of the public good; and, at their suggestions, inquiries should be made, investigations instituted, and committees raised? Sir, I pronounce it an insult to the American people, who know not your "Spies," nor have had any thing to do with sending them here. I protest against the attempt to exercise any such influence in this House? Sir, it is a new mode of electioneering, just hatched, to keep up a perpetual excitement—to involve Congress and the whole nation in one continual brawl.

If we are to have another kind of representation in this House, and the present are thought incompetent to the task assigned them, we should consult the people first, and they should know that an attempt is about being made to introduce another representative branch in the legislative councils of the Government, heretofore altogether unknown to them.

The idea of bring to the aid of any party such gladiatorial influence in this House, is not less new than it is monstrous to me. Sir, it is revolutionary, and if carried out, must sap the whole foundation of our free Democratic Government. Having spoken of the character of such authority collectively, I will now notice some of them, with a a little more particularity; and, first, as he seems to have been held in such high estimation by the honorable gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. CUSHING,] and some others, who have referred to him, and in substance vouched for his character and purity, I would ask, who is this "Spy in Washington?" What embassy is he on, and from whose court does he come, on whose suggestion, or charges, members sent here by the voice of a free people, are to be arraigned and tried?

Is he, I ask, the eulogist and biographer of Aaron Burr; a man notoriously convicted of high treason against his own country? Is it he, that is the panegerist of that libertine that entered the abodes of the innocent, but to infuse poison into every cup of their domestic circles? Is it he, whose daily practice is to slip from pillar to post, corner to recess, to fill every nook and by-place in your Capitol, for the purpose of eaves-dropping both male and female, and catching up and retailing scraps of rumors and reports, that he may overhear? Sir, is it upon the charge of such an one, that honorable members would have any honorable man arraigned, and tried, and convicted, here? Is it upon the suggestions of such a one, that you should raise committees, and institute investigations, to embroil this House, and consume its time, to the exclusion of every other important business? Is this the man who, in a recent publication, impeached the purity of mothers and matrons of the city of New York, and who is there execrated and detested as the vilest calumniator of female innocence? Sir, can it be possible that such is the character of him who is now pronounced here, by honorable gentlemen, as respectable, and whose authority would justify the instituting of an investigating committee? Can this House be so far forgetful of what is due to its own order and dignity, as to go into a serious investigation upon charges emanating from such a source?

I have been not less surprised than mortified to hear my honorable friend from Georgia [General GLASSCOCK] declare, "it was notoriously known that it was the old gentleman in specs, who sat there in the lobby of the gallery, who was the Spy in Washington," and that he should be requested to come down, and placed at the bar of the House, and tell us what he knew of these charges, and designate the guilty member. I was truly sorry to hear such a declaration, coming from the high source that it did. Surely my esteemed friend from Georgia cannot wish to establish a precedent, by which every vagabond that haunts your streets or Capitol can render himself conspicuous, by making the most ridiculous and futile charges against members of this House. Sir, nothing could be deemed a greater honor, by men of that caste, than to be brought into this House and examined, in relation to the characters of its members; to acquire which, if the practice be once established, you may expect, at every succeeding session, a repetition and a multiplication of charges, as ridiculous as innumerable. And why, let me ask, should we introduce a witness there, who would not be believed on oath? I have already heard a number of the most respectable members declare, that they would not believe such characters were they put upon their oaths. Then why again, I would ask, introduce such here? Such evidence should certainly not have the least weight in influencing my conduct towards any honorable member of this House, nor do I believe it would (judging from what I hear) with a large majority of this body. Hence, sir, if it is done, I must protest against its being used as a precedent, believing, as I do, that the most painful consequences will finally result from such a course.

But, Mr. Speaker, there is another set of individuals about whom I propose to say something more specifically, and in addition to what I have already said.

There is a set of individuals who have been introduced into this House, and occupy the seats of the reporters, who call themselves employed letter-writers, whose daily avocation here is to eaves-drop the members of the House, and are sometimes seen slipping into their seats. It is hardly necessary to remark on the character of those creatures: their very vocations bespeak most emphatically their true character. They would have the country to believe they were particularly intimate, too, with every member's private, as well as political, transactions here. I am yet to learn of any member being an intimate associate of theirs. I have seldom seen them even spoken to by members of either House, though there might be some that might court them privately to get themselves puffed, which, I presume, none would be found so hardy as to own. They, too, had been in the habit of acting the part of, more particularly, mischief makers, setting one member against another, and had sometimes so far presumed as to undertake to pit them at each other, and to match them out. Sir, I have been astonished and mortified, deeply mortified, to witness this unrebuked audacity so long. Both Houses, as well as the country, had been greatly to blame by their silent acquiescence in the conduct of this banditti of scandal-bearers and rumor-mongers. With them, for the last six years, every bank orator has been made a paragon of eloquence, and was always sublime, whenever he touched on the beauties of a United States Bank, while, on the contrary, any who dared to speak here in favor of the laborer, the farmer, or planter, or honest mechanic, was immediately represented as a mere country boor—a rough, coarse, uncultivated clown—without sense, without learning, and above all, most without decency—(they and their friends having all that.) Yes, sir, thus their employment has been (and the honest people who toil should know it,) to hunt and run down any and every member here who has had the courage to stand up and speak in favor of the rights of the people, and in defence of their interests. The whole tendency of this infamous system of espionage and calumny has been carried on for the benefit of the idling classes, mostly to enable them to live on the industry of others. It is the idlers and lazy dissolutes that feed upon the calumnies vomited forth here by these miserable scribblers.

To show how perfectly reckless these hired writers are, and destitute of both respect and truth, a statement was made but a few weeks since, contained in the "Boston Atlas," a paper, by-the-by, somewhat distinguished for retailing such stuff, that the members of this House had absolutely committed a robbery upon your Sergeat-at-arms. Yes, sir, that your members of Congress had purloined from the office of the Sergeant-at-arms between $2,000 and $2,500; the amount of which has since been found to have been retained by the Metropolis Bank, and has been accounted for, about which not one word had yet been said by any single member of this body. No, sir, no proposition for committees; no investigation proposed to purge the House of this foul deed, and its perpetrators. After all this, an attempt now to get up one upon such vague and indefinite charges, and upon such flimsy and wretched authority, I confess, sir, to my mind, carries with it something more than meets the eye, and can but acknowledge my being totally at a loss to account for the zeal that has characterized gentlemen in the institution of this particular investigation. I again repeat it, according to my humble estimation, such investigations can result in nothing less than disaster, humiliation, degradation and disgrace. I am opposed to all and every investigation about moral character, believing that that alone belongs to those constituents who send us here, before whom we all have to stand our trials before coming into this body. I have myself often been met by charges emanating from these political scavengers, whose only vocation is to collect the foul and loathsome scandal and falsehoods upon which they feed and delight in, as being most congenial with their infamous and most disgraceful appetites. But, sir, though they may have sometimes succeeded in imposing upon a few weak and credulous people, I have never known that public opinion did otherwise than sooner or later to overtake them.

The influence, if any they have, can only be in proportion to the intelligence or want of it of the people upon whom they attempt to practice their impostures. Such influence is ever withered and blighted by the intelligence of a free people. But a few months since, a similar charge of corruption was made by the same source against a distinguished Democratic member of this House. I allude to the honorable member from Maryland [Mr. MEKIM of Baltimore,] than whom a more correct, high minded man, does not live, without the least shadow of truth, and which was acknowledged, as soon as exposed by that honorable member. Yet, sir, no proposition was made to investigate that foul and infamous slander, made by one of these same letter writers from Washington. No, sir, not one word was said about this base and extraordinary accusation against one of your most respectable members of this House. Then, sir, why, why was there so much sensitiveness displayed on the present occasion. To me, the whole proceeding is most unaccountable and extraordinary; I do not believe that the House can be justified in consuming its time in the discussion and prosecutions of such investigations. It is only giving to the scandal of these hireling wretches, an importance to which they would never otherwise attain.

The charges and abuse of such, I have ever treated with that silence and contempt with which I would the abuse of a drunken, vulgar blackguard, were I to meet one in the streets, going from the Capitol to my lodgings; nor sir, do I deem the editors of those kennel presses, through whose means such scandal and calumny are propagated, and who co-operate and act in concert with them, a whit better than the agents they employ to effect this vile and infamous purposes of blackening the character of every one who has too much independence, self-respect, and pure love of country, to kneel with them at the same altar, in worship of the foul author of their filthy idolatry.

But, sir, honorable gentlemen have asked will you not investigate charges that are made against members of this House? Certainly, whenever those charges are properly made, and in a definite and tangible form, and founded upon a proper and responsible source; but then, in my judgment, they should be entertained only on the most serious and weighty charges, such as would justify the expulsion of a member from this House; and, let me say, it will, at all times, be a most dangerous precedent to set here to institute inquiries into moral character. There is too great a diversity of opinion as to the proper standard of morality in this large and extensive country of ours, embracing, as it does, communities of almost every latitude and longitude, from almost every section of the inhabitable globe; speaking different languages, with different religion, and, of course, of different morals and manners; every attempt of the kind would necessarily meet with the greatest embarrassments.

Let the precedent once be sanctioned by this House, and how long would it be before you would have innumerable petitions sent here, from the abolitionists, perhaps, to exclude from a seat in this Hall every member who was an owner of a slave, and who did not consider it a moral sin? Had they not already denounced slavery as being the blackest and most damning sin, and the owners of slaves the vilest and most inhuman of all sinners?

Sir, we should be exceedingly cautious how we touch this subject of morals; such investigations must, at all times, be attended with the most embarrassing circumstances, and could be justified only upon extraordinary occasions. Were we to attempt to investigate a hundredth part of the charges made by the kennel and licentious presses of the country, against the members of either branch of Congress, and those in the high offices of the Government, we should have but little time left indeed to attend to public business here.

Sir, this House is not, nor should it be, the ordeal by which our morals are to be tested. It is the duty of our constituents, who send us here, to look to this subject. There are few that ever reach this place, who have not had their private and public characters well sifted in their respective canvasses; and to the people alone should these things be left.

In concluding my remarks, I am aware, Mr. Speaker, that I owe an apology to the House for the strong language I have felt it my duty to use towards a certain set of individuals; but it is extremely difficult to use language truly descriptive of such characters, without applying the coarsest and harshest epithets. It is necessary to present their odious practices in their appropriate colors, to the gaze of an insulted and indignant people, upon whom they have so long practised their foul and infamous impostures. Sir, I have already dwelt too long upon this subject. I beg pardon of the House for the time I have consumed on the occasion, and will trespass no longer upon their patience.

NOTE.—The above remarks of Mr. BYNUM would not have been now republished as corrected, but for the extraordinary conduct of the reporters for the National Intelligencer, who, after the garbled statement which they gave of them in their most unfair reports of that debate, undertook to criticise them in the most ironical manner, thus uniting the character of critics with that of reporters.

SUPPRESSION OF DUELLING.

REMARKS OF MR. NILES, OF CONNECTICUT.

In Senate, Thursday, March 29, 1838—On the bill for the prevention and punishment of duelling in the District of Columbia.

Mr. NILES said he had not intended to say any thing on this subject, had it not been for the extraordinary remarks of the honorable Senator from Delaware, [Mr. CLAYTON,] which he had heard with surprise, with pain, and the deepest regret. Such remarks from any member of this body he could not have listened to without the most painful emotions; but coming from the quarter they did—from a respectable member of the Judiciary Committee, distinguished as a jurist and for his knowledge of and respect for the common law—such remarks from such a source, from a member of the committee which is justly regarded as the guardian of the laws, and which has reported this bill, he had heard with the most profound regret.

We are told that it is in vain to pass this bill; that it will be useless, and worse than useless; that it will not restrain the barbarous practice which it is intended to suppress, whilst it may encourage assassinations and other acts of violence. This law, if passed, it is said, cannot be enforced; and why not, sir? The reason assigned was one he was sorry to hear, and which he did not believe to be well founded. We are told that it will not be sustained by public sentiment; that no jury can be found which would convict any person under it; that gentlemen will settle their difficulties in their own way, and according to their own notions of honor. Sir, said Mr. N. I am not prepared to believe this. I cannot entertain so low an estimate of the standard of moral feeling and principle of the people of the District. He had but little acquaintance with the inhabitants of the District; but, so far as his knowledge extended, he had seen nothing to justify such an opinion. Are we to look for the evidence of it in the wounded sensibilities and the high tone of moral feeling manifested on a recent melancholy occurrence? So far as he could judge, that painful event had produced as severe a shock to the moral sense of the people here as it had throughout the whole country. Whilst he concurred with the Senator from Delaware, that the severity of the punishment might increase the difficulty of enforcing the law, still he could not believe that this law, should it be passed, could not be executed. But had he any such apprehensions, it could make no difference with him. He was not legislating for the District, but for the country. He had a higher object in view than the protection of the inhabitants of the District. We do little for them in the way of legislation in any respect: it might almost be said that they were a community without laws. The light in which he viewed this subject gave to it infinitely more importance than could belong to it from any considerations of security to the people of the District.

The great object, and one which he regarded as of vital importance, perhaps, to the very existence of the Government, was to secure the independence of Congress, without which it could not long preserve the confidence of the nation. This confidence had already received a severe shock; and if such outrages were suffered to be repeated, it was impossible to say what might be the consequences. Sir, is it supposed that the people from those portions of the Union, where duelling is regarded as a crime, and as a crime only—where it is abhorrent to every moral and social feeling—will send Representatives here, to be shot down for words spoken in debate?

[Here Mr. GRUNDY remarked that he hoped the debate would be confined strictly to the bill, and that the melancholy event which had occurred would not be drawn into the discussion.]

Mr. NILES said he had no intention of alluding to that bloody tragedy; our feelings have been sufficiently shocked, and he had no wish to connect it with the present discussion, although we all know it gave rise to the bill before us; his only object was to present and illustrate that view of the subject, which he deemed most important, and that was the effect of this barbarous practice upon the freedom and independence of this body. Sir, whatever sentiments may prevail elsewhere, the peaceful portion of the country whence he came, would not justify their Representatives in acts of violence and blood; and if Congress is to be dishonored by scenes of violence and outrage; if members, in the discharge of their duty, for words spoken in debate, and within its ordinary latitude, which may give offence to some worthless bully, are to be beset and pursued by ruffians, or exposed to be forced into single combat, if not with the person claiming to be injured, with some member of the body who may step in and take up his quarrel, in violation of their own sense of right and duty, and against the known moral and religious principles and feelings of their constituents, the independence of Congress will be gone, and its usefulness at an end. Sir, is it supposed that the people can have confidence in Congress, when even a suspicion becomes fixed in the public mind, that menaces and exposure to violence may destroy the entire freedom of our action, or of a single member? If members are exposed to personal violence in any form for words spoken in debate, where is the value of that great principle in your Constitution, which was intended to secure the entire and absolute freedom of discussion, by throwing around Congress the most perfect inviolability? So vitally important was this principle deemed, that it was not subjected to any limitation or restriction whatever, except the sense of propriety and decorum which, it was supposed, would belong to every one worthy of a seat in this body. Are members to be protected from suits for words spoken in debate, and yet exposed to personal violence, or to be forced into personal combats, in violation of their sense of right and the moral feelings of their constituents? What sort of freedom of debate is this? It is a mere mockery. If this barbarous practice prevails, and these outrages are not suppressed, all confidence in the independence of Congress is gone.

Mr. N. said he seldom indulged himself in speaking of dangers to the Union, or in predictions of its disruption. But he could not forbear to say, that whatever other elements may exist hostile to the Union—Abolitionism, high tariffs, or any other disturbing cause—he believed there could be none more dangerous than the sanction or acquiescence, on the part of Congress, in acts of violence and outrage growing out of its proceedings, which inflict a fatal blow at its independence and inviolability of character, and which necessarily tend to impair the confidence of the people in our entire freedom of action. When such an opinion becomes generally established, the very existence of Congress would be in danger, as the people from the section of the country whence he came, who cannot countenance such practices, would cease to send representatives here. This body is the keystone of the arch, the knot which unites and binds together as one the different cords of which the Republic is composed; and if it is cut asunder, or loosened, so as to destroy its efficacy, the fabric must fall into its original elements.

Mr N. said he would not go into the general question of duelling, nor examine its influence on society, as he desired to confine his remarks to what he regarded as the object of the bill. It had been said that this practice had contributed to civilization and refinement, and to prevent assassinations and violence. He regarded such claims as not only extravagant, but as preposterous. They were in character with the claims set up in relation to another subject, although he feared that, by the comparison, he should depart from the solemnity which belongs to the subject now under debate. He alluded to the extravagant pretensions which assign to credit the agency and merit of all the great results of industry. Our canals, railroads, cities, have all sprung from the potent agency of credit! He regarded both pretensions as equally incorrect and absurd. These results have been accomplished by industry, in spite of an abuse of credit, and civilization has advanced, and is going on advancing, notwithstanding the existence of a practice which has lagged behind as the relic of an earlier and more barbarous age.

We have been referred to other countries, and are told that this practice prevails in England, and that there the energy of the law has been found insufficient to suppress it. Mr. N. believed that it had greatly declined in that country, and that duels now seldom occurred; but whether so or not, the example proved nothing, for among the same class (those in high life) with whom this practice prevails there, other fashionable vices exist—of which we have little knowledge here, with our plain republican manners—such as elopements, adulteries, and other scandalous conduct, which belong to a depraved state of manners.

But, said Mr. N. I will not go into the question of the effect of this practice on society. I believe it to be criminal, and its influence pernicious. Other gentlemen may think differently. They may discover, or think they discover, some good mixed with the evil. They may believe that in this case, as in many others, both sweet and bitter waters flow from the same fountain. But this is not the question now to be decided. He looked to the special object of this bill, which was, as he regarded it, to suppress and put an end to this practice in Congress. Whatever may be thought of it in the abstract, or of its influence on society in general, all, he thought, would agree that it cannot prevail here, without the most alarming consequences. This, sir, is an evil of great magnitude; and a recent melancholy occurrence has roused the attention of the whole country to it; the moral sense of the people has been shocked, and their sensibilities wounded, and they can no longer be silent. They have spoken through the press, and public meetings, and will continue to speak, until Congress listen to their complaints, and fearlessly and honestly endeavor to put down this evil. This subject has been brought before us by the people, who have petitioned, and will continue to petition, until something is done.

There is a solemn duty resting upon Congress—a duty imposed by no ordinary considerations of interest or temporary excitement of feeling, but arising from a deep and solemn conviction that something is wrong here—that a practice prevails which is destructive to the freedom of debate, the independence of Congress, and which is in conflict with the moral feelings of the whole community. If this practice must prevail elsewhere, let us all unite and put an end to it within these walls, and within this District. Let this be a hallowed spot, sacred to liberty and peace, where violence cannot intrude; where the friends of the Union, and the organs of its powers, can meet on common and equal ground, and act in that spirit which belongs to our institutions, pre-eminently pacific, and which is in harmony with the moral and religious sentiments of our people. He hoped that we should not only pass this bill, but that we should do it by a unanimous vote in both Houses of Congress. This would be doing much more than the enactment of a law; it would be adding the moral weight and influence of the members of the National Legislature; it would be pledging themselves to the country, and to the world, that they will refrain from violence and bloodshed in any form, and use all their influence to discountenance such practices here.

Mr. N. said he regretted that some gentlemen had constitutional doubts and difficulties in regard to the third section of the bill. He had himself at first entertained some doubts; but the full and lucid explanation and illustration by the chairman of the committee, [Mr. GRUNDY,] and the Senator from Delaware, [Mr. CLAYTON,] had entirely removed them; and he did not now perceive the least difficulty in regard to that section. It does not, as seems to be supposed, punish in the District a crime committed out of the District; it only creates a crime here, and punishes it here. But the crime created, and which is to be punished, is not the fighting of a duel, or the sending a challenge, but it is a preliminary act leading to such crime; this act is, departing from the District with the intention to send or accept a challenge. Is it not within the competency of Congress to prohibit any preliminary act which may lead to a crime, and done with the intention to commit such crime? All persons within the District, not only residents, but such as are temporarily here, are subject to our jurisdiction, and we can make them amenable to our laws for any act done in the District, and can make any act criminal by merely prohibiting it. It is a well known distinction, that crimes are of two classes—those which are morally wrong, and those which are wrong only because they are prohibited. To fight a duel is morally wrong; to leave the District with the intention to fight a duel, if not morally wrong, may be made a crime by statute, by prohibiting the act. And where is the objection to doing it? Our object is to prevent the crime of fighting in single combat, and in order to do that, we make criminal a preliminary act, which will lead to such crime. Nor is there any conflict of jurisdiction; the fighting a duel, in that State, is a violation of the laws of Maryland, and punishable there; and if the parties go from this District for the purpose, the act of leaving the District with such intent, would be a crime here, and punishable in the District.

The objection to the third section is equally applicable to the first and second; if we cannot punish the act of leaving the District with the intent to commit a crime without the District, how can we punish the giving or accepting a challenge within the District, to fight a duel without the District? In principle the cases are the same, and he did not think there was any objection to either. He beseeched gentlemen, therefore, who had expressed doubts on this point, to review the question; he could not but hope that on a candid examination of the subject they will be satisfied that the objection has no solid foundation; he was the more anxious for this as he was in hopes that we might pass this bill by a unanimous vote of the Senate, which would impart to it something more than the authority of an ordinary law; which would give it the moral weight and influence belonging to the deliberate and unanimous act of this body, which ought to be respected, and he was sure would be respected, by a reflecting and moral people.

As to the suggestion of the Senator from Delaware, that the severity of the punishment would increase the difficulties of enforcing the law, he did not dissent from the principle, and was by no means sure but it might be well to consider whether, in this view of this matter, the punishment provided is not too severe. But he did object to the argument of the Senator, in support of his proposition, as that went not so much to show that the punishment was inexpedient, as that it was unjust. His remarks tended to mitigate and diminish the enormity of the crime, to palliate it, to gloss it over, and to take from it all its guilt and moral turpitude. It was these remarks, and not the proposition to reduce the punishment, which had occasioned surprise, excited some emotion, and led him to express himself with a degree of warmth which otherwise might have been deemed uncalled for, or unsuited to so solemn a subject. It was a subject, however, upon which he felt deeply, intensely; and, whilst he would endeavor not to be carried away by his feelings so as to sanction any unwise or impracticable legislation, which might defeat the object in view, still he did not desire to repress his feelings upon this subject.

INDEPENDENT TREASURY BILL.

SPEECH OF MR. WALL, OF NEW JERSEY,

In Senate, March 23, 1838—Upon the bill "to impose additional duties, as depositaries, upon certain public officers, to appoint Receivers General of public money, and to regulate the safe-keeping, transfer, and disbursement of the public moneys of the United States."

Mr. WALL rose and addressed the Senate as follows:

The bill which now demands our action, Mr. President, proposes to provide by law for the safe-keeping, transfer, and disbursement of the revenues and public moneys of the United States. This is a duty imposed upon us by the Constitution, and we cannot discharge ourselves from its performance, without being guilty of a neglect eminently censurable, if not criminal. It is a duty that all admit rests upon us; and the Legislature of New Jersey, in the resolutions which my honorable colleague has read to the Senate, and made part of his speech, and to which he professes fidelity, declare, "that it is the constitutional right and duty of Congress to provide for the safe-keeping and disposition of the public treasure." My colleague has satisfied himself, by what process of reasoning it is not my purpose to inquire, that that treasure is now in the hands of the Executive. If so, sir, it makes that duty more imperative, and ought to stimulate and accelerate our action. I think my colleague wrong in his view, on this subject. Still, however, I concur with him and the resolutions of the New Jersey Legislature, both as to the right and duty of Congress; and mean to perform that constitutional duty faithfully, to the best of my abilities and understanding.

How, then, shall we perform that duty under the Constitution, in the best manner for the country? In other words, how shall we best provide for the safe-keeping of the public treasure? There are but two modes proposed, or which can be proposed; one is, to commit the custody of the public treasure to the constitutional officers of the people, designated, regulated, controlled, and punishable by law of Congress, and bound by all the solemnities and obligations, and restrained by all the punishments which the laws and the Constitution can impose to keep it solely for the public use.

The other is to withdraw it wholly from the custody of the constitutional organs and agents of the people, and to commit it to a bank, created by Congress, or to a league or oligarchy of banks, created by State sovereignties, quo ad hoc, foreign to the United States, and beyond their control, to be used, until wanted for the public use, for the benefit, profit, and advantage of the privileged corporations selected.

You will perceive, sir, that I have classed the distinct propositions which respect the committing the public treasure to a Bank of the United States, and the State banks as one and identical. It is so in principle. Both reject the officers chosen by the people, under the Constitution, as not trustworthy and safe depositees; both require the repudiation of the principle of keeping the public money solely for the public use. Both assume that corporations are better qualified to choose the officers to keep the public money than the people; and that the corporations, for thus performing a duty, with which the people are not fit to be trusted, should be rewarded by a privileges denied to all other persons, bodies, corporate or politic, of using the public treasure for their own profit.

Shall we, then, commit the public revenues, which have been called the life-blood of the people; shall we commit the public treasure, which Mr. Madison, on one occasion, denominated "the soul and body of the body politic," to the officers of the people, their constitutional agents and organs? or shall we give the soul and body, and the life-blood of the people, to corporations without soul or body, and the generous impulses which spring from the current of the life-blood?

Mr. President, in my judgment, this is reviving, in another form, the long agitated question whether the people are capable of self-government. Those who contend for the agency of banks instead of the people in choosing the guardians of the public treasure, in effect deny that the greatest experiment, in the pursuit of human happiness, ever made by nations—the experiment (I beg pardon of the gentlemen upon whose ears this word grates so unpleasantly, for repeating it) of the capacity of the people for self-government—has succeeded; nay, it is proclaiming that it has failed. It carries us back to the position of our ancestors, at the time of the glorious Declaration of American Independence. What was that position? Our ancestors had brought with them, from their mother country, that part of the common law called the Folk Law, but none of the essential portion of political power, or the prerogatives of sovereignty. All that portion which related to the independent right of self-government, the right to the purse and the sword, was left, or claimed to be left, beyond the Atlantic, in the keeping of the King and the Lords and Commons of England. The Revolution sprung from the claim of Parliament to the purse of the American people. Our ancestors periled life, liberty, and honor in resistance to a twopenny duty upon stamps, and a threpenny tax upon tea. Who does not recollect the argument of the Tories of that day, to prov that the people were not capable of self-government, and that it was the best policy, and greatly for their true interests, to leave their purse in the keeping of the English Parliament, and their sword in the custody of the King? Our ancestors triumphed. All political power became their own. They took it in their own hands, and by a written Constitution prescribed the orbits, and defined the limits, of that power, and regulated its future distribution, exercise, and action.

Let us not confound names, or confuse ideas. Our ancestors understood by the word sword, that part of the prerogative of sovereignty which relates to the declaration of war, and issuing letters of marque and reprisal—the power over the peace of the nation. By the British Constitution, that prerogative was assigned to the King. But the people, by their representatives in Parliament, retained the purse in their own hands; that is, the right to appropriate revenues, the right of taxation, and the right to raise and provide for armies, to control the Executive authority of the sword. But the right to appoint the officers who were to wield the sword, and to collect and keep the revenues, was an Executive power, and left with the King. The people, when they framed our Constitution, took both the sword and the purse from Executive power, and transferred it to Congress, the legislative power. But the appointment of the officers of the army, and of the revenue, to collect and keep the public treasure, was left still an Executive power, to be exercised by the nomination of the President, and the confirmation of the Senate. When the people, speaking through their legislative power, raise revenues, public treasure, they prescribe the mode of keeping and disbursing it, and then the Constitution steps in, and fixes the agents by whom it is to be done. But how? For private use? No, sir, no; for public use, by officers of the people, and according to the will of the people. Let us hear no more about the President's usurpation, of his grasping both the purse and the sword, because he appoints and removes officers of the army, and of the revenue, and the Treasury. Congress can neither confer nor take away that power; it is given by the Constitution. You can create officers, but you cannot appoint officers, without usurpation. I will not borrow the language of my honorable colleague, and say "that it is gross ignorance or deception" to assert that the President can usurp the purse and the sword by appointing or removing officers to command the armies, or collect and keep the revenues and public treasure; but I will say, that such a pretence has no foundation in the Constitution or the laws of our country, and it can do no harm but to him who has the hardihood to assert it. It is revolutionary and unconstitutional.

Mr. President, our ancestors, by the Revolution, acquired the whole political power, all the prerogatives of sovereignty. We are now asked to surrender to corporations, to banks, a part of that sovereignty, and the most essential part—the very life-blood of sovereignty, the soul and body of the people, the purse and public treasury. I am amazed and astonished at the magnitude of the demand. What, sir, give the custody and use of the soul and body and life blood of the public to corporations, who, in the quaint language of Lord Coke, have "neither souls to be damned, nor necks to be hung;" a defect the more to be lamented, as it protects them from punishment, but does not save them from sin.

But, sir, if you commit the custody of the public money to corporations or banks, how are they to keep it? Why, they must, after all, do it as the people do it, by agents or organs—by officers chosen by themselves—by men. This brings us to the true difference between the policy sustained and carried out by this bill, and the policy of its allied opponents; and it is simply this. We say that the people ought to choose those men; they say no, give the choice to the banks. Why should not the people choose? If they are to be excluded, it must be because the great experiment of self-government in their hands has failed, as relates to the purse; in other words, the people are not fit to govern themselves—to take care of their money. They are their own worst enemies, and that banks are the best conservators of their money. To carry on the great experiment of self-government, the people must dispense with their own agents, and substitute in their place the agents of banks, and give the banks the use and profits of the public treasure. Do the banks choose men who are more honest, faithful, and capable, than the people? Does a bank stamp upon men operate as it does upon paper, and change their qualities, value, worth, and character? Alas, sir, the history of banks and corporations is the blackest page in the history of fraud and violated trust.

Mr. President, I repeat that there are but two sides to this question. There are but two policies thought of. Shall we select the officers of the people, chosen and appointed under the Constitution, and regulated by our laws, to keep the public Treasury, or shall we delegate that selection to corporations or banks?

Now, sir, it may well be doubted whether we have any such constitutional power so to transfer and delegate our own legislative trust. Whether, if we have, we can so far change the Constitution, which gives to the President "the appointment of all officers of the United States established by law," and not otherwise provided for in that instrument. Does not an officer of a bank, selected to keep the public purse, become ipso facto an officer of the United States? The Constitution of the United States intended to create an independent Government—self-acting, self-moving, self-poised, self-sustained—to derive its vital power from the breath of the people of the States composing the Union. Its proportion, its stature, its features, its functions, all, all are delineated by the mighty hand of the people. One of the fundamental principles of that Constitution is, that all the functions of the Government, thus established, shall be performed by men of souls and bodies, nerve and sinew, responsible and amenable to impeachment, to punishment; natural bodies, not artificial bodies—soulless and irresponsible and unpunishable, but all deriving their authority from the people, and responsible to the people. Are corporations so? Who can open their books or doors without their leave, even if stipulated for by law or contract?

Could we delegate the trust of selecting our fiscal agents to the Queen of Great Britain, or to the King of France? Could we give the use of our moneys and the appointment of our fiscal officers to the Bank of England or of France? And if not, why not? These inquiries are full of weighty and important considerations; but I shall not pursue them further at present.

The policy proposed by this bill, and which the gentlemen on the other side call the policy of the Government, is, when analysed, simply to separate the treasures of the people from the funds of the credit system, or banks; to withdraw the public revenues from the use of a privileged class of men, who already have the right to draw treble interest upon their money; to prevent its being banked upon, and mixed up with the fluctuations of trade; to restrain the banks from loaning it for their own use to the people to whom it belongs, and charging them as the banks charge them for their own funds, treble interest; to interdict the banks from making usury of the public treasure, and putting that usury in their own pockets; it is to bring back the Government to its ancient simplicity, to its constitutional action; to return to the principles of the first Treasury law framed by the makers of the Constitution, the law of 1789.

This law collected, kept, and disbursed the public money, by the agency of the officers of the Government of the United States, not of banks, and such was the practice for nearly the first thirty years of the Government. Does this do wrong to any one? Is it not in conformity to the principles of our institutions, of equal rights and equal privileges, and that the blessings of Government be diffused, like the gentle dews of Heaven, upon all?

If we must look for agents chosen by corporations, what right has the corporations of banks over the corporations for railroads, canals, turnpikes, mechanics, manufacturers, farming, or other useful purposes. Nay, what right has the president and directors of a bank, in their corporate character, over the individuals who fill those offices? Who would not as soon trust Nicholas Biddle, Preserved Fish, Isaac Hill, and their respectable directors, and the other respectable presidents and directors of State banks, in their individual character, as in their corporate character? Yet what would be thought of the man who should seriously propose that the public funds should be committed to the charge of such men as they should select, and that they should have the use and interest of it for the trouble of keeping it?

Now, what is the antagonist principle of the allied opponents of this policy? The antagonist policy, disguise it as you will, is, in fact, to separate the money of the people from the people and from their Government; to put it beyond the control of the people and their Government, under the control of banks and bank agents, for bank uses. How, sir, is this attempted to be done?

They attempt to separate the people from the Government, to sow dissensions, create animosities, and to alienate the people from the officers whom they have chosen. Does not he who causelessly attempts to make the people believe that their interest is distinct from their Government, and thus to create two separate powers, aim to overthrow and subvert the Constitution? Sir, the Government under our Constitution is from the people, of the people, and for the people, one and indivisible, forever inseparable. Cut the ligament which binds them together, and the people will not have left even the poor privilege of dividing a part of the prerogatives of sovereignty with bank corporations. They declaim against office-holders, and attempt to render them odious and suspected by the people. Why? Is it that office necessarily corrupts? Oh no. Let the banks confer office, and honor, integrity and talent go with the patent; or let their own party confer office, and the recipient at once becomes superhuman, godlike. Is it not strange that those who are continually denouncing office holders as corrupt and corrupting; who talk of scourging them back to their dens, and caverns, and prisons, will be found like the moth fluttering around the attractive flame, which is sure to consume their virtue, honesty, and patriotism? Nay, they are even willing to owe their greatness to their country's ruin. Their hopes rise as the barometer of their country's prosperity sinks. Their mirth and rejoicings seek the scenes of the greatest distress for their exhibition, and their feasts of triumph are spread upon the tombs of trade, credit, and commerce, and midst the ruins of the prosperity of their country. Like the revels of the guardians of the sick, in the cities doomed to the ravages of plague and pestilence, their orgies become more loud and revolting, as the scenes of human misery deepen in horror and suffering. If we believe that the scenes of distress which they depict, are drawn from nature, what but consolations of the near approach of office would shed joy, and mirth, and glee, upon feasts spread amidst the ruins of their country.

Mr. President, we have the scenes of the panic session acted over again on this occasion. Eternal war is declared against this odious policy of the Government, Executive encroachments, tyrant, General Jackson, the removal of the deposites, the war of the Executive upon commerce and the credit system, are again the fruitful subjects of eloquent declamation. All public misery and distress is again traced up to the war upon the credit system, and the removal of the deposites. Sir, have we lost our memories? Do we not recollect how positive the same gentlemen, who now renew daily their griefs from the same fountain, were, that the only panacea for the restoration of prosperity was the restoration of the deposites? The deposites were not restored, but the recuperative energies of the people restored prosperity. It is hazardous to try the same experiment of delusion twice before an intelligent people. Do the banks contract and expand, and then suspend, and thus fill the land with misery? it is all charged to the removal of the deposites, and the withholding the public money from the private use of the banks. This continual clamor reminds me of the tory who was found in office at the commencement of the Revolution, and his adherence to his principles, lost him both office and property. After the Revolution, having received the remuneration which was so royally bestowed upon the loyalists, he returned to this country, but to the day of his death, when business was dull, trade prostrate, crops short, or any disaster occurred in the political or natural world, he never failed to exclaim "that it was all owing to General Washington and the American Revolution." Prejudice is always the same; short sighted, vindictive, unjust.

The old story, that "he who trades on borrowed capital ought to break," has been taken from the counter, where it had been nailed as the counterfeit presentment of truth by the honorable Senator from Massachusetts, [Mr. WEBSTER] and my colleague, and new stamped, and once more put in circulation as genuine. Sir, I do not believe that even their mint, however excellent it may be, can restore credit to such currency: the metal is too base to receive new value from its impress.

The late and present Administrations have been accused of warring upon trade, upon commerce, upon banks, and upon the credit system. Why, Mr. President, you cannot open a statute book nor a treaty, nor can you walk abroad, in the city or in the country, but you find a refutation of these unfounded charges. Look to the millions restored by treaty to the merchants, the laws for the relief of merchants, of banks, and let them answer. This and the former Administration have been eminently the friends of commerce and the credit system, and have been rewarded, as benefactors are too often rewarded, by persecution and slander.

But, Mr. President, it is amusing, as a novelty, to find that gentlemen in the Opposition are now the advocates of the pet bank system. Have they so soon forgotten the eloquence which they displayed in abusing that odious system, and their prophecies that it would fail? It has failed; and now, when prophecy has become fact, they become its strenous supporters, and ask us to help them in sustaining a measure that has been tried, and failed. Sir, there is no disputing about taste; some prefer tainted viands, and I have heard of a whole nation whose taste requires the action of corruption to make food palatable.

However, in justice to the pet banks, I feel bound to say, that, in my opinion, their ruin was commenced by the recharter of the Bank of the United States by the Legislature of Pennsylvania; hastened by the deposite law, which originated with their present friends; and sealed by the Bank of England—by the one week's panic which caused the prostration of American houses, and the overthrow of American credit, to which my colleague has alluded. Sir, the first throb of the pulse of the great credit system, which ended in the revulsion, first beat in the veins of the Bank of England. There, sir, you must always feel and look for it. But it would not have been fatal here, if the State banks had not been guilty of the amiable error, to which my colleague alludes in such gentle terms, "of trying to make too much money for those who were entitled to it." In other words, they over-banked, and over-traded, and, like their unfortunate debtors, whose errors they begat, when called on, they could not pay. Fortunately for them, they are privileged debtors.

Whatever disputes may exist about the primary cause of distress, every man sees and feels that it is caused immediately by the contractions and expansions of the banks, and the suspension of specie payments by banks. This is palpable. He is no friend of the banks who advises them to become politicians, and to enter the arena of politics. I am no enemy to the banks; but I warn them that if they become politicians, they must share the fate of politicians. To be useful, to be faithful to their trusts, they must confine themselves to their proper sphere, and avoid both politics and usury. I warn them that the law makes a distinction between vested rights and vested wrongs.

Mr. President, it would be well for the State banks to take warning by the fate of the late Bank of the United States. It was assumed by its friends, and it is asserted daily here, that General Jackson made war upon it, and that its virtue and incorruptibility was the only cause of that war. I will not enter into the history of that war, but I will say that it is clear that this charge, which implicates both General Jackson and the then Secretary of the Treasury, Samuel D. Ingham, was never advanced until three years after the attempt was alleged to have been made upon the virtue of that institution; that such a charge is repelled, both by its staleness and the character of the Secretary, to say nothing of the character of Gen. Jackson; and I feel that it is due to the character of Samuel D. Ingham to say, that although I have differed with him on some subjects, yet, that his administration of the Treasury Department, able, upright, faithful, and independent, ought to have protected him from such a charge. Sir, gentlemen are estopped by the records of the people's voice, from renewing that old topic of declamation. The war was made by the bank itself, not of defence, but of offence, upon the pockets of the people, to extort from the sufferings of the people a renewal of chartered privileges. It was carried on by contractions and expansions; it stopped short, however, of the last resort of desperate valor, blowing up the ship; in other words, compelling all the banks to suspend specie payments. The war of that bank was like that of the genie, the son of the daughter of Eblis, and, like that genie, its pretext was that it had been summoned before the American people in breach of contract. It had the same power of metamorphosis. It assumed the shape of a lion, terrific and frightful; and when its lion-head was cut off, it changed into a scorpion, then a cat, next a worm, which pierced a pomegranate, the good old Keystone State. What is to be its future fate, is hid in the mysteries of futurity; but it is easy to see, that if the pomegranate should, after all the extraordinary motions that the worm made it perform, burst, that the worm will be found rolling on the banks of a canal, whose waters it will seek as its last refuge.

I concur, Mr. President, with those who believe that the interest both of the trading community and the banks will be best promoted by acting upon the principle of hands off, let alone. What have the merchants gained by becoming the allies of the Bank of the United States? What has their heroic devotion gained for them? The honor of being crushed under the wheels of the car of the Juggernaut of wealth, or being consumed upon the pyre which their own idolatry has raised.

Mr. President, one of the instincts of wealth is to gain political power. Its spirit is aristocratic, oligarchic, and monarchic, always warring for privileges, and against equal rights. In the days of feudality, wealth consisted in lands, and that gave rank and power. That system was simply a system of concentric circles, rising from the serf to the monarch in its different gradations, each under the influence of the next, and all moving round a common centre—the king, as the paramount lord. But the people or serfs had no rights. That system was gradually worn away by wealth assuming a different form—that of gold and silver; but it was not finally destroyed until gold and silver invoked the aid of the magic credit or paper system. In 1693, the foundation of the much boasted credit system was laid, by the establishment of the Bank of England; and in 1720 it was expanded by the South Sea project and additional capital. History tells us that both were opposed by the patriots of that day. Although the paper system crawled into existence in the humble guise of demanding eight per cent. interest on one million and a half, for half a million of gold and silver actually put in bank, yet all the beauties and benefits of the system were maintained there very much as they have been maintained here. Those who opposed the establishment of the paper system then, contended that it was calculated to enrich the few, and impoverish the many; that it would become a monopoly, and engross the whole money of the kingdom; that it must infallibly ally itself to political power, and be employed to the worst purposes of such power; that instead of assisting, it would weaken, commerce and trade, by tempting people to withdraw their money from trade, and employ it in stock-jobbing; that it would countenance the fraudulent and pernicious practice of stock-jobbing, which diverted the genius of the people from trade and industry; that it would allure people to part with the fruits of their property, by the vast prospects of gain it deceptively held out; that it would enable foreigners, by investing in their stocks, to withdraw from England their gold and silver; that it would produce a swarm of brokers and jobbers, to prey upon their fellow-citizens, encourage fraud and gaming, and further corrupt the morals of the nation; and, finally, that its large capital would endanger the liberties of the nation, for, by their interest, they would be enabled to influence most, if not all, the elections of members, and, consequently, overrule the resolutions of the House of Commons. Those patriots also contended that, in all such public bargains, it ought to be made advantageous to the State, rather than to private persons.

What was then prediction, is now history. The great credit or paper system has changed the form of wealth, and has corrupted it. Wealth, under the feudal system, had its chivalry and its patriotism. It owned the soil which sustained it, and thus it was bound to its country, and its prosperity. The gallant barons, who paraded in armor at Runnymede against their King, were fighting for privilege; but in the conflict they accidentally struck, with their mailed hands, the rock of liberty in the desert of oppression; from which has flowed the purest fountains of the common law, whose waters nourish and sustain the liberties of man throughout the world.

The wealth of the credit or paper system has no chivalry, no patriotism, no country. It is a vagabond. Without any of the redeeming qualities of feudal wealth, it retains its worst instinct. It seeks political power with an appetite that never tires, and knows no bounds. The much boasted credit, or paper, or bank system, (for they are only different names for the same thing,) is only a modification of the feudal system, the system of privileges. The different banks which dot the maps of every State, are a system of concentric circles, each under the next in amount of capital, and moving around the common centre, the paramount lord, the money king, the feudal sovereign of banks. Where is that king to be found? In the Pennsylvania United States Bank in Chestnut street. Where must you seek its paramount lord? It is the Bank of England.

Mr. President, the fact cannot be disguised. Recent events have revealed it, and it has been acknowledged on this floor. The trade, the business, the prosperity of the United States, are no longer under the control of the constitutional agents of the people—the National Government. This credit system, as it now exists, has thrown us back to a more abject state of colonial vassalage than our ancestors endured sixty years ago. But they had a king, in all the pomp and circumstance of royalty, in name the Father of his People. I fear, sir, that we are to seek our king in the dark meanderings of Threadneedle street, in London; and there we shall find him enthroned on a three legged stool, with a pen behind his ear, graciously pondering on the mysteries of usury and stockjobbing; absorbed in the heartless selfishness of avarice, and intent upon the best mode of skinning his loving subjects.

What is the doctrine that we now hear? We are transported back to the days of feudality; take care of the lords and privileged classes, and they will take care of the people. But those privileged classes claimed to be the people, and the people were serfs. Now, sir, we hear the same cry: take care of the banks and the privileged classes, and they will take care of the people. The banks are the people, and the people are serfs; without rights, but derivative.

The same war-cry of aristocracy, too, is raised; Agrarian, Jack Cade, Fanny-Wrightism, Loco-Focoism, Revolutionists. It is the banner of aristocracy which bears these names, to alarm the timid, and summon its allies to the conflict.

Mr. President, the connection between the Government and the banks has been dissolved by the banks themselves. It is true, they have our treasure, our gold and silver. Shall we resume our connection? Shall we, in consideration of the faithful manner in which they have discharged their trust of keeping our treasure, so that we could not have it when we wanted it, give them all the moneys we shall hereafter collect? They are graciously pleased to trust us to collect the money: all they ask is to keep it after it is collected. I thank them for their modesty and forbearance.

I repeat the question, shall we choose agents to keep our money, or shall we delegate the choice to banks?

Our Government has now been fifty years in operation: so far, it has worked well. Our agents, chosen by the people, have been more faithful than the agents chosen by banks. We have lost no money by treasurers. Some of our collecting agents have been unfaithful; but they have been watched faithfully by the President and the sentinels appointed by the Constitution. We have had no President who was unfaithful, none impeached. I ask pardon, one has been impeached; however, not according to the forms of the Constitution, but by the Senate; accused by the Senate, tried by the Senate, condemned by the Senate. The impeachment has been reversed by the people, and the entry of the conviction expunged by the mighty hand of the people from the records of the nation. That President, together with his successor, have, against all the laws relative to conspiracy, been presented before the Senate on this occasion as conspirators. But where is the proof, sir? It is, like the virtues of a quack medicine, to be found in the label of a speech, entitled the "speech of the honorable Henry Clay of Kentucky, establishing a deliberate design on the part of the late and present Executive of the United States, to break down the whole banking system of the United States, commencing with the Bank of the United States, and terminating with the State banks, and to create on their ruins a Government Treasury bank, under the exclusive control of the Executive." I advise the man, however, who seeks for the proof of this conspiracy, to imitate the wisdom of the litigant, who commenced a suit for slander; and after the declaration was read to him, setting forth that he had been from his nativity, a good, true, and faithful citizen, of pure and unsuspected character, and never guilty or suspected to have been guilty of the crime with which he was charged, or any such hurtful crime, by which he had deservedly acquired and enjoyed the good opinion of all worthy citizens—and being informed that that allegation was to become a record, professed himself entirely satisfied, paid his fees, and declared that he did not wish to proceed any farther. He was satisfied with the establishment of his character, by the averments in the declaration. He who seeks beyond the label of this speech, for the establishment of the conspiracy charged, will have good reason to admire the wisdom of the litigant, and the prudence of him who is content to admit the virtues of a quack medicine from the label, without further trial.

The policy of this bill, Mr. President, I believe is the best measure for the people. I should prefer confining this bill, simply, to the keeping, disbursing, and transferring the public money; and separating it from the currency part, because I think that they ought not to be blended; and I am opposed to that legislation which unites distinct subjects. But I shall vote for it with or without that separation. I will not trespass upon the patience of the Senate, by entering at large upon the reasons for that vote. Permit me to allude to a few. I believe that this policy is the best and constitutional mode of performing the duty imposed upon us, of keeping the purse of the people by our own agents, the agents of the people, not the agents of the banks. That it will relieve the Government, "so far as their act can, from the action of any foreign power over the credit or banking system of this country, and the treasures of the people from the use and control of banks; and make the Government, as the Constitution intended to make it, efficient, self-acting, and independent, and capable of fulfilling its benign objects, and high purposes," to form a more perfect union, establish justice, ensure domestic tranquility, provide for the common defence, promote the general welfare, and secure the blessings of liberty to ourselves and our posterity." It will place the Treasury more immediately under the action and control of Congress, inasmuch as they must create the functionaries, prescribe their duties, examine into and control their conduct. It will operate favorably upon banks themselves; first, by breaking down favoritism, in selecting one or more, and excluding others from the benefits of the public moneys; and by counteracting the evil tendency of the banking system to centralization, or monarchy; or placing all power in the hands of the strongest, and of giving the places where such centralization is established, superior advantage over all other places. It separates the business of trade and banks—in their very nature, subject to fluctuations—from the fluctuations incident to the collecting, transfer, and disbursement of the public moneys, which cannot be counteracted by the wisest legislation. It will equalize the benefits of the Constitution, by providing that the money of the Constitution, its only standard of value, shall be the universal standard; the dollar of each State, from Maine to Georgia, shall have the same value.

If the Government receives paper money and shinplasters, they must pay them to their creditors. Ought the Government to be made to receive them from their debtors, unless they could compel their creditors to receive them? These, sir, are a few of the reasons which will constrain me to vote for this bill. A few words as to the objections which have been urged against the policy of this bill, and in favor of the antagonist policy.

It is said to be making war upon the credit system; and how? By taking from the corporation of banks the use of the public money. They must first establish that banks have a right to it. It is also said that it is creating one currency for the people, and another currency for the Government. How are these two currencies alleged to be created? Simply by declaring that the Government will receive from their debtors, and pay to their creditors, the money of the Constitution. That is acknowledged on all hands to be gold and silver—to be coin. How such an act can be said to create two currencies, is beyond my comprehension. The Government established by the Constitution was a hard money Government. The word currency is not found in it: it was carefully rejected; and why? Not because it was unknown, but because it was known, and condemned. Currency then meant, as it does now, paper money, made current, and deriving its sole value, not from its intrinsic qualities, but from authority. The framers of the Constitution had the ghosts of colony, proclamation, State, and continental money before them. They were currencies, as were also the deer skins, mink skins, and coon skins, of the State of Franklin. If these are two currencies, who created them? Not Congress. Every one knows what legal currency of the United States means. The other currency is created by the banks. They have, by their own act, dishonored their currency, reduced it below coin, which it pretends to represent; and having got the coin of the Government and the people, they want to force their paper and shinplasters upon the Government and the people, as of the same value as gold and silver, which they have locked up in their vaults. The banks, by violating their faith to the people, have debased their notes below the standard of value fixed by the Constitution, and forced it upon the people; and then most impudently it is asserted, that the debased currency is the currency of the people. Sir, one would think that impudence could go no farther. It has gone farther, and taunted the Government with bankruptcy, created by the very act of the banks, and branded the paper of the Government, which such conduct made it necessary to issue, as shinplasters, or no better than shinplasters. The currency of the people is the money of their Constitution—gold and silver—metallic money. The currency of the banks is paper money of their own manufacture, or their shinplaster allies, and this they call the money of the people. They force the people to pay for their own offspring, and now insist upon their adopting it, and giving it their own name. Sir, we have heard much of that stringent, strict, and literal adherence to the Constitution, which seeks refuge from obeying the command of the people, in construing the injunction of the Consttitution to keep a journal into a mandate to preserve it intact—not to make a journal, thus putting the cart before the horse. Where can those literal gentlemen find warrant in the Constitution to receive two kinds of money, one of coin, and the other of paper.

It is also objected that this bill increases Executive power. The reverse is the fact. Every one knows that if a President wished to increase his patronage, he would recommend the antagonist policy. Who can read the evidence of the servility and debasement of the banks in their applications for the public deposites, without being reminded of the subserviency of the Dutch to obtain the spice trade. They renounced their religion, and trampled upon its holy symbol. The safes, chests, locks, vaults, and other modes of safely keeping the public treasure, prescribed by this bill, have been the fruitful subjects of declamation and objection. Is not that the mode resorted to by banks, merchants, and others who have money to keep? Can any better mode be devised? If so, let it be proposed; but until it is, shall the representatives of the people discard what every one else adopts as a safe mode. Rogues and thieves, who want to break into the Treasury, would have a right to object to such measures of precaution. Is that a reason for us to reject them?

But the great objection of every opponent of the measure is, that it is an untried experiment. Is it true? What is now called an experiment? It is either the mode of keeping the money, or the kind of money to be kept. What is the mode of keeping the money proposed by this bill? By officers chosen by the people, under the Constitution, instead of officers chosen by banks. It has been tried for nearly thirty years in this Government. It is now in successful progress in every State in the Union. What are all the townships, county, and State officers for collecting taxes, but Sub-Treasurers. It is the practice of every independent nation in the world, nay, every petty corporation, and friendly association in the world, have their system of Sub-Treasuries. An experiment! the antagonist policy is an experiment, which has ended not only in depriving Government, but the people, of their money, the true standard of value. That experiment has most signally failed. As to the kind of money, is that an experiment? It is gold and silver instead of paper; the money of the Constitution, instead of the money of the banks. Can we choose any other standard of value in collecting the people's money than the standard of the Constitution? But I have done with these objections.

Suffer me, sir, to ask your attention for a few moments to the substitute of my honorable friend from Virginia, [Mr. RIVES,] which has just been rejected. In the very able and eloquent speech made by him in presenting that substitute, he remarked, that he regretted he should be deprived of the support of many members of this body, with whom he had lately stood side by side in upholding and defending the principles on which it rested; and that his consolation was, that he stood now where he stood then—that is, three years ago. Sir, that we are to lose the support of that distinguished Senator on this occasion is a subject of painful regret to me. He has had, and has now, the confidence, not only of myself, but of my constituents, which was most eminently evinced on a late occasion; and justice to myself requires that I should ascertain where my honorable friend stood then. The confidence of my constituents in myself would be weakened, if they found me deviating from the track that he was then pursuing. Permit me, then, in the most kindly spirit, and with the most friendly feelings, to overhaul the reckoning, and ascertain the latitude of departure. I find the last recorded sentiments of the honorable Senator in a speech delivered on the removal of the deposites, on the 17th January, 1834—a speech which would give celebrity to any statesman or orator:

"The honorable Senator from South Carolina has also told us that so long as the Government itself receives and pays away bank notes, it is an insult to the understanding to discourse of the pernicious tendency and unconstitutionality of the Bank of the United States; that while the Government, by so doing, treats bank notes as money, it not only has the right, but it is in duty bound, to incorporate a Bank of the United States; and that the question of the constitutionality of such an institution can fairly arise only when the Government shall refuse to receive any thing but gold and silver in payment of the public dues. Without stopping at present to examine the correctness of the reasoning of the honorable Senator, (reasoning which, to my mind, is entirely unsatisfactory, inasmuch as it makes a great question of constitutional power to depend, not on the fixed and immutable provisions of the Constitution itself, but, in effect, on the mere will of the Government, as it may happen to do or not to do a particular thing,) without stopping, I say, sir, to examine this reasoning, at present, I will say to the honorable Senator, that, seeing so many abler gentlemen, himself among the number, while admitting the vital importance of the object, declining the task of its prosecution, I pledge myself to present this great issue in the shape in which only the honorable Senator thinks it can be legitimately presented.

"Sir, of all the reforms, social, political, or economical, required by the great interests of the country, that which is most urgently demanded, and which promises in its accomplishment the largest results of utility, security, and public benefit, is, beyond comparison, the restoration of the Government to what it was intended by the framers of the Constitution to be, a hard money Government.

"We are too much in the habit, Mr. President, of regarding the evils of the paper system as necessary and incurable, and of being content with the delusive palliation of those evils supposed to be derived from the controlling supremacy of a National Bank. Nothing, in my opinion, is more demonstrable than that the great evil of that system, its ruinous fluctuations, arising from alternate expansions and contractions of bank issues, making a lottery, in effect, of private fortunes, and converting all prospective contracts and transactions into a species of gambling—nothing can be more certain than that these ruinous fluctuations, (and we have a striking proof of it in the present distresses of the country,) are increased, instead of being diminished, by the existence of an institution of such absolute ascendency, that when it expands the State banks expand with it; when it contracts, those banks are forced, in self-defence, to contract also. Whatever influence such an institution may be supposed to exert, in preserving the soundness of the currency, that object would be much more effectually promoted by a return, as far as practicable, to a metallic circulation. The first step towards that return, is to let the Bank of the United States go down. Its notes being withdrawn, the convenience of travelling alone would immediately create a demand for gold coins as a substitute, and enforce the necessity of correcting that under-valuation of them at the Mint, which is said to have contributed to their disappearance. In concurrence with this, let measures be taken, as it is believed effectual measures may be taken, to discourage and suppress the circulation of bank notes under a certain denomination, (ten or twenty dollars,) of which the effect would be to produce another accession to the metallic circulating medium. The ordinary channels of circulation being thus supplied with gold and silver, the Government would be prepared, without hardship to the public creditor, to require payment of its dues in specie, and thus realise a reform, than which none could be more deeply interesting, in every aspect, to the safety and prosperity o the country."

"Sir, here is an object worthy to engage the most anxious labors of the patriot and statesman; and I feel persuaded that, with a little of the effort and talent daily expended in the ephemeral contests of party, we should see it happily accomplished. I conjure gentlemen, then, with ability so eminently fitted for this great work, to leave the Bank of the United States to its fate—a fate already pronounced by the voice of the nation, and called for by the highest considerations connected with the safety of our free institutions, and bring forward their powerful aid in an effort to restore the Government to its true constitutional character and destination, that of a simple, solid, hard money Government."

Mr. President, I intend to make no comments. My constituents must judge from this speech where my honorable friend stood then, and where he stands now. My march is onward in the luminous path which he then indicated "to restore the Government to its true constitutional character and destination, that of a simple, solid, hard money Government." Mr. President, that substitute of the honorable Senator from Virginia has been called, by the distinguished Senator from Kentucky, a good half-way house. That half-way house, I am persuaded, has not been erected by my honorable friend from Virginia. It has been created by the magic wand of eloquence; but it is the palace of Circe, gorgeous and glittering with stones, fair and enchanting to the eye, but surrounded by tame lions and wolves. Let my honorable friend beware how he enters into that magic palace, and how he tastes food and wine. Let him beware of the fate of the companions of Eurycholus. There may be no Ulysses to restore him to his former glorious shape and manly bearing. Mr. President, the fate of that distinguished statesman, now no more, who once filled with such acknowledged dignity the Chair which you now occupy, is full of warning. He was tempted to stop at a half way house, with the captivating sign of "an union of honest men." No, sir, my honorable friend, after the excitement of this subject has passed away, I trust will be found side by side with his former friends; maintaining, with his distinguished ability, the great principles which they advocate.

Mr. President, I had another objection to that substitute; it was against equal rights. Out of upwards of eight hundred State banks, it selected twenty-five; thus constituting an oligarchy of banks. It establishes a bankocracy, which would of necessity seek safety under the protection of the money king in this country, and thus be brought under vassalage to the money king in England. The only difference, in my judgment, between this substitute and establishing a bank of the United States, is, the one is the beginning of the end, and the other is the end of the beginning. Had we adopted the substitute, the Bank of the United States of Pennsylvania must have been one of that league, or we must have resorted to a Bank of the United States to protect the league of banks from its power.

Before I dismiss this branch of the subject, I will make one further remark. I deeply regret to have seen a motto on the speech delivered by my honorable friend from New York [Mr. TALLMADGE] in defence of the bank from an alleged charge against them made by the President. That motto is, "Out, damned spot; out, I say."

[Mr. TALLMADGE here rose and said, that the motto was put on without his knowledge and consent.]

Mr. WALL resumed. I am happy to hear the avowal of my honorable friend. It could have been no friendly hand that put it there. Who that is acquainted with the works of the immortal poet of nature does not recollect that it is the agonized cry of conscience, when the body slumbered, for its own deeds, for friendship betrayed, hospitality violated, and confidence murdered.

The other branch of the antagonist policy, Mr. President, proposes to create a Bank of the United States, to keep, transfer, and disburse the public money. Sir, the first question is, does the Constitution give to Congress that power? Clearly it does not give it as an express power. Nowhere do you find in the Constitution an authority to create a bank or corporation. If it exists, it must be an implied power. The distinguished Senator from Kentucky hunted what he with so much felicity denominated that vagrant power, through every article, section, clause, and paragraph, of the Constitution; and a most brilliant hunt it was, sir, and has immortalised him, and he could not find it. He has, it is true, found it since; but where has he found it?

[Here Mr. CLAY said that he had found it in the late war and the necessities of the country.]

Mr. WALL resumed. I thought so, sir; he found it out of the Constitution. That is no constitutional power.

Mr. President, I am free to acknowledge that I had supposed once that this question had been settled by judicial decision. A more careful examination has satisfied me, however, that I was in error on this point. The luminous and gigantic intellect of Marshall, a man whose name I always pronounce with reverence, could find that power only in the clause authorizing Congress to lay and collect taxes; and when Congress had determined that it was a necessary means to that end, no judiciary could look behind that act. That decision only settled the constitutionality of the late Bank of the United States. Before that power which sustained the constitutionality of a bank can arise, Congress must first declare that it is both necessary and proper to collect the revenue in that mode. When I am at liberty, and shall be called on to act on that subject, I will think of it. Congress has not now so declared.

It is perfectly clear, then, Mr. President, that this vagrant power must be looked for somewhere else than where the Judges of the Supreme Court found it. Another mighty hunter has started in the chase, and where does he find this power?

1. In the authority to coin money and regulate the value thereof. What is the meaning of the word money in that clause? Does it mean metallic or paper money, or both? If it means only metallic money, (and who will pretend to the contrary?) then does not the rule of construction, that specification of one thing is the exclusion of another, apply?

In the second place, the honorable Senator from Massachusetts finds it in the clause authorizing Congress to regulate commerce, &c. The argument of the Senator is able and ingenious upon the subject. At present I do not intend to express any opinion as to the power of Congress to regulate the currency of State banks. It is a subject too weighty, and of two grave import, to be decided collaterally.

But, Mr. President, admit that the Senator from Massachusetts has proved that Congress has power to regulate the currency of the country, and that it is our duty to do so. What kind of power is it? It is undeniably an implied power, a delegated power, and a trust power. Can we delegate that power to a corporation, either created by ourselves or by a foreign power, to be exercised, controlled, and regulated by officers unknown to the Constitution, chosen by the corporations, amenable to the corporations, and uncontrollable by the people, through their constitutional agents. Could Congress delegate that delegated and trust power to the Bank of England or France, and if not, why not? Will not the same reason apply against a delegation to State banks as a United States Bank?

The honorable Senator, after all, if he has been successful, has only proved that Congress has power to create a Government bank, that monster that has so horribly affrighted gentlemen in the Opposition; he has only proved that Congress has power to create a people's bank, with the people's money, and for the people's use; and to be controlled by the officers of the people, chosen agreeably to the Constitution.

When the honorable Senator finds the constitutional power in Congress to regulate the currency, he has not advanced one step in his argument. He must still prove that Congress can delegate that eminent prerogative of sovereignty to corporations unknown to the Constitution—that we can withdraw ourselves from our constitutional duty, and substitute corporations to discharge it.

Sir, we can have no more right to create corporations to carry into execution implied powers, than express powers. We have authority to coin money, regulate the value thereof, to regulate commerce, declare war, etc. Must we not exercise those powers ourselves? Can we create a private corporation to coin money, regulate commerce, declare war, etc.? Can we, under the express and implied powers granted by the Constitution, shingle over the States with corporations to carry on mining, the manufacture of metals, to raise products, build ships, and for mechanical, manufacturing, and agricultural purposes? The mantle of construction of the honorable Senator is broad enough to cover the whole. How does he escape from this? By setting a distinction which is a petitio principii, a mere begging of the question.

But, sir, I do not mean to give my opinion on this subject. It is full of interest, and deserves a calm, unbiassed and unrestrained consideration. am not at liberty to give it that consideration Upon this subject I have been instructed both by the people and the Legislature of the State which I have the honor in part to represent, in every way that the voice of the people of New Jersey could be constitutionally declared, to vote against any Bank of the United States, such as proposed by the Senator.

1. The people settled it on the re-election of General Jackson.

2. It was settled by the Whig Legislature of 1832, in their abortive effort to instruct.

3. It was settled by the voice of the people, in the election of the members of Congress in 1832.

4. It was affirmed by the people, in the election of State officers in 1833.

5. It was declared expressly by the instructions of the Legislature in 1834.

6. It was again affirmed by the State elections and the election of members of Congress in 1834.

7. It was again affirmed by the election of the members of the State Legislature in 1835, with express reference to the election of a Senator.

8. It was settled both by the people and the Legislature in electing me as Senator.

9. It was again affirmed by the Legislature in plain and explicit terms in the instructions of 1835.

And what can be advanced to gainsay this array of facts? Nothing, sir, but the election of electors and members of Congress opposed to the present Administration in 1836, and the election and resolutions of the present Legislature. Now as to the first, the election of members of Congress; the only one of the elected members who expressed any opinion on the subject [Mr. HALSTEAD] was compelled by the pressure of public opinion to give a written pledge, that, if elected, he would vote against a Bank of the United States. I know, sir, that he has since voted differently, and told his constituents that there was an essential difference between the Bank of the United States and a Bank of the United States: that he meant to vote against the former, not the latter. Whether he has "paltered with them in a double sense," it is not for me to determine—and he will soon be before the tribunal that has ample jurisdiction to determine. This pledge takes away any implication that the people had changed, and indeed strongly confirms the former decisions on this subject. The candidate who made this pledge was the highest on the return. As to the electoral election in New Jersey, many extraneous matters were thrown in, and the majority was trifling. The majority was accidental, and could not repeal a settled uniform opinion so frequently declared and expressed directly by the people and the Legislature.

As to the last election, and the resolution of the present Legislature, they are silent on the subject of the bank. They leave the former instructions of the Legislature, on the subject of the bank, unrepealed, and in full force. But, sir, in this last election the great question about the banks came directly before the people. The banks had become dependent on the people by their suspension. The banks and their numerous stockholders and dependents had a deep interest in the choice of those who were to decide their fate. The raw-head-and-bloody-bones of Loco Focoism and Democracy were used with effect, and he who denies that the bank question did not enter into the elections and control them in New Jersey, I think is mistaken. In saying so, I do not mean to charge the banks with impropriety; they had a right to the preference. Those who had bank property considered it in danger. The gospel tells us that a man having a hundred sheep, and one being in danger, he straightway leaves the ninety-nine, and goes to look after the one in danger. That election also involved many State and local questions. The nominations in the different counties were all made before the President's Message, and the Sub-Treasury bill was never published and known in the State before the election terminated. I do not believe that the people did, by the election, instruct their agents here, or mean to declare their opinion as to the policy of the General Government. They were suffering under the pressure created by the suspension of the banks.

There are, then, but two policies presented for my choice: the one contained and carried out in this bill, and the other to charter a Bank of the United States. The Legislature of New Jersey have declared that it is not only the right, but the duty, of Congress, to provide for the safe-keeping and disposition of the public money. I am commanded, by the voice of the people of New Jersey, and the instructions of the Legislature of New Jersey, still in full force, not to vote for a Bank of the United States. I made that pledge to them when I was elected Senator. Now I am compelled to act, and have no alternative left, without disobeying the instructions of the Legislature and the voice of the people, but to vote for this bill. I rejoice, therefore, that my own judgment and conscience sanction that course.

Mr. President, it has been said that all that the banks want is confidence. Their misfortunes have flowed from too much confidence. Let them withdraw themselves from politics, move within their chartered orbits, avoid usury and oppression, and they will be safe. If they have lost confidence, it is by their own act, not by the act of the Government. They must regain confidence by their own act. They lost confidence by suspension; let them regain it by resumption. When they do so, sir, they will find confidence coming to their aid, and that the raw-head-and-bloody-bones of loco focoism, which has frightened them from their propriety, has no terrors for honest, faithful, and patriotic banks.

My colleague has said that the very name of Sub-Treasury is odious. I will not quarrel about names. Let us borrow from the great vocabulary of used-up names and call this bill "the American Constitutional Treasury system," and that objection ceases. It is more appropriate, and a better name, and I present it for his adoption.

Here, Mr. President, I would willingly stop; but I am not permitted to do so. My colleague has placed the resolutions of the Legislature of New Jersey, in 1837, in the foreground of his speech, and professed his fidelity to the wishes of the people of New Jersey. He has declared that they want only the little word instruct, to be instructions. I had borne the allusions of the distinguished Senator from Kentucky, and the other Senators acting with him in support of the antagonistical policy, with the most exemplary forbearance. The course of my colleague demands that I should ask the indulgence of the Senate while I recount to them the rise and progress of the doctrine of instruction in New Jersey. It will be found sufficiently curious to reward their attention. Sir, the Legislature of New Jersey have always been an instructing Legislature. It was so up to 1832.

On the 29th October, 1832, my colleague, then Governor of New Jersey, delivered an inaugural address. Among other things he took occasion to say:

"The people of New Jersey have two Governments equally their own, equally bound to protect their rights and interests; and they have divided the powers of legislation and sovereignty between them; and they have set limits to these powers in both. This was necessary in an union of free States in one Government. There are, therefore, subjects of ordinary legislation in other nations on which we are not permitted to act. An example of this is found in that question which so widely divides the people of the Union at this moment—the right to operate through our commercial relations with other nations on the industry of the community in its various departments. Without this right existing and in actual exercise, the country must be depressed, and the means and defences of prosperity lost. But in this matter the Government of this State, as such, cannot act. The compact with the other States prohibits it. But the people here are not deprived of the power on this point possessed by every other people. They have not left themselves unarmed and unshielded against foreign action upon their interests. They have not been so unwise. They have prohibited the representatives of their power here from deciding on this subject, because it might affect the peace and general interests of other portions of the Union. But they have conferred this power, and directed their representatives elsewhere to guard and protect their interests. To deny the power, and the right, and the duty to them, is to leave us without this attribute of sovereignty; not a people equal and free with others, but subject to all their caprices and impositions. When and how the power shall be exercised is matter of discretion; to be governed by a wise regard to all the interests and connections of the country.

"But the people of New Jersey, by themselves, or through their representatives here, and to their representatives there, have a right, and are bound by duty to themselves, to convey their commands on this as on any other interesting topic; and it is their business, both to watch and to control the doings of their general agents, and, as they appointed them, so to correct their wanderings and errors. But that duty is not appointed to us; the power does not exist in us, any more than a similar power exists in the representatives of the general will, to control and correct us in that which may have been entrusted to our care. It can only be so if it be thus written in the grant; and there I do not find it."

On the thirtieth of the same month of October the following instructions were introduced into the House of Assembly, and passed on the first of November following, by a vote of thirty-one to fourteen, every Whig voting for them:

"Whereas the people of New Jersey feel a deep interest in all things affecting the welfare of their common country, and particularly in every measure having relation to the judiciary, the tariff system, internal improvements, and the currency of the country, the maintenance of each in all their inviolability is deemed essential to the prosperity of the United States:

"Therefore, Be it resolved by the Council and General Assembly of the State of New Jersey, That our Senators be instructed, and our Representatives in Congress be requested, to use their best endeavors to maintain the present judiciary system of the United States inviolate; to give adequate protection to American industry; to foster and uphold internal improvements, and to vote for and advocate the renewal of the Bank of the United States, with such modifications as may be deemed necessary."

These resolutions, however, were never finally acted on by the Council, and they perished between the two houses. But while these instructions were pending before the Council, Governor Southard sent a message, on the 10th of January, 1833, to the Legislature, from which I ask leave to read some extracts:

"Some of those interests of the people of New Jersey, which have been confided to the General Government, are in a condition which calls for attention and consideration."

The Governor then communicates those interests. They are, the judiciary, the tariff system, internal improvements, and the currency of the country; the very interests specified and enumerated in the instructions then pending before the Council. He then proceeds:

"Some of the most valuable attributes of the Government which have given it strength, confirmed the Union, and made it a blessing, especially to the weaker members, are questioned, and their exercise deprecated. Even the supremacy of the laws, and the authority of treaties, are disregarded. Whether these things can give promise of good to the country, and promote the prosperity of the people of New Jersey, deserves to be well considered, and it would seem to be expedient that their opinions upon them should be known and felt through those who represent them."

My colleague ceased to be Governor, and became a Senator. Benedict, when he was accused of having railed against matrimony, defended himself, by saying that he then did not believe that he should ever live to be married. So my colleague has reason to say, that when he recommended instructions for others, he did not believe that he should ever live to be instructed. Even-handed justice returned the chalice to his own lips.

On the 11th of January, 1834, the Legislature of New Jersey, both houses concurring, by a very large majority, passed the following resolutions:

"Whereas the present crisis in our public affairs calls for a decided expression of the voice of the people of this State; and whereas, we consider it the undoubted right of the Legislatures of the several States to instruct those who represent their interests in the councils of the nation in all matters which intimately concern the public weal, and may affect the happiness or well-being of the people: Therefore,

"1. Be it resolved by the Council and General Assembly of this State, That, while we acknowledge, with feelings of devout gratitude, our obligations to the Great Ruler of nations for his mercies to us as a people, that we have been preserved alike from foreign war, from the evils of internal commotions, and the machinations of designing and ambitious men, who would prostrate the fair fabric of our Union; that we ought, nevertheless, to humble ourselves in his presence, and implore his aid for the perpetuation of our Republican institutions, and for a continuance of that unexampled prosperity which our country has enjoyed hitherto.

"2. Resolved, That we have undiminished confidence in the integrity and firmness of the venerable patriot who now holds the distinguished post of chief magistrate of this nation, and whose purity of purpose and elevated motives have so often received the unqualified approbation of a large majority of his fellow-citizens.

"3. Resolved, That we view with agitation and alarm the existence and gigantic power of a great moneyed incorporation, which threatens to embarrass the operations of the Government, and, by means of its unbounded influence upon the currency of the country, to scatter distress and ruin throughout the community; and that we, therefore, solemnly believe the present Bank of the United States ought not to be rechartered.

"4. Resolved, That our Senators in Congress be instructed, and our members of the House of Representatives be requested, to sustain, by their votes and influence, the course adopted by the Secretary of the Treasury, Mr. Taney, in relation to the Bank of the United States and the deposites of the Government moneys, believing, as we do, the course of the Secretary to have been constitutional, and that the public good required its adoption.

"5. Resolved, That the Governor be requested to forward a copy of the above resolutions to each of our Senators and Representatives from this State in the Congress of the United States."

These resolutions were presented to the Senate on the twentieth of January by my respected predecessor [Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN.] On the twenty-seventh of January, that gentleman addressed the Senate, and among other things, said:

"I know that I shall have the sympathies of the Senate, when I recall to them the instructions lately transmitted by the Legislature of the State which I, in part, have the honor to represent. This is a great national question, of common concern to us all; for these instructions are multiplying, and call certainly from me, sir, for distinct and respectful notice. The import of these instructions, I admit, sir, cannot be mistaken. The terms are unequivocal and plain to any apprehension. They instruct us to sustain, by our votes and influence, the course of the Secretary of the Treasury in the removal of the deposites. What are the nature and claims of legislative instructions? That a Legislature has the inherent right, legislatively and detached from their constituents, to direct the political conduct of a Senator in Congress, I can never subscribe to. Sir, where has such a right been delegated by the people? A Legislature of the State instruct or direct the Senate of the United States! Why, Mr. President, we had better change places at once. But when the resolutions of the Legislature can be satisfactorily regarded as the clear indication of public sentiment, deliberate and abiding, I am bound to hold them, as I do hold them, in most respectful consideration. And on such an occasion, when that opinion interferes with my own judgment and conscience, I should promptly surrender a trust that could no longer be held in harmony with my constituents. But here, sir, my embarrassment commences. I am not satisfied that these resolutions are the sure index of decided public sentiment. Sir, you know that, for the last five years, our political atmosphere has been very much given to change. The wheel is turning now, and unless I misread the language of events that are passing, impulses are given to its motion that will bring them to a whirl. Now, sir, will it be right to surrender private convictions of duty to an influence from this giddy seat of power? I think not. I am quite conscious of the delicacy of my position, but I trust that I shall meet it without fear. I will further say, sir, that even where the opinions of a State may be well known, occasions may arise to a representative of the people, rare I grant—when the emergency is of that deeply eventful nature—when he must go alone, so to speak, in the purity of his own purposes, and cast himself, with all his fame, and all the confidence of his country, into the crisis, and sink or rise, as success shall crown his intrepid conduct."

On the fourteenth of February, 1834, my colleague, in presenting a memorial to the Senate, said:

"He had believed, and he was of the same opinion still, that the Legislature, in adopting the resolutions which had been forwarded to him, had grossly erred in their representation of the public voice; and he had now in his hand two of the evidences of their error. Instructed, then, as he had been, by the Legislature of the State for what he conceived to be Executive usurpation, and charged by those who elected that Legislature to oppose such usurpation, he had a consolatory reflection, in the conviction that the course he had pursued would be sustained by a majority of the people."

On the twenty-first of March, 1834, my colleague, in a speech delivered in the Senate, said:

"There is another tribunal before which we [himself and his colleague, Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN,] shall meet most cheerfully our accusers, and as cheerfully abide the verdict and judgment which shall be rendered after the hearing, so far as they shall affect us personally, however we may feel for the laws and institutions of our country. That tribunal is the people of New Jersey, whom, we most solemnly believe, and think we have abundant evidence for our belief, were not correctly represented in those instructions. Again: is it true that the Legislature has a right, in disregard of popular opinion, and against the wishes of their own constituents, to control the other agents of those constituents? Is the power vested in the Legislature on this point, independent of the people of the State? Are they in that the masters of the people? I had supposed that the people were the source of power, and that their will was as controlling in its action on the members of the Legislature on this subject as on any other; and that their commands were only to be regarded as valid, when they conformed to the instructions and commands of their constituents. This may be skepticism; but I beg to say that it is old Republicanism and Democracy; not that of modern day, which seems to require that the will of a few who happen to be in a Legislature, or are leaders of a party, should be obeyed, in despite of the opinions and wishes of the people. Sir, believing as I do, that my constituents disapprove the act of the Executive, I should be guilty of treason towards them, if I obeyed the orders of others in approving that act against my own judgment."

Mr. President, an issue was thus fairly formed between the Legislature of New Jersey and my honorable predecessor and colleague. It was tried before that great tribunal which they selected in October, 1834. They had a fair hearing, for they both addressed public meetings of the people in different parts of the State, and no one appeared against them. The people rendered a verdict and judgment against them. They elected an increased majority, if I recollect right, of the friends of the Administration and the principles involved in the instructions—at all events, a large majority. The wheel did not come to a whirl that year.

How did my colleague and my predecessor fulfil their pledge to the public? Did they obey, or resign? Let the records of this Senate speak.

But the Legislature of that year gave them leave to imparl for one year. They did not instruct.

In October, 1835, a new election for members of the Legislature took place, whose duty it was to appoint a Senator in the place of my predecessor, whose time expired on the 3d of March following.

It is well known to the people of New Jersey that the name of my predecessor and my own were put before the people of New Jersey as opposing candidates for that office, and both were put in nomination by the Whig party. I, sir, was not selected for any particular affection which they entertained for me, but to gratify other feelings. I was held up before the public in such odious colors that I had not the option of declining the high honor, had I been disposed to do so, without compromitting my own honor and character, and that of my party. Sir, I should not have been a candidate at that time had I been left to my own volition, although it was the only office I desired: my own affairs required my attention. I became thus the representative of the principles of the instructions of 1834, and the friends of those principles triumphed by a large majority. The question was submitted directly to the people, and they gave judgment. I am here to carry it into effect.

The Legislature of 1835, the same which elected me as Senator on the 7th of November, 1835, passed the following resolutions:

"Whereas, in all representative Governments, the sovereignty of the people is an indisputable truth: they have a right, and it is their duty, upon all proper occasions, to instruct their representatives in the duties which they require them to perform. Therefore:

1. Be it resolved, by the Council and General Assembly of the State of New Jersey, That our Senators in Congress be, and they are hereby, instructed, to vote for, and use their influence to have expunged from the journal of the United States Senate the resolution passed on the 28th day of March, 1834, declaring "that the President, in the late executive proceedings in relation to the public revenue, had assumed upon himself authority and power not conferred by the Constitution and laws, but in derogation of both:" the same having passed that body without warrant of law.

2. Resolved, That our Senators in Congress, be, and they are hereby, instructed, and our Representatives in Congress requested, to vote against the recharter of the Bank of the United States, and against the chartering any other bank or similar institution.

3. Resolved, That the particular attention of our Senators be called to the foregoing resolutions, and that they be respectfully requested to conform thereto, or resign their seats in the Senate of the United States.

4. Resolved, That our Senators and Representatives in Congress be requested to lay before Congress the foregoing resolutions.

5. Resolved, That the Governor of this State be requested to forward a copy of the above resolutions to each of our Senators and Representatives in Congress, at the opening of the next session."

I came here, Mr. President, with these instructions in my hand, coming fresh from the people, and iterated and reiterated both by the people and the Legislature. What were they, sir? That the people and Legislature of New Jersey had unqualified confidence in the integrity and firmness of General Jackson, and in his purity of purpose, and elevated motives. That the Bank of the United States had disturbed the currency of the country, and scattered distress and ruin throughout the community, and ought not to be rechartered. That the removal of the deposites was constitutional, and required by the public good, and that the Senators of New Jersey were required to sustain, by their votes, the course adopted by the Secretary of the Treasury in relation to the Bank of the United States, and the deposites of the Government money.

After these first instructions were received, on the twenty-eighth of March, 1834, my honorable predecessor and my colleague voted directly in the face of them "that the President, in the late Executive proceedings in relation to the public revenue, had assumed upon himself authority and power not conferred by the Constitution and laws, but in derogation of both."

The resolutions of 1835 instructed the Senators to vote for expunging that resolution, as not warranted by law. It had been passed by those Senators in defiance of the clear and decided expression of the people and Legislature of New Jersey, under the assumption, by the Senators, that it was not in conformity to the will of the people. The people and the Legislature desired them, if they could not obey, to resign. Although pledged to resign in such an event, they would neither obey nor resign. New Jersey then had no voice on this floor, though she spoke in instructions. Where was then the solicitude of the honorable Senators from Kentucky, and the other Senators on this floor, who now manifest such sympathy for the voice of the people of New Jersey? Their eloquent tongues were mute, if not engaged in furnishing arguments to color disobedience and contumacy.

Sir, we have seen that the recusant Senators took issue before the people of New Jersey upon these great questions; that they pledged themselves to abide the verdict and judgment of that tribunal, and surrender their offices if it passed against them. Did they do so? No, sir; and what was the ground assumed by my colleague to justify his non-fulfilment of his pledge? It was, that instructions were not binding, and that the instruction to expunge was unconstitutional. But he had estopped himself from making any such defence. In his inaugural address as Governor of New Jersey, made on the 29th of October, 1834, a part of which I have read to you, as if to provide for the very case, he declares, in speaking of constitutional obligations:

"But my own judgment is not to be deemed infallible. The will of the officer is not the Constitution. The people of New Jersey made the Constitution. They have a right to say what was their meaning; and when they have said it, either by themselves or their constitutional agents, their decision is binding even upon the consciences of those who have to act for them. If there be error in the decision, the remedy is not to be found in disobeying or disregarding it, but by seeking in the proper channel, and from the proper source, a correction of the error. A different course savors of presumption. It is unbecoming in him who is but a fiduciary, whose office was not created for him and for his benefit, but for them and their interests—is but an agency under the people, the great principal."

This, Mr. President, is the history of the doctrine of instruction in New Jersey, as believed in, and practiced by both parties. My honorable colleague was supposed to be the founder of that school, but he treats his scholars very much as the Prince of Denmark treated the courtier Polonius. Instructions are like a cloud, which first assumes the shape of a camel, then a weasel, and finally, "is very much like a whale."

But, sir, his school is not original; he has undoubtedly borrowed from the horn book of the honorable Senator from Kentucky, [Mr. CLAY,] who says that he believes in instructions under certain qualifications. What those qualifications were he has not told us; but it is fair to infer, from his practice, that the qualification is, when he likes them, or when they please him.

Mr. President, upon the subject of instructions, I acknowledge that my colleague has the advantage of me. He is the best instructed Senator in this body, and if he obeys resolutions, it is claimed as a merit; and if he disobeys plain, positive instructions, stands recusant for three years, promises obedience, and then again disobeys, it is such high merit as to entitle him to the thanks of the Legislature," for his untiring and able defence of the rights of the State and the people." Sir, upon the subject of instructions, he is clothed with popish infallibility, while I for obeying am to be doomed to infamy, and to be delivered over to the barkings of "Tray, Blanche, and Sweetheart," and all the cur dogs of the press, and libelled by the toasts of New York renegade loco focos.

But, Mr. President, it is said that I have been instructed substantially. Now who pretends that declaratory resolutions and instructions are the same. Are they the men who believe in instructions? No, sir, no. They are men who do not believe in it themselves, but they attempt to fashion a belief for others. They are like blind men discoursing of colors. "De non apparentibus et non existentibus eadem est ratio." "A wink is as good as a nod to a blind man." I protest against the right of such men to prescribe a creed for me. An infidel is not a safe teacher of the doctrines of Christian sects. On this subject I claim the privilege of being bound by my own creed, and the creed of my friends, so far as I have adopted it; and that my consistency should be determined by its conformity to such creeds. I mean not to impose a creed on others, but I do claim the privilege of forming my own.

Now, sir, what is my creed on this subject? The only one that I have publicly avowed is, that the representative is the constitutional organ of the public will in the choice of President and Vice President, and that he is bound to conform to the voice of his constituents when lawfully expressed; and that he cannot look behind the electoral record Upon this subject I may claim the merit of consistency, however heterodox my creed may be in a case where all my feelings and personal preferences were in opposition to the choice of my constituents. I allude, Mr. President, to the occasion when I was so unfortunate as to be compelled, by my adherence to that creed, to record my vote for another, instead of yourself, for the place you now fill. Much misunderstanding prevailed on that subject, and I was complimented by a respectable clergyman in my neighborhood for my independence. I wrote him a letter on that occasion, which I ask the permission of the Senate to read, as it will best explain my views in respect to my representative duty. [Here several Senators called out, "permission! read it."] Mr. W. resumed. I am grateful for the permission. The letter is addressed to the Rev. Mr. John Plotts, at Mount Holly, and is dated, and was written, in this Chamber, on the 17th of February, 1837.

"Yours of the 13th instant was received by me this morning; and to prevent any misconception of my vote for Mr. Granger, I hasten to answer it. My vote was not given for Mr. Granger because I had any scruples about voting for Col. Johnson. On the contrary, Col. Johnson was my choice. I voted for him at the electoral election. That vote was my own. I believed that Col. Johnson was a brave, patriotic citizen, who was basely slandered by his political opponents, who would have taken him up as their candidate for the Presidency, could he have been induced to lend himself to their purposes. We should not then have heard any thing about the dark stain. Col. Johnson, throughout a political excitement unparalleled in our country, had for more than twenty years stood firm in the confidence of his constituents, triumphing at times over the political majority of his opponents. He had been honored by the confidence of his State; and I thought these repeated evidences of the confidence and good opinion of his neighbors and fellow-citizens were entitled to more reliance than the abuse of those who were striving to gain office by traducing him These charges did not move me, although I was aware that they did move many good men. I know the bitterness and the falsity of party malignity; and if Col. Johnson was not free from errors, if he was not perfect, he possessed the love, confidence, and respect of his neighbors, who knew him best; and his services to his country, his gallantry, and his pure devotion to the principles of our institutions, gave him a preference, in my judgment, over Mr. Granger, who was chiefly distinguished for his support of Antimasonic principles.

"But, sir, having given a vote for Col Johnson as an individual, I was called on as a Senator to choose between the two highest candidates for the office of Vice President, returned by the electors of the United States. My choice was restricted to two; in making it, I thought I was not to act individually, but as a representative. Of whom? I thought, of the people of New Jersey, for the Constitution of the United States does not recognise the Legislatures of the States in choosing Presidents and Vice Presidents, and if I was not the representative of the people, I was a representative without a constituent, which would be an absurdity. I thought the Constitution of the United States gives the choice of President and Vice President primarily to the people of the States numerically; if they fail in choosing a President, the selection from the three highest returned by the people, devolves on the States as States represented in the House of Representatives. I thought in that case, the representatives would be bound in the first instance to conform to the electoral vote of their States; that this was necessary upon the principles of our Constitution, which enables the small States thus to protect themselves from the overwhelming force of numbers in the large States; that it resulted from the very nature of representative Government, which makes use of agents to carry into effect the will of the people, not their own. Hence, also, results the doctrine of instruction and obedience. I believe that where the opinion of the people is fairly and constitutionally expressed, that the agent is bound to obey; that although this doctrine of instruction has its limits and restrictions, and the duty of obedience may be controlled by circumstances, yet that those exceptions only proved the general rule, and here was a case clear of all difficulty. If the people have any right, it is clearly the right to choose a President and Vice President, and that right is not forfeited by a failure to choose in one mode, but it lives throughout the other mode, although in choosing a Vice President the Senators act numerically; this does not make a substantial difference, as they are the representatives of the States, in their very creation; and as the Vice President may become President, I thought I was bound to give the voice of the people of the State I represent, not my own, on this occasion. Had I found that my scruples on this subject were disregarded by others, so as to destroy the principle on which I acted, I should have had the firmness and judgment in that case to act as became an American Senator. Nothing of the kind occurred. Six Senators stood as I did, with the choice of their constituents opposed to the feelings of their party friends. Five of them were Whigs; two of those voted with their constituents, three of them according to their own views. There was one Jackson Senator in the position I occupied. He voted for Colonel Johnson. There was then a balance of two Whig votes against their constituents; still, however, the voice of the people of the States triumphed. So situated, I was called on to vote. I voted as the people of New Jersey, through their electors, voted. I did not think that I was at liberty to look behind the record of the electoral vote, although it was a trifling, and, I thought, an accidental majority. Still, however, I thought my vote belonged to the people of New Jersey, and I gave their vote, not mine. This is in accordance with my own principles, and the principles and professions of my party. I am not willing to preach one thing and practice another. I was aware that this vote would subject me to censure on both sides; but I have entire confidence in the good sense and honesty of my constituents, and that even those who differ with me will do me the justice to believe that I acted consistently with my own principles and those of my party.

"I am not insensible of the value of the good opinion of yourself; and, although it is manifest that we differ in some respects. I cannot consent to leave you in any error as to the motives of my conduct, or to claim a merit which I do not deserve."

So much, sir, for my conduct on this occasion.

2. My party in New Jersey have declared that it is the undoubted right of the Legislatures of the several States to instruct those who represent their interests in the councils of the nation in all matters which intimately concern the public weal, and may affect the happiness or well being of the people.

It is due to myself and to truth, Mr. President, to declare that I was not consulted in relation to the instructions of 1834 or 1835; but they were both introduced and passed without consulting me. The doctrine which they contain has, however, my approbation. I believe that, according to the theory of our institutions, the Legislatures have the right to instruct Senators, because they are the immediate constituents of the Senators, and the right of instruction belongs to, and results from, the very nature of representative Government and constituency. The Legislatures may instruct Senators, and the people may instruct legislators. But I do not believe that the Legislature is chosen to convey the opinions of the people—the common principal both of Senators and State legislators—to Senators, in any other way than instructions. They may convey their own commands, in the way of instructions, to Senators, in all matters which intimately concern the public weal, or affect the happiness and well being of the people. They then assume the responsibility of the act which they command to be done, and make it their own act, and not the act of the Senator, and transfer all responsibility from the Senator to themselves. They discharge the Senator from responsibility to their common principal, and assume it themselves. But I do not, and never did, hold the doctrine of passive obedience and non-resistance. If a Legislature instructs me to do what I think will not promote the common weal and the happiness and well-being of the people, I shall here tell them so, and make known my opinion to our common master, the people; cast the responsibility upon them, where it does and ought to rest, and leave it for the people, in whose capacity for self-government I have full confidence, to decide between their common agents. But I shall obey the instructions of the Legislature when they are clearly given. Sir, in declaring this, I also feel bound to say that I do not believe that the people of New Jersey selected their Legislature to think for me, to reason for me, to believe for me, or to impose their political creeds upon me. They are a high-minded and generous people, and they mean to be represented, both here and in their own Legislature, by high-minded and honorable agents. They knew that when they selected members of the Legislature, they clothed them with the power of commanding their Senators; but if they did command, it was upon their assuming the responsibility of the act commanded to be done, and absolving the Senators from any responsibility to the people. But, sir, the people of New Jersey did not know and did not believe that a Legislature would be found that would meanly shrink from their proper responsibility of commanding what they thought the public interest required, and put forth their own wishes as the wishes of the people. The people know how to speak their own wishes and opinions in their own way, and in the constitutional mode. I have always repudiated the doctrine which those who do not believe in instructions put forth to disgrace the doctrine of instructions—that every election for a constable or other local officer, or for every member of the Legislature, is an instruction to the agent of the people in the National Legislature—that the representatives of the people here are to become political automatons, weathercocks, and turn north, east, west, or south, as such elections should point.

Mr. President, while I acknowledge the duty of obedience to instructions, it is right for me to say that I do not acknowledge the right of the Legislature to play with it as wax, and to mould it to any form. I will not be made the instrument of its abuse, nor shall it be prostituted to fraudulent purposes through my aid. I am no Jew, and do not believe that if my enemy disregards the Sabbath and makes war on me on that day, that the command to keep it holy forbids self-defence. I now announce that, if those who do not believe in the doctrine of instruction, but trample it in the dust and laugh it to scorn, attempt to destroy my political friends and principles by fraudulently availing themselves of our reverence for that doctrine, that they will not find me disarmed or unprepared for defence. I will not lend myself to any purpose to make the doctrine a sword for its enemies to destroy its friends, or a shield to save the enemies of the doctrine from all possibility of hazard. If they mean to blow hot and cold, they must select some other person to try that experiment upon. Now, Mr. President, let us see what the resolutions of the Legislature of New Jersey are, which are said to want only the little word instruct to make them instructions. So a statue may be said only to want vitality to make it speak. With your permission I will read them:

"Whereas it is the right and duty of the people to express their opinions in relation to public measures; and whereas the peculiar and embarrassed condition of our public affairs loudly demands an expression of the sentiments of the people of New Jersey. Therefore,

"Be it resolved by the Council and General Assembly of this State, That it is the constitutional right and duty of Congress to provide for the safe-keeping and disposition of the public treasure; and any act of the Executive, whereby it is removed from the custody of those to whom Congress have confided it, is a violation of law, and a dangerous abuse of power.

2. And be it resolved, That the resolution of the Senate of the United States, of the twenty eighth of March, in the year of our Lord one thousand eight hundred and thirty-four, which declares that "the President, in the late Executive proceedings in relation to the public revenue, assumed authority and power not conferred by the Constitution and laws, but in derogation of both," meets the decided approbation of this Legislature; and we regard the expunging of that resolution from the journal of the Senate, as an open infraction of one of the plainest provisions of the Constitution, and of most dangerous tendency.

3. And be it resolved, That the claim and practice of the National Executive, which regard all executive officers, and especially those to whom the public moneys are entrusted by law, as the mere agents of the President, whom he may on all occasions control and dismiss at his pleasure, are inconsistent with the Republican principles of our institutions, an assumption of regal prerogative, and tend to the establishment of arbitrary Government.

4 And be it resolved, That the circular letter from the Treasury Department, known as the "Specie circular," and issued by direction of the Executive, was not justified by law, inexpedient in relation to the currency of the country, unjust in its operation on different sections of the Union, and in violation of the constitutional rights of the States and the people.

"5. And be it resolved, That the removal of the public moneys from the deposite in which the law of the land required them to be kept, and where they were safe and available at all times; their deposite in banks, not selected or authorized by Congress, or capable of performing the duties of fiscal agents of the Government; the encouragement to them by the administration to enlarge their discounts and circulation, and increase the paper money of the country; the countenance given to the creation of an immense amount of new banking capital by the States; the unnecessary, unwise, and forced importations of specie from countries to which our own was indebted, and to which, by the operations of commerce, it must be restored; and the refusal to receive the ordinary circulating medium for dues to the Government constitute a succession of acts founded in ignorance of the condition and interests of the country, whose inevitable tendency was to derange the business and exchanges of the different portions of the Union, create distrust, embarrass every branch of industry, destroy the prosperity of the country and oppress the laboring classes of the community; and that, in the opinion of the people of this State, these acts of the Government have destroyed the business of the nation, and are the immediate causes of the depreciated state of our circulating medium, and of the universal distress of the community.

"6. And be it resolved, That the recent act of Congress, founded on the recommendation of the President, which withholds from the States nine millions of dollars, which had been pledged to them, disappointed the just expectations of the States, and was an unjust and unnecessary violation of faith, leading to consequences injurious to the States and the people.

"7. And be it resolved, That the issue of ten millions of Treasury drafts to enable the Government to meet the expenses of its Administration, is evidence of a wanton waste of the abundant revenues and resources, an unnecessary addition to the paper money of the country, and a violation of the professions and promises which have been made to the people.

"8. And be it resolved, That this Legislature look with alarm to the measures proposed and urged by the present National Executive, and in the name, and on the behalf of the people of this State, do most earnestly and solemnly protest against—

"1st. The adoption of what is usually called the Sub-Treasury scheme, whereby all the public treasure will be in the hands of the officers of the Government, to be kept and disbursed by them; will be unsafe; may be used for party and corrupt purposes; and will augment the Executive power to a dangerous extent, inasmuch as the control of the whole treasure of the nation will, by the power of appointment and removal, be in the hands of the President alone.

"2d. The establishment of the principle and practice of compelling all dues to the Government, and all debts from the Government, to be paid in specie alone, because it will enable the Government to obtain possession of a large proportion of the specie of the country, and thereby control at pleasure, and destroy, the circulating medium, created by the States; and it also establishes a most odious distinction between the people and those who hold public office, inasmuch as the latter will receive for their salaries, and in payment for their services, gold and silver, while the labor of the people must be paid for in less valuable paper, which the conduct of the Government will more and more depreciate, and render worthless.

"3d. The passage of a special bankrupt law, applicable to State banks, because it violates the spirit of the Constitution of the United States, is partial in its application, and interferes with the acknowledged rights of the States; inasmuch as it assumes to the General Government the power to dictate the terms on which corporations created by the States shall be regulated and destroyed.

"9. And be it resolved, That we regard these measures as ruinous to the best interests of our country, and dangerous to the existence of our Republican institutions; and we declare our solemn conviction, that they are decidedly disapproved by the people of this State; and that our representatives in both Houses of Congress will best conform their acts and votes to the wishes of their constituents, by a faithful resistance to their adoption.

"10. And be it resolved, That in his unwavering opposition to all the foregoing measures, his patriotic and eloquent support of the above recited resolution, and his untiring and able defence of the rights and interests of the States and the people, the Hon. Samuel L. Southard has discharged the duties of the statesman and the patriot, and entitled himself to our highest respect and warmest gratitude.

"11. And be it resolved, That the conduct of the Representatives of this State, in the present House of Representatives, merits and receives our decided and hearty approval.

"12. And be it resolved, That the Governor be required to transmit a copy of these resolutions to each of our Senators and Representatives in Congress, with a request to present the same to both House."

No man, sir, will seriously pretend that these are instructions. They are the mere declaration of what the Legislature profess to believe to be the voice of the people of New Jersey, respecting the policy of the General Government. They contain no commands, there is no manly assumption of responsibility; no generous confidence in avowing these opinions, which relieves the agents of the people here from their responsibility to the people. Why did they not instruct, if they so meant? Was it because they were ignorant of the difference between instructions conveying the commands of the Legislature, and resolutions professing to declare the opinions of the people? I have shown that the records of the Legislature abound with precedents. Was it because they considered them identical? I have shown that Whig Legislatures instruct when they so mean. Was it because they could not instruct without trampling upon the reputation of the Senator whom they meant to applaud? If so, it ought to have admonished them not to play with edged tools. But why speculate on this subject? I turn to the tenth resolution, which applauds the conduct of my colleague as a statesman and a patriot, as one which I view as decisive upon the subject. I ask, sir, could any Legislature be found that would, in the same breath, give instructions to Senators, and, in the same breath, pour out unmeasured praise upon a Senator who had stood, for more than three years, in open, repeated, and renewed, disobedience to the instructions of the Legilsature and the voice of the people of New Jersey; who had the presumption to appeal from the Legislature to the people; who had had two fair trials, both before the Legislature and the people, had promised obedience, and had, after all, disobeyed? Why, sir, it is a degree of inconsistency that amounts to fatuity. By the benign principles of the common law, no man can be permitted to stultify himself; and the Legislature of the State which I have, in part, the honor to represent, shall not do so, with my consent. My honorable friend from Pennsylvania [Mr. BUCHANAN] may look to the immunities of legislative bodies on the other side of the Delaware. It is no concern of mine.

Yes, sir; I take as deep an interest in that tenth resolution as my colleague can, although it was designed exclusively for his honor. It is my protection. It is at once an estoppel against these resolutions being set up as instructions and a letter of license to me.

View them as instructions, or as intended to operate on me, and in what a disgraceful position do they place the Legislature of New Jersey! How will they dare to look a generous, high-minded, and confiding constituency in the face? This construction assumes that they meant to dishonor the voice of the people by applauding him who disobeyed it; to dishonor legislative instructions, by holding out legislative honors to disobedience; that they dare not, out of tenderness to their friends, manfully express what they meant, or that the conduct of those friends had constrained them "to palter in a double sense"—to attempt by indirection what they had not the manliness to do directly; in short, sir, it assumes that they would not instruct, because they knew I would obey, and thus defeat malignity. And therefore they fraudulently contrived resolutions which they knew were not instructions, but intended to wear the form, without the substance, and thus place both my colleague and myself in false positions, and let loose upon me the cur dogs of party.

Mr. President, I do not view these resolutions as instructions. I cannot do so without stamping the Legislature with fraud and dishonor. I shall continue in that opinion until some one of that Legislature avows that they were so meant, under his own name, and I will then bring him before the tribunal of our masters to answer for the fraudulent use and abuse of legislative trust.

That these resolutions were not designed as instructions to me, is further confirmed by the history of the day. It is well known that the poetical gentleman who introduced them, and who, no doubt, considered that he held in the breath of his nostrils the issues of death and immortality, would not even "breathe my name," but committed it to the awful punishment of letting it "rest in the shade." He would not suffer it even to be breathed in connection with these immortal resolutions. Another, and a conclusive, reason why they were not designed as instructions, is, that both the Legislature and the people of New Jersey had, on two different occasions, sanctioned and confirmed that part of the policy of the General Government which related to the administration of General Jackson—the removal of the deposites, the taking the moneys of the United States from the use of the United States Bank, and repudiated the resolution of the Senate of the twenty-eighth of March, 1834, as not warranted by law, and commanded their Senators to vote for expunging that resolution. In fact, all the measures repudiated by the resolutions in question had been previously sanctioned by the people of New Jersey. If it were true, which I do not believe, that the people had changed their mind on the subject, I do not believe that the people who selected me as Senator, and at the same time commanded me to expunge that resolution, would afterwards disavow the act, censure me for my obedience, and shower thanks upon my colleague for disobedience. What could purify the doctrine of instruction from such disgrace, contempt, and infamy?

Sir, I have another reason for believing that these resolutions were not designed as instructions, and that arises from my modesty. I do not believe that the Legislature intended to put me on the road to honor by these resolutions; to place me in the way of entitling myself to Legislative thanks, by the merit of disobedience. Do you not perceive, sir, that if my colleague obtains honors by disobedience to instructions, that disobedience is merit, and that I can win honor in the same way? Surely, sir, it would be doubting the justice of the Legislature to suspect that, if disobedience was meritorious in my colleague, it could be less so in me. No Legislature would render itself odious by making fish of one and flesh of another Senator.

No, sir: they are not, and were not designed to be instructions. They are simply a Whig creed. It is well known, sir, that that party is composed of discordant and heterogeneous materials; and they want a common standard for action here and at home. They applaud their representatives in Congress for their conduct at the extra session in doing nothing, and opposing every thing. Here they present them a little book for their future guide, in their arduous duties of opposition. Now, sir, this creed teaches me to believe that every thing that General Jackson has done for the whole period of his administration, and every thing that his successor has recommended, or will recommend, is wrong. Sir, I have a very great respect for the Legislature of my native State, and the gentlemen who compose it; but they must excuse me. They believe too much for me: I cannot believe up to their standard. Besides, sir, I have just enough of the Quaker blood in my veins to reject creeds which are made for me. I do not believe in the right of any body of men to frame and fashion a political creed for me, or to order a faith for me. I look upon my own faith as best, and shall hold on to it until better advised.

Sir, we have heard much of the spoils party. It has been a fruitful subject of declamation; but the great Whig party, while they condemn it, adopt it. Wherever they get power they make a clean sweep from the highest to the lowest, and they reward the faithful. My own Legislature, I understand, did a snug business in that way, relieving the distresses of some eight hundred or a thousand of the new recruits in the ranks of the spoils party. But the effort to impose a creed on the vanquished, is going one step beyond the atrocities of the odious spoils party. Not content with stripping all those of office whom they can, (for when did they ever spare a victim,) here is an avowed effort to make those who are beyond their reach undergo the ignominious punishment of the yoke; an attempt to impose a creed upon them—to make them put on their livery and get up behind their triumphant coach. I will wear no livery but that of the people.

Mr. President, this attempt by the victors to impose a creed upon the vanquished, is a novelty. It is not Republican, for Republicanism teaches "that error of opinion may be tolerated while reason is left free to combat it." It is not Christian, for Christianity teaches charity. It is the Mahometan and Turkish creed which is now sought to be interpolated in the politics of the country; a creed which teaches that to the victors belong not only the spoils, but also the right of imposing their creed upon the vanquished. I am not prepared to turn Turk. I shall remain true to my friends and my country.

I sincerely thank the honorable Senator from Kentucky, and the other Senators who have manifested such zeal for my conversion. I have no doubt it arose from the most kindly feelings to propagate the true faith on the doctrine of instructions; and I would therefore recommend that they should unite their efforts upon the honorable Senator from South Carolina, [Mr. PRESTON] who is in the same unfortunate situation with myself. If he should become their neophyte, I will think of beginning to take lessons from my honorable colleague. I will owe my conversion to no other hands.

Mr. President, I have a few remarks more, and I will cease to tax your patience. It is always with unaffected reluctance that I speak about myself. I am, however, compelled to do so.

The distinguished Senator from Kentucky, [Mr. CLAY,] who plays many parts here, and always with eminent ability, the other day, in striking at friends and foes, spoke of my Federalism; and my honorable colleague has alluded to it in a manner too significant to be misunderstood. What do these Senators mean by such allusions? Do they mean that it is an eternal reproach, an indelible mark of disgrace, to have belonged to the Federal party? If that is their meaning, let them proclaim it in New Jersey, and they will soon find that they lose more than two-thirds of their supporters. If they drive from their ranks the Federalists, as unworthy of association, they will be left with the skeleton of a party. Do they mean it as a reproach to me? I am willing to bear it. Here, sir, in the presence of the American people, I avow that I was a Federalist, and acted with that party zealously and actively, so long as their flag waved in New Jersey. Standing here, as it were, with the eyes of the immortal Father of his Country—the head and leader of the party to which I belonged—intently fixed upon me, I should be unworthy of my present honorable position, if I hesitated to make the avowal. Sir, it is an honor to any one to have been a humble follower of the purest and most unsullied Democrat that ever lived. Who, sir, were the leaders of the New Jersey Federalists? For, sir, I hold myself answerable only for their sins and my own. I reject all imputative sins. They were the men whose Democracy was tried by the fires of the Revolution, who had assisted in that glorious struggle in the field and in the cabinet and in forming the Constitutions which now support our liberties. They were talented, high-minded, and honorable, and, above all, they were eminently American and patriotic. When I arrived at manhood I found them prostrate, in a hopeless minority, and crushed by what I considered an oligarchy, whose claims for Democracy were not equal to those of the Federalists whom they expelled from power.

Sir, the Federal party, while it existed in New Jersey, after I became of age, never had but one year of power. They have few sins of commission to answer for. They stood in opposition, and I stood with them, side by side, until after the declaration of the late war, and the invasion of the country by the British. I thought then, and still think, that although there had been abundant cause for war from the time of the attack on the Chesapeake, that it was declared rashly, and that the Goverement had not done its duty in putting the country in a state of defence. But, sir, when the country was invaded, I thought it the duty of every man to go for the country.

I had hoped, sir, to have seen the venerable man, who was at that time the leader of the Federal party in New Jersey, (and a more patriotic, heroic, and American heart beats not in any bosom,)in the place which he has occupied for several days in this Chamber, [Col. OGDEN.] And he could have told you what were my feelings and sentiments then. Sir, the Federalists of New Jersey were Americans and patriots. I had the honor of commanding in camp during the late war a company composed exclusively of Federalists, and it is due to them to say, that among their gallant associates they had no superiors in patriotism, and every quality that becomes an American soldier. There, sir, I was brought in close connection with Democrats, and found in truth what Mr. Jefferson had declared, "that we were all Federalists, all Republicans." Shortly after the war the Federalists in New Jersey struck their flag by their own hands, and voluntarily disbanded. I remained with them with unshaken fidelity until that time, although some differed with me, no doubt honestly, as to the course I had taken in the war. We were conquered, sir, by our friends, not by our foes. But not by our friends in New Jersey. There, sir, we furled our flag with our own hands, still bearing the national stripes and stars undisgraced. The era of good feeling commenced with Mr. Monroe's administration. The friends of internal improvement in New Jersey were about commencing those great works which will immortalize them, and which has given to the State such prosperity. My feeble exertions were invoked in that cause, and I entered the Legislature as a representative of one of the most Democratic counties in the State. Party feeling was calmed and subdued for several years. The time came, however, when the principles which are always working in Republican Governments, were about to exhibit themselves in new forms. New parties were formed. I had been discharged from all parties by the voluntary disbanding of the party to which I belonged. I had remained neutral for years. When I thought the proper moment had arrived, I took "my musket, cartridge-box, and shot pouch," and entered the caucus, the great Wittenagemotte of the Democracy of Hunterdon county. But I did not go "solitary and alone." Those who had stood side by side with me in my course during the late war, went with me. I was opposed by some who made the same objection that has been made here. I did not meet that objection by denial, but justification. I told them that I had drawn my Federalism from the principles of the Revolution, the Constitution of the United States, and Washington's Farewell Address. The Democrats found that my Federalism and their Democracy did not differ much, and that difference related to the past, and they honored me with their confidence. Sir, I have never abused that confidence, and the last pulse which beats in my bosom will be in gratitude for their favors, and in devotion to their service.

Sir, I entered the Democratic ranks, not as a deserter, for I left no party, but as an American citizen should meet his fellows, conscious of the purity of his own purposes; and I was received and treated with a confidence equal to that which I had evinced. It required no sacrifice on either side to cement our union.

Sir, I never joined any party, but when it was in a minority, nor have I ever asked of any party with which I acted as much as they in their bounty were willing to bestow. I have never deserted either party or friends; nor, sir, have they been importuned, distracted, or weakened, to promote my ambition or interest.

My colleague, with some scorn, speaks of modern Democracy, and says that he went to bed one night a Democrat, and rose the next morning a Federalist. Sir, if such a sudden metamorphose took place, his democracy must have been composed of "such stuff as dreams are made of"—"like shadows it came, and like shadows it departed." My democracy, however modern it may be, neither came so suddenly, nor will it, I hope, be so evanescent. I admit that my democracy is a plant of slow growth; it neither came up in a night, nor will it be found withered in the morning. It resulted from reflection, experience, and the conquest over error and prejudice; and I hope that, like all plants of slow growth, it will be the more enduring. I have no pretensions to that unctious Democracy which arises from hereditary descent. I cannot boast that "I was born in the purple." Hereditary Democracy savors rather of Aristocracy, and, like hereditary property, is apt to be dissipated. Unfortunately for me, my father died before the formation of parties in this country, but he bequeathed to me his Revolutionary feelings and example, his only inheritance.

Mr. President, I do not boast of my consistency. Since I attained the age of twenty-one, I acknowledge that I have changed my opinion on many subjects, legal, political, religious, moral, philosophical, and as to men; and if my life is spared, and my opportunities and the possession of my faculties are vouchsafed to me, I do not doubt but I may still change. But, sir, in pure love of my country and its institutions, in devotion to what my judgment tells me will best promote its interests, in the love and pursuit of truth, and the attainment of honorable ends by honorable means, I am not conscious of any change.

Whatever my Democracy or my Federalism may have been, it is now drawn from the principles of our Revolution and of our Republican institutions, and an adherence to that mode of administering the Government which will produce the greatest good to the greatest number. I draw my Democratic principles from Washington's Farewell Address, from the doctrine of equal rights and equal privileges, and the protection of those rights and privileges, and all other privileges sanctioned by the Constitution, by law. Finally, sir, I believe in a strict construction of the Constitution, but such a construction as will develope and call into action all its express and implied powers, for the beneficent purposes of its adoption.

Now, sir, whether this Democracy is from the school of Federalism or Republicanism, of Washington or Jefferson, I shall not inquire. It is my Democracy.

Mr. President, I bow in submission to the voice of the people of New Jersey; but that voice is not declared by these resolutions. The Legislature may command, but they assume an authority not delegated, if they arrogate to themselves the right to bind the people of New Jersey by uttering their voice as the voice of the people. Have the people changed? for they must have changed, if these resolutions declare their voice. In what constitutional mode have they evinced that change? I have not been able to discover it. At the last State election the friends of the Administration polled more votes in the disputed counties in that State than they ever did on any former occasion. Many of the strongest Democratic counties were divided by two tickets, both professing the same political sentiments in favor of the National Administration.

Sir, at the time these resolutions were passed, no one of the people or the Legislature had seen this bill which it is pretended is condemned by the voice of the people of New Jersey. Then, Mr. President, I shall look to the Constitution and the instructions of the Legislature of New Jersey, twice sanctioned by the people, for my guide. I shall vote for keeping (as the laws now provide for collecting) the public treasure by constitutional officers, chosen, amenable to, and regulated by, the Constitution and laws, solely for the public use—instead of placing it to be kept in the possession and custody of bank agents—chosen by banks irresponsible to the Government or the people—to be used for the sole and exclusive profit of banks. If I err in this, my error is in the Constitution, and the remedy is with the people. I commit myself with unshaken confidence to their hands, and submit my actions to their judgment and decision, which with me will be decisive.

THE FULTON CLAIM.

SPEECH OF MR. DUNCAN, OF OHIO.

In House of Representatives, March 30, 1838.—The motion of Mr. THOMPSON to reconsider the following bill, passed by the House on a former day, came up for consideration:

A BILL for the relief of the heirs of Robert Fulton.

Be it enacted, &c. That the Secretary of the Treasury pay to the heirs of Robert Fulton one hundred thousand dollars, for the services of said Robert Fulton in inventing a system of coast and harbor defence, and in testing its utility; and for his services for inventing and superintending the construction of a steam frigate at New York, during and after the late war; and for the use of his patent for steam frigate; and for the detention of his steamboat Vesuvius, impressed into the service of the United States, and detained from the thirtieth of December, eighteen hundred and fourteen, to the twelfth of March, eighteen hundred and fifteen, both days inclusive; and for the damage done to said boat while she was aground at New Orleans.

Mr. DUNCAN rose and said, when the bill in question was under consideration, he attempted briefly to explain his reasons why, at that time, he could not give it his support. His reasons were, that the friends of the bill had failed to convince him, as well as many others, that the enormous sum of one hundred thousand dollars, or any other sum, was due from this Government to the heirs of Robert Fulton.

He at that time moved a postponement of the bill for a short period, until he, as well as others, desirous of the same thing, could investigate the matter, and be prepared to vote understandingly; but that motion failed. He then moved a call of the House, to the end that there might be a full vote on the question of the passage of the bill, but in this he was also unfortunate: such seemed to be the determination to pass the bill, that he did not know but that his humble efforts to secure a reconsideration would not be viewed in any other light than that of temerity; but he was happy to find himself in good company, for he knew of many members who were anxious for a reconsideration, whose judgments were superior to his own, and whose charity, humanity, and singleness of heart were in no particular inferior to that of those who were exerting themselves to secure the appropriation contained in the bill.

Great reliance had been placed on the vigilance and scrutiny of the Committee of Claims, who reported the bill, and a most unmeasured, unbounded, and eloquent eulogium had been pronounced on the chairman of that committee, for his superior skill and depth of research. This was due, in gratitude, from the friends of the bill, and it was expected as a matter of course; and all that had been said of that committee, and the chairman thereof, might be true. Mr. D. was not disposed to doubt one word of it; but when he acted on a matter of this kind, he acted officially, he acted upon oath; and when he was about to vote away $100,000 of the proceeds of honest toil, he felt bound, by the most solemn obligations, to examine for himself the propriety of the vote he was about to give. And should his vote be improperly given, and injustice done to those whose interests were involved, it would be but a poor apology either to his conscience, his God, or his country, that he had committed this violence on the rights of others, because the Committee of Claims said it was right.

This right, and this duty, to examine for himself into this matter, as well as others of a similar character, constituted his apology for asking the indulgence of the House for a short time to give his reasons why he felt bound to vote in favor of the present motion, and against the passage of the bill, should the present motion succeed.

Mr. D. remarked, that, before proceeding to give the result of the examination he had made of this subject, he thought it due to himself to say that he commenced the investigation with the strongest feelings of friendship for the claim, gratitude for the memory of Fulton, and sympathy for his heirs.

He had entertained a hope that, in the transcendent services of Robert Fulton that have tended so much to elevate his country in the scale of every thing that is calculated to add to her prosperity and advancement at home, and reputation abroad, he would find ample inducements for sustaining the appropriation in question; but in this he was disappointed, believing, as he did, that no appropriation of money could be made by Congress, except to carry into effect the purposes for which the Federal Government was formed, and these he would notice before he took his seat.

The credit of the invention of the application of steam to the propelling of boats, and the construction of machinery by which the power of steam is applied to the navigation of rivers, has almost universally been awarded to Robert Fulton, and I was, for many years, among the number that thought him entitled to that credit. But what does history say? I hold in my hand a book, the title of which is, "Anecdotes of Steam Engines," vol. 2. This work is in high repute, and its author well esteemed as a careful, judicious, and faithful compiler. I procured it at the Patent Office, where it is regarded as a text book. Here Mr. D. requested the Clerk to read from page 485.

"Blasco De Garay, a sea captain, exhibited to the Emperor and King Charles V, in the year 1543, an engine by which ships and vessels of the largest size could be propelled, even in a calm, without the aid of oars or sails.

"Notwithstanding the opposition which this project encountered, the Emperor resolved that an experiment should be made, as, in fact, it was, with the success, in the harbor of Barcelona, on the 17th of June, 1543.

"Garay never publicly exposed the construction of his engine, but it was observed at the time of his experiment that it consisted of a large caldron or vessel of boiling water, and a movable wheel attached to each side of the ship.

"The experiment was made on a ship of 200 tons, arrived from Calahia, to discharge a cargo of wheat at Barcelona: it was called the Trinity, and the captain's name was Peter de Scarza.

"By order of Charles V, and the Prince Philip the Second, his son, there were present at the time, Henry de Toledo, the governor, Peter Cardona, the treasurer, Ravago, the vice-chancellor, Francis Gralla, and many other persons of rank, both Castilians and Catalonians; and, among others, several sea captains witnessed the operation, some in the vessel, and others on the shore.

"The Emperor and Prince, and others with them, applauded the engine, and especially the experness with which the ship could be tacked. The treasurer, Ravago, an enemy to the project, said it would move two leagues in three hours. It was very complicated and expensive, and exposed to the constant danger of bursting the boiler. The other commissioners affirmed that the vessel could be tacked twice as quick as a galley, served by the common method, and that at its lowest rate it would move a league in an hour.

"The exhibition being finished, Garay took from the ship his engine, and having deposited the wood work in the arsenal of Barcelona, kept the rest to himself.

"Notwithstanding the difficulties and opposition thrown in the way by Ravago, the invention was approved; and if the expedition in which Charles V, was then engaged had not failed, it would undoubtedly have been favored by him. As it was, he raised Garay to a higher station, gave him a sum of money (200,000 maravedies) as a present, ordered all the expenses of the experiment to be paid out of the general treasury, and conferred upon him other rewards.

"Such are the facts collected from the original registers preserved in the Royal archives at Samancas, and among the public papers at Catalonia, and those of the Secretary at War, for the year 1543."

Thus, it seems, as early as 1543, that a vessel was propelled by steam, to the great amusement and astonishment of the Emperor and King, Charles V, and a portion of his Court; and the machinery consisted of a boiler, engine, and paddle-wheels.

Hebert on Steam Engines, a work of much celebrity, furnishes us with these facts, page 295:

"Among such attempts we find the invention of Mr. Jonathan Hulls, of London, who, in 1736, took out a patent for the application of the crank to the steam engine, by which addition he purposed 'to carry vessels or ships out of or into a harbor, port, or river, against wind or tide, or in a calm.'"

About the same time, or shortly after, Mr. Watt, of England, also took out a patent for a similar purpose, but constructed on a different plan, (ibid. 296.) These experiments opened the way for various others, some of which were successful within the eighteenth century, one of which appears to have been made for inland navigation on the Forth and Clyde, in Scotland, by Mr. Symington, but which seems to have been early abandoned, in consequence of the injury done to the banks of the canal by the waves produced by the paddle-wheels. But it appears in the same work, on the same page, by the statement of the ingenious Oliver Evans, a native son of America, whose engine is described in another part of it, (p. 141,) that so early as 1785 he had published a description of a mode of propelling boats by steam. It is said, in the history of Mr. Evans, that his indigent circumstances prevented him from carrying his plans into effect until 1804. But the historian says, "he does fully, in our estimation, establish his claim to the first contrivance of a practical steamboat."*

But a pamphlet published by a Mr. Fitch, an American citizen, also the legislative history of a contest between Mr. Fitch and Mr. Rumsey, before the Legislature of New Jersey, actually shows therein that Mr. Fitch had a small steamboat in operation so early as 1785, on the Delaware river. This boat was on the oar plan, in lieu of the wheel paddles.

Mr. Fitch obtained a patent for his improvement or discovery, or both, in 1791, from the Secretary of State, (the officer who at that time granted patents;) when, or soon after, he obtained, by the enactment of laws, the exclusive privilege of navigating the waters under the jurisdiction of New York, Pennsylvania, New Jersey, Delaware, and perhaps Virginia, I think, for the term of twenty years.

Mr. Fitch, from the want of pecuniary funds, was unable to carry his inventions, improvements, and legislative privileges into successful operation. He visited France for the purpose of raising the necessary means, and in Paris formed an acquaintance with the American Minister, Mr. Vail, to whom he disclosed the object of his visit, and to whom he developed all his plans, models, and draughts. Being unsuccessful in the object of his visit, he left all his papers in the hands of Mr. Vail.

The next thing of importance which demands our attention is, that Mr. Livingston, of New York, (the late lamented Chancellor,) reported that he was in the possession of a plan by which he could propel boats by steam, but that he was deterred from carrying his plan into practical operation in consequence of the exclusive privileges bestowed upon Mr. Fitch by the Legislature of New York. And he urged upon the Legislature of his native State, by memorial, the propriety and importance of repealing the act securing the "exclusive privileges," &c. to Mr. Fitch, stating, among other things, for reason, that Mr. Fitch had abandoned his project of steamboats, and that he had left the country, &c.

The Legislature entertained the proposition of Mr. Livingston, passed an act repealing the act granted to Mr. Fitch, and giving Mr. Livingston all the rights and privileges formerly granted to Mr. Fitch, and for the same term of time, provided he should put into successful operation, on the Hudson river, a steamboat, within one year from the passage of said act.

This act was submitted to the Council of Revision, who vetoed it; it was returned to the Legislature, reconsidered, and passed by the constitutional majority required, and thus became a law. The year within which, by one of its provisions, a boat was to be placed on the Hudson river, passed away, and the stipulated condition was not complied with. Farther time was asked, and two years more were merged in that which will be witnessed no more, and no boat had yet appeared on the Hudson river. An extension of time was solicited, and four additional years granted.

But, some time before this, Mr. Fulton, whose name I have not been able to introduce into this history until now, and whose name is in no manner yet connected with the invention of steam engines or steamboats, went to Paris in the humble capacity of a painter, in which he sustained, as history informs us, a good reputation, and attained great celebrity; and, being an American, whose excellence as an artist all were willing to acknowledge, formed an acquaintance and an intimacy with Mr. Vail, and it is believed had full access to the draughts, models, &c. left in his hands by Mr. Fitch.

Mr. Livingston about this time was appointed Minister to France, (Mr. Vail resigning or being called home,) and soon after his arrival Mr. Fulton, it is known, was associated with him in the monopoly granted by the Legislature of New York. He returns to America, and, by the united energies and means of the Chancellor and himself, puts in successful operation a steamboat on the Hudson river in 1807. This query naturally arises in the mind: was Mr. Fulton benefited by the use and examination of Mr. Fitch's models, draughts, and plans? I leave it to the friends of this bill to furnish a reply, as I am as unwilling as they possibly can be, that one leaf should be torn from the wreath that fame has entwined around his memory.

We see Mr. Fulton in the possession of a steamboat on the Hudson, invested, as an associate of Mr. Livingston, with exclusive privileges for navigating the waters of New York from that time to the full expiration of twenty years, with an additional benefit of five years more for every boat that he should construct and put upon the waters of the Hudson, provided the whole time of extension did not exceed thirty years.

Some two or three years subsequently, Mr. Fulton obtained from the United States Government a patent for this discovery of or invention of applying steam to the propelling of boats, with the exclusive right to the use and benefit of said discovery and patent for the term of fourteen years.

We now must throw into the rubbish of time the names and discoveries of Blasco de Garay, Jonathan Hulls, Mr. Watt, Mr. Symington, Oliver Evans, Mr. Fitch, Rumsey, and Livingston, to bestow on Mr. Fulton the name, reputation, and glory, of having discovered the application of steam to the propelling of boats.

And now in possession of a patent for the same, (the undoubted evidence of his invention,) together with all the pecuniary emoluments growing out of the vast monopoly granted to him, (truly vast in a pecuniary point of view,) but all of which which were small, compared with the transcendent glory affixed to his name, and the grateful remembrance that is indelibly impressed upon the hearts of his countrymen, which alone can be lost or eradicated when the steam palaces cease to defy the torrent, and subdue the current of the broad and mighty rivers on which they daily ride in majesty.

Far be it for me to say or do any thing that would for a moment deface or impair these proud recollections. True it is, in gleaning the history of his claim to the honors so profusely lavished upon him, which my situation here compelled me to do, regardless of smiles or frowns, or the praises which have been sung to the memory of Mr. Fulton, I have done no more than my duty.

I know, sir, I shall be taxed with hardihood for having the temerity, as some may be pleased to term it, and ingratitude, to attempt to set up my judgment against a torrent of public feeling that flows throughout the Union in favor of Mr. Fulton,

* The history of Mr. Evans's progress and experiments in the construction of engines, and the application of steam thereto, is highly interesting, which will be found in "Hebert's Steam Engine," page 141, and from page 296 to 306 inclusive.

But, sir, whatever effect this exposition of historical and well-authenticated facts may have in disabusing the public mind, I cannot hold myself accountable. I am no author; I did not make these large books which I now hold up to your view, and in which I have found all the information which I have this day presented before this House in relation to the steam engine.

I am aware, sir, that, had I not done so on this occasion, some other opportunity would have occurred, and some other individual—perhaps with less grateful regard than what I possess for the fame of Mr. Fulton—would have presented them to your consideration, and laid them before the American people. Still they exist, they constitute a part of the true history of the great agent, steam—the steamboat and the steam engine.

But, supposing that they are all untrue, that the record is false, and the whole narration the result and offspring of conspiracy, entered into and existing two hundred years before Mr. Fulton was born, and carried on with all the malignity, jealousy, bitterness, and injustice, with which conspiracies are generally characterized and conducted, to deprive him of his merited name and fame up to the time that he set in motion his boat on the Hudson, to the great advancement of navigation, the prosperity of his country, and the universal happiness of mankind. Supposing these historical facts are the results of such a conspiracy, and they should become generally believed, to the prejudice of his memory, still there is enough left to secure him a nation's everlasting gratitude for his improvement of the machinery by which the power of steam is usefully and beneficially, and I may with truth add invaluably, applied to the propelling of boats. The honor of being successful in its application to boats is his; he is entitled to all the glory that can redound from that improvement, and no conspiracy, principality, or power, on the face of the earth, can deprive him of t.

But, sir, setting aside these historical facts as untrue, and as unworthy of a place in history, or of our belief, and admiting Mr. Fulton to be the author and inventor of the first application of steam to boats, or giving him the credit that is really due to him, and which no person will attempt to wrest from him, I mean THE IMPROVEMENT OF THE STEAM ENGINE, how stands the matter so far as it regards this claim?

That Mr. Fulton has done much for the good of his country must be, and is, freely admitted. What has been his compensation? I am not prepared at present to say that it has been what it ought to have been. But, should it be found, and could it be made to appear, clearly and indisputably, that it fell short of his merits, and of the legal obligations of the United States to him, I will be the first and foremost person in this House in according to those who are entitled to the benefits of whatever may be so found due to him, the uttermost farthing thereof. Yes, sir, my vote shall be for the most liberal sum, but not till I am first convinced that there is a legal claim. Then, and not until then, will I vote an appropriation, for I am firm in my belief that we have no constitutional power to do it.

Mr. Fulton reaped incalculable benefits from the exclusive monopoly which he enjoyed for many years on the waters of New York, and also from his patent right for fourteen years. Sir, I am unable to present to the House an estimate, in dollars and cents, of the real intrinsic value of the privileges, anti-republican as they were, granted to Mr. Fulton; I can only say that he and his assignees did enjoy a lucrative income, for very many years, by the enjoyment of steam navigation upon the Hudson, by the sale of patent rights, and other sources, and, above all, by the sale of stock in his monopoly. The monopoly was obnoxious, and from the fact that, whatever fare cupidity and avarice pleased to demand, could be exacted from the wayfaring man and the traveller, impositions were practised for many years with a heavy or light hand, even as Mr. Fulton and his associates saw proper to lay on the public. The law securing to him these privileges on the Hudson, I am told, was carried into execution to the utmost extent of its letter, during the whole time of its existence, either by Fulton or his assigns, and that the price of a passage from New York to Albany was seven dollars!! and his boats were thronged with passengers; whereas, immediately after the expiration of the monopoly, the fare fell to two or three dollars, and has been as low as fifty cents.

I may be told that this monopoly, and the profits arising from it, were intercepted and diminished by the suit in the United States Courts; not so. True, there was a decision in favor of the United States, and unfavorable to the full extent of Fulton's claims; but they were no further affected than the General Government revenue was concerned; and, above all, did not affect Mr. Fulton's heirs at the latter portion of its being, because, some time before he died, Mr. Fulton sold out his right, title, and interest to Mr. John R. Livingston, who assigned his interest to the North River Steamboat Company, and the stock held by the heirs of Fulton in that company was sold for an enormous advance prior to the decision of the Supreme Court of the United States.

The Government appropriated five thousand dollars which was paid into the hands of Mr. Fulton for the purpose of making experiments for the defence of our coasts and harbors by means of torpedoes. These torpedoes were submarine machines intended for blowing up ships of war, and at the time when these experiments were in progress, were subjects of ridicule throughout the Union, and civilized Europe, and were what Napoleon Bonaparte pronounced "a system of quackery, and Fulton an impostor." What portion of the five thousand dollars he received, was expended in the experiments, we are not informed; but the fair, reasonable, and just presumption is, that he took care of himself, and make the most of the speculation upon Government, the game being entirely in his own hands.

The Government entered into an agreement with Mr. Fulton to build certain steamboats on the Western waters, by which agreement he received $40,000. Here Mr. DUNCAN requested the Clerk to read a copy of the contract, which is as follows:

Memorandum of an agreement entered into this twenty-seventh day of December, in the year eighteen hundred and fourteen, between the honorable James Monroe, Secretary at War for the United States of America, of the first part, and Robert Fulton, of the city of New York, in behalf of himself and the owners of the Vesuvius, the Etna, and the New Orleans and Natchez steamboats, trading and intended to trade on the river Mississippi, and the Buffalo steamboat, intended to trade on the Ohio river, of the second part.

Whereas it is the interest of the United States that the said steamboats should be put into operation with all possible despatch for the purpose of transporting troops and the munitions of war on said rivers, it is hereby agreed by the party of the first part to immediately advance out of the Treasury of the United States, and on account of the United States, to the said party of the second part, forty thousand dollars in Treasury notes, for the purpose of completing and bringing into operation said steamboats, and on the following conditions:

That during the present war with Great Britain and theese United States, and until said forty thousand dollars shall be repaid or satisfied to the United States by the passage of troops or freight in said steamboats, or in the money circulating medium of the United States, all officers and troops finding their own provisions and bedding shall be transported in the steamboats from Louisville to New Orleans down the stream for ten dollars each, and from New Orleans to Louisville up the stream for twenty dollars each: in all cases of shorter distances each person shall be transported for one cent a mile down the stream and two cents a mile up the stream. All ordnances, military stores and munitions of war belonging to the United States which can be conveyed in steamboats, and of which the captain shall be the judge, shall be transported down the stream from Louisville to New Orleans at the rate of one dollar per ton for one hundred miles, or up the stream at the rate of three dollars a ton for each hundred miles. In the Buffalo steamboat on the Ohio river, officers and men finding their own provisions and bedding shall be conveyed down the river from Pittsburg to Louisville for four dollars each, or up the stream the same distance for eight dollars each, and in like proportions for shorter distances; military stores, provisions and munitions of war shall be conveyed down the stream from Pittsburg to Louisville for fifty cents per hundredweight, and up the stream the same distance for one dollar and fifty cents the hundredweight, and in like proportions for shorter distances; and if within five years from this date the said sum of forty thousand dollars shall not have been earned and compensated to the Government of the United States by the passage of troops and transport of munitions of war as aforesaid, the whole or any deficiency of said forty thousand dollars not satisfied as aforesaid shall be paid by the said Robert Fulton, and the stockholders in said boats, to the Government of the United States.

ROBERT FULTON.

In the 16th line of the 2d page the word "earned," written on an erasure.

Signed, sealed, and delivered in presence of L. A. RIGAIL witness to R. Fulton's signature.

Sir, we learn from the agreement that its date was December 27, 1814, which was a short time previous to the conclusion of the war; and that Mr. Fulton received thereby forty thousand dollars. There was no boat fitted up in compliance with the contract but the Vesuvius, nor were any of the conditions stipulated in consideration of the forty thousand dollars advanced performed. I mean, by the transportation of troops and munitions of war; or, at most, there is no claim, or title to a claim, for services rendered, presented, except an account presented to an investigating committee by Mr. Hagner, which no one will vouch to be correct. Nor was there one dollar of this money ever returned to the United States, as it should have been, according to the condition of the agreement just read.

I have, sir, thus presented you with a view of the benefits Mr. Fulton received for his invention, his improvements, and his practical services to his country, with the exception of his superintendence of the construction of the steam frigate, which I shall notice hereafter.

I will next exhibit the account upon which the committee rely to make up the sum of $100,000, which they report to be due to the heirs of Robert Fulton:

Government of the United States in account.	Dr.
1810. To money expended by Robert Fulton, in making experiments for coast and harbor defence, by means of torpedoes - -	$5,000
Services in making experiments in the same - - -	5,000
1815. Damages for the detention of the steamboat Vesuvius from 30th December, 1814, to 12th March, 1815, at $600 per day - -	50,000
The use of Mr. Fulton's patent right for constructing steam frigates - - - -	60,000
Services as superintendent in building a steam frigate at New York	25,000

Cr.
By cash advanced for making experiments for coast and harbor defence by torpedoes - -	$5,000
By cash advanced on contract to fit out steamboats, as per contract -	40,000
	45,000
Balance due heirs of Robert Fulton -	$100,000

Now, sir, speaking professionally, let us dissect this account, and ascertain how far each item will stand the test of scrutiny.

First, as to the five thousand dollars for which the United States is charged for money expended by Mr. Fulton in making experiments, etc. Sir, this small item must have emanated from the goodness of the hearts of the committee, for I defy them to show the least word, or syllable of proof, of a claim upon which to predicate it. On the contrary, I deny that the whole of the five thousand dollars, appropriated by the Government for this most ridiculous and foolish experiment, was ever expended by Mr. Fulton for that purpose. I have no disposition or wish to intimate that Mr. Fulton used the money for any other purpose than that for which it was appropriated, but I have charity enough for him to think he had a sufficient quantity of the sum of saving-knowledge to take care of himself; I am, therefore, willing to admit the services rendered in attempting to bring the torpedoes into the aid of our national defence as an offset against the five thousand dollars which the Government advanced, and for the credit of the intelligence of the United States Government I must insist that here the compromise be made, and this claim put at rest forever.

Fifty thousand dollars damages for the use of the steamboat Vesuvius, or for her detention from the 30th December, 1814, to 12th March, 1815, at six hundred dollars per day!!!

Well, sir, let us examine this item, as well as the circumstances attending it, and which, in the opinion of the committee, gave rise to it. It is alleged that General Jackson ordered the steamboat Vesuvius into the service of the United States on the day on which the battle of New Orleans took place, or about that time, perhaps a day or two before, and that while in the service of the Government she was run aground, where she remained from the 30th December until the 13th of March following.

General Jackson has been called on, officially, to state the facts in this affair as they occurred. In his answer, he denies that he has any knowledge of her ever being in the service of the Government, and that it was rumored at the time that she was run aground by order of the master, to prevent her from falling into the hands of the enemy. I know not how that might be, but I am inclined to think that if the steamboat Vesuvius was of the value of six hundred dollars per day to either the company to which she belonged, or the United States, in whose employ she was alleged to have been pressed, General Jackson, who was ever wide awake to the welfare of the country, and every interest connected with his duty, would have known something tangible and definite about these services; particularly so, as she was pressed into service by his order.

There is proof on record that the Vesuvius was ordered to hold herself in readiness for service, and to consider herself in the employ of the Government. But where is the proof that can be relied on that she ever went into actual service? But we will agree that she went into actual service: may it not be true that she was run aground to save her from being captured by the enemy, or, if not done designedly, might it not have been the result of carelessness?

It seems to me, when so large a claim is made as $50,000, (as in this case) there should be ample proof in its support. In the first place, that the steamboat Vesuvius was actually in the service of the Government against whom the demand for compensation was made; that she was run aground while in such service, not designedly; and that it was not the result of carelessness. All of these positions would have to be proven in a court of justice, before any damages could be, by any possibility, recovered, and the more so, as the officers who commanded the boat while she is said to have been in the use of Government were the same that were in the pay of her owners, and their malfeasance, misfeasance, or nonfeasance, was properly at the risk of the owners, the Government being responsible for nothing but a liberal compensation for the use of the boat, and for all losses and damages, either from war or unavoidable accidents. There is no proof of this nature to be relied upon. The committee have furnished none, nor have they any to furnish.

Again, admitting that the Vesuvius was in the service of the Government, and that in executing the orders given she was run aground by accident, is not six hundred dollars per diem a most extravagant and unwarrantable charge. Six hundred dollars a day for the use of her the time she was out of the power of being used! for the time she was fast ashore! aground!! Preposterous absurdity! for it must be remembered that during all the time charged she was no expense to her owners for running, and various other necessaries. Besides, they were not at the expense of paying officers and crew if the boat was actually aground. They were not furnishing her with wood and stores—there was nothing out of use, save the capital invested in the construction of the boat and machinery, and which I hesitate not to aver did not cost $20,000. And if it be true, as I have been informed, that the Vesuvius was no more nor less than a barge converted into a steamboat, she was not worth the estimate mentioned. Upon this I do not place much reliance, for it may be erroneous, and a mistake.

Putting her at the fullest value, the damages which the committee have reported to be allowed for her detention will amount to four or five times her value in one year; and yet we are very gravely told that her services to her owners would have proved far more valuable than the estimate made by the committee.

I should consider that a very uncertain data to go by. She was equally liable to run aground in the use of her owners as she was in that of the United States, and as liable to any and every other species of accident that is common to steamboats. I will conclude my objections to this item by stating that with no other proof than we have for its support, a court of justice would scout it out of its presence, and impose a bill of costs upon him who introduced it; and with the best proof of the facts that would be necessary for its support, there is no court of justice that would give a judgment for one-tenth part of the amount claimed in this bill, so far as this item goes.

The next item that presents itself to our attention is the small sum of $60,000 for the use of Mr. Fulton's patent-right for constructing steam frigates. This is a very extraordinary proposition. We have had but one steam frigate, and, from the documents on file in the Navy Department, it will appear to have been rather a hard bargain for Uncle Sam. She cost the Government something like two or three hundred thousand dollars. It was an experiment not unlike the torpedoes! And I think Government by this time has had enough of both. She will about as soon engage again in the construction of the one as the other. For the use of a patent-right to build a steam frigate, give $60,000! Sir, there is no such thing in existence as a patent-right for constructing steam frigates. The duration of the one granted has long since expired, the right has ceased, and is at an end, and now reposes with the United States steam frigate Fulton the first, that was blown into atoms at Brooklyn a few years ago as a thing that never was, and I hope in God never will be again.

The next small item is the sum of $25,000! as compensation for superintending the building of a steam frigate at New York. These services consisted is merely superintending; there was neither sweat, toil, or money expended by Mr. Fulton; the nature of Mr. Fulton's superintendence consisted in occasionally calling and giving some general directions; and I am told that, from the time the first foundation block was laid for the steam frigate in question, until the time she was launched, did not exceed four months, when the necessity of Mr. Fulton's care and attention principally ceased. It would seem that $25,000 for four months' services, or even ten times that time, is rather more than a conscientious man can sustain by oath to be equitably due.

Why, sir, a Western man enters his father's fields, or the dense forests, at the age of twenty-one years, and if, by hard toil, at the age of threescore, he has laid up five or ten thousand dollars, to secure him a home, and sustain him in the evening of his life without labor, he has done well; he is regarded by his neighbors and all who know him as having been an industrious, saving, and economical man. This view of individual Western prosperity may, in general, be regarded as correct; yet there are some exceptions; some fortunes have been made in the course of a few years of successful trade; others have been made by the rise of land, as the country, or some favored portions thereof, have become improved. To tell a Western man that that that is a fair equivalent for five months' superintendence in any capacity, which entitles the individual to the sum of twenty-five thousand dollars, is to tell him something you cannot make him understand, more particularly when he learns that the money, or a proportionate part of it, must come out of his own pocket, and be part of the result of his toil. But, sir, Mr. Fulton volunteered to render the services here charged, and, however valuable they may have been, this precludes us from appropriating any money out of the Treasury for them now, as he is no more. Congress might have more generously rewarded Mr. Fulton for his virtues, but certainly the spirit of our Government and our institutions is against rewarding the heir for the virtues of the ancestor. The heir in our country loses all claim to Government reward at the decease of his ancestor, except if it be by virtue of a contract and a just consideration. The vast appropriation made to Lafayette for his services in the Revolutionary war has been referred to in the course of this discussion, and the affluent circumstances of his heirs were contrasted with the limited circumstances of the heirs of Fulton. Congress donated to Lafayette what they supposed his services were really worth to the country during the Revolutionary war. They paid him principal and interest, and I am not sure that he was paid a farthing over and above what his services and his expenses entitled him to. The rewards of his toil and patriotism have descended to his children, and long may they live to enjoy them. And, whenever it is made apparent that the Government is indebted to the heirs of Fulton for legal obligations not liquidated with their ancestor, Congress will appropriate every dollar that shall be found due; but on no other principle has Congress the power to appropriate one dollar.

I think, Mr. Speaker, I have shown that there is no foundation for any part of the $100,000 reported in the bill in question. Every item of which the bill is composed, seems to me to be not only extravagant in the extreme, but wholly unfounded. Sir, I have no more doubt of the fact that Robert Fulton died indebted to the Government to the amount of $40,000, than that I am now addressing you, viz: the whole sum advanced by the Government for the purposes set out in the contract which has been read; no part of the services having been performed, nor was one dollar of the money returned to the Government, according to the conditions of the contract, in the event of the services not being performed. But, to the end that this groundless application may here have a termination, and that a stop may forever be put to this dispute, I will propose to the committee to withdraw their claim. To use a western phrase, I, for one, will agree to jump accounts with the estate of Mr. Fulton, and burn books; or, if it will satisfy the committee better, I will agree that, as the representatives of Fulton, they shall have credit for the sum of $20,000 of the money advanced by the Government as an offset against the pretended detention and damages of the Vesuvius, which I suspect is more than her value, when she was alleged to have beed pressed into the service of the Government. I will next agree that $25,000 shall go to the liquidation of Mr. Fulton's voluntary services for superintending the construction of the steam frigate at New York, which I trust will be satisfactory to the committee, this being the sum asked; and of the $40,000 advanced, we have left $5,000. This sum I am willing shall go for the additional sum of that amount asked for his services in the experiments of torpedoes. These propositions are undoubtedly liberal to a fault. The committee surely can ask, in justice or liberality, nothing more. This disposes of all their claims, except the ridiculous suggestion (with due deference be it said) that the Government purchase the patent-right for constructing steam frigates. This, I hope, they will not seriously insist upon, for the honor of the character, reputation, and intelligence of the American Government.

Great efforts have been used in this discussion to impress us with a knowledge or belief of the great virtues of Mr. Fulton, and the obligations we are under to reward his heirs for these virtues. Gentlemen forget the republican maxim that "my ancestors' virtues are not mine." Every individual in our Government, so far as virtue is concerned, stands upon his own footing and merits. We have no privileged orders here. The nature of our Government, and all our free institutions, are against them. And it is that equality of rights that constitutes a free Government. It is as absolutely indispensable that this maxim should be maintained in its original simplicity and purity, to the support of our free institutions and equal rights, as that the laws of primogeniture in England should be maintained to the support of an aristocracy.

A word more as to the claim for fifty thousand dollars, this being the only item in the bill that seems to have the least foundation in truth or justice; and to name it as the grounds of a claim is but little short of an insult to the understanding. I must be permitted to make a remark or two more in relation to it. We will agree, for a moment, to the rule which the friends of this bill have insisted upon as just to establish the value of the use of the steamboat, viz: the sum per day to make up the aggregate amount of $50,000. This sum per day is $600. Will any man, disposed to think correctly on this claim, doubt for a moment that the exclusive privilege of navigating all the waters within the jurisdiction of New York is not worth as much, for any given time, as was the use of the single boat Vesuvius for the same time on the Mississippi river? I think this will not be disputed. The monopoly was worth as much for one day, or any given time, as was the Vesuvius for one day, or the same time. I present the subject in this view, to ascertain, as near as possible, (and that, too, by the rule of justice the committee and friends of the bill have given us,) what compensation Mr. Fulton has received for his improvements in steam engine machinery, so far as the value of the monopoly can be known. The monopoly was enjoyed for near twenty-four years, or about 8,760 days, which, at $600 per day, will be upwards of $5,000,000, which Mr. Fulton has received from his invention by the exclusive privilege alone of navigating the waters of New York. I have no idea that he received this sum, but the estimate is made by the same rule that his friends rely upon to claim from the Government $50,000 for the use of the Vesuvius; and if it is a just rule in the one case, it must be just in the other. Taking this rule for our guide, pecuniary matters between the estate of Robert Fulton and the Government of the United States and the Government of New York, or the people of both, stand as follows:

Robert Fulton in account for monopoly of the navigation of the waters within the jurisdiction of New York twenty-four years -	$5,000,000
Cash advanced by Government to put four steamboats on the Mississippi and Ohio rivers - - -	40,000
Cash advanced to make experiments in torpedoes, which failed - -	5,000
	$5,045,000

I have not taken the usual bonus into the calculation that other patentees receive, which is all the framers of the Constitution, it seems, contemplated the patentee should have by law. I mean the exclusive use and benefit of his discoveries, and patent for fourteen years. The account, by this estimate, will exhibit Robert Fulton to have received five millions and forty-five thousand dollars to offset this account. The estate of Mr. Fulton has no claims that can be recognised as legitimate by this Congress or any court of justice in these United States, to offset this account. True, his memory has a claim of gratitude upon the American people that perhaps never can be cancelled; but the claim of gratitude to the memory of Fulton gives no claim to his heirs for an appropriation of money by this Congress.

Congress might (as is said in the case of Lafayette they did) have appropriated money for the benefits the American people derived from Mr. Fulton's discoveries, and gratitude might have induced them, with constitutional propriety, to have enlarged the sum. But no such appropriation can be made to his heirs for their ancestor's virtues, and not theirs. If any appropriation is made to them, it must be made by a claim founded in law and the Constitution, in the form of a contract, either expressed or implied, and no such claim exists, nor can any such claim be supported; it is an insult to the understanding of any man to insist seriously upon such a thing; and so conscious are the friends of this bill of this fact, that they scarcely attempt to insist, in argument, upon such claim. Their efforts to support it consist in eloquent appeals to our sympathies; our patriotism is called upon, and our humanity is invoked, and loud calls are made upon our liberality.

Sir, I hope the friends of this bill do not arrogate to themselves all the humanity, sympathy, and patriotism. When I hear gentlemen talk so much, so loud, and so long about patriotism, sympathy, charity, and humanity, I like to see some of it. I like to see gentlemen "down with the dust;" perhaps, when it comes to personal liberality, that is, measuring our own charity and liberality by our own purses, those opposed to this bill may be found quite as liberal and quite as humane and quite as patriotic as those who talk so much about it. Let no man tell me, sir, that he can outdo me in liberality on other people's means. It is easy for gentlemen to talk loud, long, and eloquently about liberality, and carry into effect their good feeling, when they have nothing to do to carry out their noble natures but open the National Treasury, and appropriate the contents thereof, for which, in all probability, many of them never toiled or sweat.

Here let me ask the friends of this bill, lest I should forget it, while they are singing hosannas to Mr. Fulton's patriotism for nobly sacrificing his time in the experiments of the torpedoes! whether he had not been to Europe manifesting his patriotism by trying to convince some of the Kings of the utility and importance of his plan, to the end that he might receive a pecuniary reward for his discovery? and whether it was not when thus displaying his patriotism for the benefit of the national defence of France, that his plans were pronounced by Bonaparte "a system of quackery, and he an impostor?" As a further evidence of his patriotism, I will ask the friends of this bill to deny that he afterwards offered to England, or any other European power, for their national defence, the benefits of his discovery and patent for torpedoes and sub-marine engines of destruction.

I hope, for the honor of the memory of the man whose services I esteem, that the friends of this bill who arrogate to themselves the right to eulogise him and sustain this claim, will be able to answer this question in the negative.

Sir, I hope to be indulged while I attempt to respond to some of the arguments of gentlemen. And first, that most relied upon, if it can be called an argument, is, that we are bound to pass this appropriation, in consequence of the great advantages the country has derived from the inventions of Robert Fulton; that it is due to his memory and his services, and consequently his heirs have a claim upon our gratitude. Sir, open the door once for claims of this character, and where will you stop? And I make the inquiry in relation to appropriations for other discoveries than that of the power and utility of steam and steamboats. Will the inventors of valuable improvements ever cease to knock at the door of your legislative halls, and will you discriminate between those that are meritorious in an eminent degree, and those that may be a little less so?

To judge of the importance and merits of discoveries by the cost and complication of machinery involved, like that of the steam engine, is not a correct criterion, for some of the discoveries we enjoy, involving the least complication and greatest simplicity of machinery, are of the greatest public and private utility. For instance, what comparison is there between the real utility of the plough and the steam engine? Small, and humble, and simple as is the mechanism of the former, it has done more to ameliorate the condition of mankind, and add to the wealth of our country, in one century, than will the steam engine for a millennium.

We have now no less than three patentees applicants for Government patronage, for what they think great and valuable improvements in the application of steam, viz: to prevent the explosion of steam boilers, (a very humane object.) How many other applications there are for Government patronage for improvements, I know not; but so long as Congress will entertain applications of this nature in the character of claims, so long will your halls be crowded with applicants, and your National Treasury be bankrupt. But dangerous as may be the practice of entertaining applications for appropriations for discoveries, where the value of the discoveries are in some degree the subjects of ocular demonstration, there is not half the danger that there is in applications that have for their foundation our sympathies, our humanity, and our charity! The former may be reduced to something like mathematical certainty, but the latter rides upon the affections, the sympathies, and goodness of the heart, without even personal pecuniary responsibility to regulate the head.

There are many valuable discoveries, and many highly important improvements upon those discoveries, whose vast and immeasurable public utility furnish them with as strong arguments in favor of Government patronage as the steam engine improvements of Mr. Fulton. But, if you had the financial ability to patronize all of them, there is one grand objection to doing it, which has its foundation in the nature of our free institutions: I mean that principle that secures equal rights and equality of property to all.

One individual may have a genius for painting, another for music; one for invention, another for carrying it into practical effect and public utility; one for general literary and scientific acquirements, and another for plain, common labor, and industry. All these may be physically and mentally constructed for the various pursuits that their inclinations lead them to follow, and for which their talents fit them, and yet all be equally useful to society. I ask, where is the justice of taxing all the rest for the benefit of any one of these, or one of these for the benefit of all the rest? I ask, what feature of our Constitution warrants the act that appropriates to a favored individual a princely fortune out of the honest proceeds of the working and industrious many, to gratify what gentlemen please to call honorable humanity, sympathy, and patriotism?

Establish and pursue a policy of this kind, and how long will it be before we will behold the spectacle of a population made up of a few enjoying princely fortunes obtained by your legislative bounty, the result of your humanity! and of the many in squalid wretchedness and degraded dependence, and hourly made so by you and your humanity and your legislative bounty!

But to respond to some of the arguments in favor of this bill. The gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. CHAMBERS] tells us, in substance, that Congress made an appropriation to an individual of $20.000 for a new, and, as it was supposed, an improved method of pointing cannon for the destruction of an enemy: therefore, this bill ought to pass. He also said there had been a bill introduced, and was now on our tables, asking for an appropriation of $10,000 for the perpetual use of an improved steam vapor bath in the navy and army of the United States: therefore, this bill ought to pass, or such was his inference.

The appropriation here referred to, of $20,000, may or may not have been right. The appropriation of $10,000, as referred to, and asked for in the bill on your table, may be right, or it may be wrong; that is a matter yet to be decided. But, right or wrong, they can have no bearing upon this bill. If they are wrong, that does not make the appropriation here asked for right; and, if right, they afford no reason why this should be wrong. They stand upon their own merits. I hope this bill will be compelled to stand on its own merits.

The gentleman informs us that it was by the influence of the steamboat Vesuvius that the glorious battle of New Orleans was gained, that saved and secured to that beautiful and rich city its beauty and booty. I think the gentleman does great injustice, if not to Old Hickory, at least to the brave riflemen of his own State. The Hero of New Orleans is a name as well known throughout the world as that of General Andrew Jackson; indeed, they are synonymous. But as I am inclined to think it unpleasant to the gentleman to associate any thing good and brave with the name of that distinguished individual, I will leave it out of the question; so far as he was connected with that glorious and imperishable victory, which claims one-third of the bright page of history that records the ever memorable battles of Marathon and Thermopylæ. But I cannot consent to tear thus rudely from the brow of the brave and gallant Kentucky, Mississippi, and Tennessee riflemen, the never-fading laurels that they so justly and meritoriously gained upon the plains of New Orleans, on the glorious eighth of January, and bestow them, either on the steamboat Vesuvius, or merge them in an appropriation of $100,000 to the relief of the owners of the Vesuvius. So very inconsiderable was this steamboat in that vast and splendid transaction, that the Commanding General was not aware that she was known in the transaction; nor is there a positive statement, accompanied with the solemnity of an oath, that any other person knew her to be.

Sir, the glorious events of that battle, and the brave riflemen who gained it, have been the theme of song in the Mississippi Valley from that day to this. Some have represented the brave Kentucky riflemen as "possessing the powers of the horse, with the ability, on the approach of the enemy, to kick them out of the country"—others have compared them to "alligators, ready to snap off their heads"—others to a "steamboat ready to burst her boiler, and blow them to atoms"—and others to a "Mississippi snag against which they might run to their own destruction."

All these comparisons are only significant of the superior bravery, power, and chivalric patriotism of those who defended New Orleans in her beauty and booty, and their common country in their national and blood-purchased rights. But the gentleman is willing, for the time being, to strip them of all their laurels, and barter them off for the paltry consideration of $100,000, (paltry, I say, when compared with patriotism and love of country,) for the benefit of those whom it is not contended have ever served their country: I mean the heirs of Mr. Fulton. The same gentleman asks what consideration would induce us to give up the use and power of steam as applied to boats? I ask, what would induce us to give up the use of the plough, the cotton gin, the printing press, and the five hundred or more other improvements that serve to ameliorate our condition and diminish our labor? It is, sir, a sufficient answer to these questions to ask, what obligations are we under to give them up, or re-purchase them, when it is well known that the discoverers have long since received the last farthing that was expressly or impliedly promised them by the laws and the Constitution under whose protection they have enjoyed the benefits of their discoveries. Our Constitution holds out inducements to those who have an inventive genius, by securing to them, for a limited time, the exclusive use or benefit of their improvements, at the expiration of which their improvements become the property of the public, in return for the security given to the invention by the laws and the Constitution. Now, the advantages of the application of steam to all kinds of machinery are the property of the public, and we are under no obligation either to give them up, or to re-purchase them at the extravagant rate of $100,000. All the arguments advanced in support of the appropriation are lawyer-like—they are lapsided—they are like a jug, the handle is on one side.

The gentleman from New York [Mr. HOFFMAN] gave us an eloquent and glowing description of the improvements of our country. We are pointed to the craggy mountains that have been traversed, the hordes of savages that have been subdued, the forests that have been cleared, the wide and fertile plains of the West that have been made to teem with plenty and bloom in beauty, the splendid canals that have been excavated, the broad rivers that have been bridged, the magnificent turnpike roads that link together this Union in happy and inseparable bonds, and to the ocean that is whitened with the canvass of your commerce; and attributes all this to the agency, influence, and power, of steam.

The gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. LEGARE,] at one flourish of the rhetorical trumpet, placed us on the tip top of the highest pinnacle of the Alleghany mountains, and pointed us to the broad rivers, rich valleys, splendid cities, flourishing towns, and lovely villages, teeming with commerce, agriculture, and wealth, and happiness, and pronounces it all the work of steam and Mr. Fulton's discoveries. But the gentleman from New York [Mr. MCCLELLAN] goes a little farther, and not only gives all the credit to the agency of steam, and the inventions of Mr. Fulton, given by the former gentleman, but represents the West as having been populated by steam. Mr. D. thought this was going a little too far.

[Here Mr. D. made some remarks in a low tone of voice, to the amusement and diversion of those around him, but which were not heard by the reporter.]

He was willing that gentlemen might indulge in their figures of fancy and eulogy, so that the greater laws and designs of Nature were not broken in upon, to the entire destruction of the highest of human enjoyments. But he thought gentlemen talked about the West and her advancements with but limited practical knowledge of both. That the improvements of steam machinery and steamboats had done much for the West, no one would deny; but the mountains had been traversed, the savages had been tamed, the forests had been subdued, cities had been erected, towns were flourishing, commerce and agriculture were in prosperous progress, government, churches and manufactories were established in the West, before ever a steamboat rode upon the broad bosom of the Western waters. Sir, the Western country has been made by the toil and sweat of the pioneers and their descendants, and not by steam. Steam has been but an auxiliary to the industry of the West, and the perseverance of the first settlers and their hardy sons.

Gentlemen seem to have a faculty of applying the same argument to all purposes and objects. Sir, it is very convenient to have one argument possessing such gum-elastic elasticity that it can be stretched to cover all purposes and propositions that are wished to be successful.

When at the extra session the famous Sub-Treasury bill was under discussion, two of these gentlemen [Mr. HOFFMAN and Mr. LEGARE,] presented us, in their eloquent and captivating speeches, made to defeat that bill, with the same arguments they now use to sustain the claim of $100,000 in favor of the heirs of Fulton. Then banks and the credit system made the Westrn country, and produced all the vast improvements now described, which give power and happiness to this people at home, and character and reputation abroad; but now this magic and these wonders are produced by steam.

The Sub-Treasury bill will be before us in a few days; what will gentlemen do for arguments against it? They have stripped the banks and the credit system of all the honor and power that they alleged to have produced this happy and flourishing prosperity peculiar to our country, and have bestowed them upon the steam system.

I suppose, when the Sub-Treasury bill comes up, gentlemen will unite the glories and the benefits of the banking system with the power of steam, and its national utility, to prostrate the bill. Powerful agents, to be sure. Should gentlemen use this coalition, I will ask them, respectfully, to unite one other agency—it will be at least due to the hard-handed mechanic and agriculturist of the West. I mean the united agency of toil and sweat. They will then have a triplicate argument; and if the latter will be found not quite so convenient for banking purposes, or to prostrate the Sub-Treasury scheme, they will at least, have the conscientious reflection that they will have presented the true and just clause of Western wealth and Western prosperity. When the gentlemen were singing praises to the banks, and setting forth in glowing terms the prosperity, happiness, and wealth they secured to the country, they neglected to tell us of the hundreds of fortunes that were dissipated; the thousands of honest and industrious individuals that were reduced to squalid wretchedness; the periodical pecuniary calamities that rolled over the country like a pestilence, sweeping and blasting every public and private prosperity before them, and prostrating every moral and social principle with the general wreck, that distinguishes the noble nature of man! I say, that they neglected to tell us of these baleful effects, which are periodically the natural and inevitable results of the banking system. And now, when they have changed the venue, when they sing with the other side of their face a different tune, and shout hosannahs to the power of steam, steamboats, and the inventions of Fulton—all that is noble, happy, glorious, magnificent, and grand is exclusively attributed to steam and its powers for the present, to the entire exclusion of banks and the whole credit system—they fail to give us the whole history; they neglect to name to us the fact that scarcely a public newspaper crosses our observation without presenting us the account of some awful and melancholy steamboat explosion; they neglect to tell us of the tens of thousands of human lives that have been lost, and the millions of dollars worth of property that have been sunk to the bottom of every navigable stream in the United States, by the agency of steam. No, sir, these disclosures would not answer their purposes in neither one case nor the other—but, lawyer like, they are kept on the dark and silent side.

The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. BIDDLE] asks us, in substance, if we can unfeelingly look upon the heirs of Lafayette, basking in the luxury of the saloons of Paris, while the heirs and descendants of our own native Fulton are pining in poverty and want? Sir, I will not now stop to compare the relative services of Lafayette and Robert Fulton. It will answer my purpose for the present to say that had the gallant young stranger not left the blushing vine hills of his native France, the fortunes and the palaces that owned him for their lord and master, the kings that acknowledged him for their youthful associate, and the wife of his bosom, "to crusade for freedom," the soil upon which stands your Capitol, in which we are now deliberating in the capacity of representatives of millions of freemen, might now be under British colonial government, and we, with those we represent, the indirect subjects of his Britannic Majesty, and the political vassals of English aristocracy.

But why does the gentleman take us to the saloons of Paris to display the luxuries of wealth, or into the Fulton family to exhibit the effects of poverty and want? Do we not see around us hundreds every day who are basking in the sunshine of affluence, who never sweat for the salt they consume, and, as far as industry and patriotism are concerned, are drones upon society, while hundreds and thousands of the widows and orphans of the soldiers of the Revolution, by whose blood, property and toil your country was emancipated, are pining in want and poverty? If the gentleman has a profusion of tears, sighs, and sympathy, he can pour them forth on the poor and indigent orphans of those heroic and brave men "who lighted the beacon of rebellion, that unfurled by its blaze the triumphant banner of liberty." They are subjects worthy of his sympathy; and did our Constitution admit of sympathetic bounty, and had our National Treasury facilities to warrant appropriations commensurate with their wants and necessities, we would all unite in raising them into comfort and even affluence; but the Constitution gives us no such power, nor have we the means, had we the constitutional power.

Mr. Speaker, it would be unpardonable in me to have occupied your time and the time of the House for the length of time I have, if I had no other object in view than the abstract purpose of defeating the bill appropriating $100,000 for the relief of the heirs of Robert Fulton, however destitute of justice and unwarrantable that appropriation may be. But, sir, it is due to myself to say, it is the principle I am contending against. The financial interest of our country forms one of the greatest interests. It is, indeed, in a legislative sense, emphatically the great interest. It constitutes one of the first and highest objects of our legislation. It involves principles and effects directly concerned and immediately interwoven with life, liberty, property, and the pursuit of happiness; and upon its judicious management, we may say, in a great degree depend the happiness of the people and the perpetuity of the Government. Equality of rights, equality of property, and equality of liberty, are fundamental principles of our free Government, and watch-words with the sentinels placed by the free suffrages of the people upon the great constitutional ramparts erected by the blood of our ancestors to secure us in all time to come in our civil and political enjoyments, and in the peaceful possession of our property.

I ask, if we are in the habit, as becomes the guardians of the people's rights, of observing with that nicety and scrupulous vigilance the financial interests of the Government, or, in other words, the protection and economical distribution of the people's money?

Vigilance, sleepless vigilance, is necessary on our parts. We are beset at every corner, and in every street and alley, with loafers, agents, and seventh-rate county court lawyers. Every applicant for relief who attends the Capitol, has his ten agents to importune you, and every agent has his ten claims to present; and every claim amounts to from 10,000 to $100,000. Every sympathetic feeling is roused with the tale of woe and poverty; every applicant has a wife and nine small children, and one at the breast; and, over and above John Rogers's number, an aged and tottering father and mother to support, and some cousins. Sir, look at our desks every morning, piled breast-high with fresh claims, dripping from the press, while we are swamped, knee-deep, with those that preceded them the day before; all reported by the Committee of Claims; many of them, I suspect, the offspring of the goodness of their hearts, rather than the clearness of their heads.

The Committee of Claims report $10,000 for the relief of A B; another of $20,000 for the relief of C D; another of $30,000 for the relief of E F; another of $40,000 for the relief of G H, and so on to the end of the alphabet, morning after morning. Why, sir, the honest and hard-working people of these United States believe this Government is out of debt. The word is, that the nation is out of debt. Every State paper that goes forth carries with it the pleasing allegation that the national debt is paid off; every 4th of July orator proclaims, at the top of his voice, that our happy nation is out of debt; that we are the only instance of a great agricultural, commercial, and manufacturing nation in the world that presents an overflowing Treasury, out of debt, etc.

Sir, if all the claims now on our tables, reported by the Committee of Claims, and all that are in the hands of the thousand and one lazy, lounging, lazaroni loafers that beset your Capitol, should receive the reconciled light of the committee's countenance, together with the thousands of others that will crowd through the door that will be opened by the passage of this bill—I say, if all these are to be entertained, or one-half of them have their foundation in justice, this Government is not out of debt, nor will it be with a full century's national prosperity. Sir, had this bill forced its way into this House through any other means or medium than the Committee of Claims, I would say, unhesitatingly, (to use a common phrase,) the accounts upon which it is predicated had been trumped up to give it the appearance of a constitutional claim; for, of all the claims that have ever fallen to my lot to examine, in my individual capacity, in my capacity of representative in the State Legislature, or in the humble part I have taken here in such examinations, I am convinced, and compelled to say, that this claim is the most groundless in its nature, and has the least foundation in equity, law, or justice.

Sir, were I to give my vote for this bill, believing as I do that it has no foundation in equity, law, or justice, I would be guilty of a violation of the Constitution, and, consequently, of that oath I have taken, for which I am responsible to my country, my conscience, and my God. I would, in my opinion, be violently robbing the National Treasury. I would be wringing from the forehead of sweat and the hand of toil the precious results of honest industry, and be bestowing it upon—if not the profligate—those who have no claim to it in law or justice. Sir, how are the principles of that equality of liberty and of property to be maintained as recognised by our Coustitution and our free institutions, while almost the whole course of our legislation consists in arresting from the hand of industry princely fortunes, and bestowing them on a favored few? Sir, permit me to say, in conclusion, that the high regard I entertain for the memory of Fulton, and the value by which I appreciate the national importance of his improvements of the steam engine, make me deeply regret the necessity I have been under to oppose this bill in the manner I have. Lest my motives should be mistaken, and I should be wrongly represented, or incorrectly reported, let me say that I stand ready to do as much for the heirs of Robert Fulton (if they require relief,) as any other individual in my circumstances; and those I have the honor to represent on this floor, I hesitate not to say, will do as much, with as generous and noble a feeling, as any other people. Yes, sir, such I know to be their spirit of liberality; and some of them may be even prepared to censure me for the course I have taken against this appropriation. If so, I can only say in my own defence that I come not here to vote away money out of the National Treasury when our sympathy or humanity may dictate such a vote. I have a better guide for my official conduct. I have the plain, broad highway to travel, I mean the Constitution, and its dictates I must and will follow; and I now give notice to those who are associated with me here, and to those I represent abroad, that while I have a stand on this floor I will never give my vote for the appropriation of one dollar of the public money, either for local purposes, local patriotism, or charitable motives of a personal character, or any other purpose except for the support of the legitimate purposes for which the Federal Government was formed.

If my constituents are disposed to manifest their liberality, (as I know they are on all meritorious applications,) they must distribute their own bounty with their own hands to the extent of their own charitable feelings and their means; for of these they are better judges than I am.

They knew before they elected me, that I was in principle, and by practice, a strict constructionist, and a constitutional limitarian. They must not, now, and I trust will not, expect me to vote away, from charitable or any other motives, the public money, in violation of that Constitution they have required me to take a solemn oath to sustain.

REMARKS OF MR. HOFFMAN, OF N. YORK.

Mr. HOFFMAN said that he felt it to be his duty to call the attention of the House for a few moments to some of the remarks which had been made by various adversaries of the bill now under consideration, and to reply to some of the arguments used by those gentlemen in opposition to it. It was no part of his intention to repeat the arguments contained in the report of the Committee of Claims, a report which had been sustained by the House, in a decision which he believed would be deemed a righteous verdict by any impartial jury in the country; nor would he now advert to the many claims of Fulton upon his own State, or the young and enterprising States of the West. To the immense benefits which his application of steam to the propulsion of boats had conferred upon the Union, he had already called the attention of this House when this bill was first under discussion. By that application, and the facility it afforded to daily intercourse and communion of friendship, he believed that our States were bound together in an indissoluble Union. By it the mighty West had been made what she is, and by its agency her fair cities had started into life and beauty almost at the sound of the woodman's axe. But there had been some objections suggested, to which he did think some reply was necessary.

He would call the attention of the House to the startling item, which had proved the theme of so much discussion and animadversion—that of the detention of the steamboat Vesuvius and the damage done to the same, amounting to $75,000. It was now said that any boat might be obtained to do the same service for that or for a less sum; now, while all the navigable waters of the country are burdened with steam vessels. But if the House will remember the time and the situation of the country when this service was performed; it was a time of war, a period of distress, and of painful anxiety; when even the boldest and most sanguine patriot believed that New Orleans must fall into the hands of the enemy; when no one could have possibly predicted that the exertions of that brave and indomitable soldier who defended that city would prove successful; when in her very streets,

> Were whispering, with white lips, 'the foe! they come! they come!'"

Then all were anxious to save what they might, if not all they would, of their fortunes; and, as he had been told by his friend from Louisiana [Mr. GARLAND,] enormous prices were paid for every kind of conveyance by which property could be transported. It was at such a time as this that this vessel was seized at New Orleans, and impressed into the service of the United States, when such immense profits might have been realized by its proprietor. This was done by the Government rightful and legally, and the Government are therefore bound to compensate the proprietor adequately and liberally. The Government has a right [Mr. HOFFMAN admitted] to take the property of a citizen against his will and without his consent, when absolutely necessary for the public good; but then, when that citizen asked for compensation, the power that seized it must also be exerted liberally to remunerate him for it. This item in the bill is the great stumbling-block in the path of its opponents. But there were others, to which he would not then advert. He, however, could not dismiss the subject without adverting to what had fallen from some of the opponents of the bill, in relation to the part taken by the public press in this matter. It had been said that the press had been enlisted in support of the bill under consideration. Mr. HOFFMAN would ask when it was that the press had taken so decided and warm a stand in favor of the measure? Was it before the vote was taken upon the bill in that body? No. While the subject was under debate the press was silent. It was only after that vote had been taken, and the public believed that that vote was final, that the press came, from the East and West, the North and the South, loaded with rejoicing that tardy justice had been done to the children of a public benefactor.

But how was it with those opposed to the measure? Were not the remarks of the honorable member from New York, [Mr. RUSSELL,] in opposition to the claim, (clear and conclusive as they doubtless were to his own mind, however sophistical they might seem to others,) not only published, but widely circulated during the actual discussion of the bill, and while the question was pending? Mr. HOFFMAN did not mention this in reprehension of that course: the friends of the bill did not fear the effects of discussing it freely and critically.

But (continued Mr. H.) the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. CRAIG] strikes at the very root of the matter. Others have contented themselves with tearing away the branches, and scattering the foliage. His blow is more direct and radical. He denies, boldly, any other credit to the genius of Fulton, as the inventor of steam navigation, than that he was the child of good luck; that good luck is the parent of all that we admire in science or in arms. If this be so, why then, indeed, what a bubble is reputation! How vain and how idle are the anxious days and sleepless nights devoted to the service of your country! By this argument you would (said Mr. H.) strip from the brow of the scholar his bay, and from those of the statesman and soldier their laurel. You would strike from your pension roll the name of the veteran patriot who has shed his blood in achieving your country's independence. Why do you deck with chaplets the statue of the Father of his Country, if good luck, and good luck alone, be all that commends him to our love and gratitude?

[Here Mr. CRAIG of Virginia observed, "bad luck would have made him a traitor."]

Ay, (rejoined Mr. HOFFMAN,) but in whose estimation? Not in that of those who saw and knew the true character of the contest in which he was engaged. What! has it come to this, in the estimation of the gentleman from Virginia, that the great and holy principles that governed and produced our Revolution depended for their truth and purity upon success or defeat? Would Washington, if his blood had been poured out as a prisoner and a rebel before the scaffold, been regarded as a traitor by Warren and by Hancock, by Greene, by Hamilton, by the crowd of patriots who encompassed him around, partners of his toil and sharers of his patriotism? Has the martyrdom of a Russell and a Sydney extinguished the love and the admiration of the world for their noble efforts to give freedom to their country? Was it good luck that impelled Columbus, through discouragement, conspiracy, and poverty, to persevere in his path of danger until this Western world blessed his sight and rewarded his energy and his daring? Does the gentleman emulate the glory of the third King of Rome, Tullus Hostilius? And would he erect in our own land a temple of Fortune? Would he tear in our own State, made an empire by the wisdom and sagacity of one of her sons, the statue of her Clinton from the mighty pedestal, reaching from the Ocean to the Lakes, upon which it stands, and place it in a narrow niche in his temple dedicated to Fortune? But my friend from Virginia, if he will allow me to call him so, cannot mean what he said. It was a hasty expression. It would do dishonor to the great men of that Mother of States which he represents upon this floor with so much ability and fidelity.

But the last and boldest attack (said Mr. H.) against the claims of Mr. Fulton upon the gratitude and upon the justice of the country had been made by the member from Ohio, [Mr. DUNCAN.] He had attempted to show by documents, and to prove by labored arguments, that Robert Fulton was not the inventor of steam navigation. To some parts of that speech Mr. H. said he should not refer. He had been delighted with the refreshing and unusual sight of the merging of political and party feeling in that of justice and gratitude to a public benefactor, during the discussion of this question. In that hall, too often made the gladiatorial arena in which political contests were waged with violence and warmth, it was indeed refreshing to witness, upon a question like that under consideration, the walls of party petition for a season prostrated; and he should make no references, therefore, to that part of the gentleman's remarks which would tend to erect that wall anew upon the present occasion.

[Mr. DUNCAN here rose, and disclaimed the intention of giving a party character to his remarks.]

Mr. HOFFMAN said that he certainly did not intend to do injustice to the gentleman from Ohio. He did not mean to aver that that gentleman had intended to make this a question for the action of party against party. But he (Mr. D.) had alluded to what had been formerly said upon the Sub-Treasury scheme, that it was the banks to which the West owed its prosperity; and that now it was said that it was to steam, &c. Now Mr. H. had not opposed the Sub-Treasury scheme because it was opposed to banks, but because it tended to destroy a well-regulated credit system, the successful operation of which had made the West what it is. Mr. H. believed and knew, as well as the gentleman from Ohio, that it was the woodman's axe that cleared the way in the western wilds for the foundation of those fair cities that now showed so beautifully upon the banks of those rivers; but he also knew that it was credit—credit, which had nerved the arm of the woodman—credit, without which that enterprising people would have lacked the facilities which were requisite to make their hardy toil effective and triumphant over the obstacles it had to encounter.

But the House and the world were told that Fulton was not the inventor of steam navigation. This [said Mr. HOFFMAN] is no new idea. It had often rang through the different countries of Europe, and had been frequently ushered forth to the world by men jealous of the laurels of their own country in the peaceful walks of science and literature. But he had never before heard, and, indeed, had never expected to hear, especially in the halls of Congress, a repetition and admission of the truth of such an assertion, from the lips of an American citizen! Go to the western waters; tell the people of that country that not to Fulton, but to a foreigner, was due the renown of having been the first successfully to apply the power of steam to navigation, and see how such an assertion will be received by the constituents of the gentleman himself! Sir, it is not to be wondered at that such emulation exists among nations, in the assertion of a claim to such a source of national glory. Seven cities contended for the fame of Homer's birth; and it should excite no surprise that other nations should seek to place within their own borders the fountain from which such bountiful streams have flowed, to enrich and civilize the world. England tells the world that it is to a Scotchman that the honor of this discovery is due; and that it was the Clyde and the Thames that first witnessed the triumphant success of this wonderful invention. France, through her National Institute, declares that the Seine first witnessed this triumph of the genius of man over the conflicting winds and waves. And even Spain, degraded and enslaved Spain, roused by the voice of emulation, has looked forth from her cloistered halls of superstition, and has raised her head from her blood-stained fields of civil war, and declared that in the age of Charles, in the presence of her Court and nobles, this experiment was successfully tried! But America, proudly seated upon the enduring monument which Robert Fulton has reared, laughs to scorn the claims of rivals, and looks down serenely upon these billows of strife, which break at the base of her noble throne. And yet we, her Representatives, who should guard her honor, strive to tear her from her seat of dignity and pride, or else meanly stoop to calculate the value of each particular item, before we will compensate and reward the glorious architect by whom that monument of individual fame and national glory was reared.

The former report, to which gentlemen have alluded, in favor of the claimants, as being in full satisfaction of this claim, was made, the House must know, when the heirs of Fulton were destitute and in suffering. They had come to this House, and knocked gently at your door: they told you, we are the orphan children of him who has honored you—we are poor and destitute in the land which our father's genius has enriched. And, in the pathetic language of Lear, they asked "that you would vouchsafe to them raiment, bed, and food." At that time $5,000 was awarded, and they were referred to the future legislation of Congress for further relief.

Mr. H. would beseech that House not to send them again away, without satisfaction. A recommitment of the bill would work its total defeat at this session of Congress. Let it then be sent to the Senate, where it will meet with a cool and careful discussion; and let the gentleman from Ohio lay his griefs and his arguments before his friend, the Senator from that State, who will of course act upon it as he thinks best. But, if it now be reconsidered, its fate was certain; it can never be called up. It must die a lingering death upon the Speaker's table—a fate from which I again implore this House to save these interesting petitioners. He trusted that the motion to reconsider would not prevail.

SPEECH OF MR. CALHOUN,
OF SOUTH CAROLINA,

In Senate, March 22, 1838.—In reply to Mr. WEBSTER, on the bill to separate the Government from banks.

Mr. PRESIDENT: After having addressed the Senate twice, I would owe an apology, under ordinary circumstances, for again intruding myself on its patience. But, after what fell from the Senator from Massachusetts, nearest to me, [Mr. WEBSTER] the other day, the greater part of which was not only directed against my arguments, but at me personally, I feel that my silence, and not my notice of his remarks, would require an apology. And yet, notwithstanding I am thus constrained again to address the Senate, I fear it will not be impossible to avoid exciting some impatience, fatigued and exhausted as it must be by so long a discussion; to prevent which, as far as practicable, I shall aim at as much brevity as possible, consistently with justice to myself and the side I support.

The Senator's speech was long and multifarious, consisting of many parts, which had little or no connection with the question under consideration. For the sake of brevity and distinctness, I propose to consider it under four heads. First, his preliminary course, which treated at large of credits and banks, with very little reference to the subject. Next, his arguments on the question at issue; and that to be followed by his reply to my arguments at this and the extra session; and, finally, his conclusion, which was appropriated wholly to personal remarks, and a comparison between his and my public course, without having the slightest relation either to the subject or any thing I had said in the debate, but which the Senator obviously considered as the most important portion of his speech. He devoted one day almost wholly to it, and delivered himself with an earnestness and vehemence which clearly manifested the importance which he attached to it. I shall, as in duty bound, pay my respects first to that, which so manifestly occupied the highest place in his estimation, though standing at the bottom in the order of his remarks.

The Senator opened this portion of his speech with much courtesy, accompanied by many remarks of respect and regard, which I understood to be an intimation that he desired the attack he was about to make to be attributed to political, and not personal motives. I accept the intimation, and shall meet him in the sense he intended. Indeed, there never has been, between the Senator and myself, the least personal difference, nor has a word, having a personal bearing, ever passed between us in debate, prior to the present occasion, within my recollection, during the long period we have been in public life, except on the discussion of the force bill and proclamation, which, considering how often we have stood opposed on deep and exciting questions, may be regarded as not a little remarkable. But our political relations have not been on as good a footing as our personal. He seems to think that we had harmonized not badly till 1824, when, according to his version, I became too sectional for him to act any longer with me; but which I shall hereafter show originated in a very different cause. My impression, I must say, is different, very different, from that of the Senator. From the commencement of our public life to the present time, we have differed on almost all questions involving the principles of Government and its permanent policy, with the exception of a short interval, while I was in the War Department, when the Senator agreed with the South on the protective system and some other measures. I do not consider our casual concert, during the last few years of the late Administration, when we were both opposed to the Executive power, as constituting an exception. It was understood that we both adhered to our principles and views of policy without the least surrender, and our personal relations were formal and cold, during the whole period. In fact, we moved in entirely different spheres. We differed in relation to the origin and character of the Government, the principles on which it rested, and the policy it ought to pursue; and I could not at all sympathize with the grave and deep tone with which the Senator pronounced our final separation, as he was pleased to call it, and which, in my opinion, would have been much more appropriate to the separation of those who had been long and intimately united in the support of the same principles and policy, than to the slight and casual relations, personal and political, which had existed between us.

Setting, then, aside all personal motives, I may well ask, what political grief, what keen disappointment is it, which at this time could induce him to make the attack he has on me, and, I might add, the manner in which he made it? The Senator himself shall answer the question. He has unfolded the cause of his grief, and pointed to the source of his disappointment. He told us that "victory was within reach, and my co-operation only was wanted to prostrate forever those in power." These few words are a volume. They disclose all. Yes, victory was within reach, the arm outstretched, the hand expanded to seize it, and I would not co-operate. Hence the grief, hence the keen disappointment, and hence the waters of bitterness that have rolled their billows against me. And what a victory! Not simply the going out of one party and the coming in of another; not merely the expulsion of the Administration, and the induction of the Opposition, but a great political revolution, carrying with it the fundamental principles of the Government and a permanent change of policy. It would have brought in, not only the Senator and his party, but their political creed, as announced by him in the discussion on the proclamation and force bill, with which he now taunts those in power—a fact to be noted and remembered. He, the champion of those measures, against whom I contended foot to foot for one entire session, now casts up to me, that in refusing to co-operate with him, I protect the party in power, not a small portion of whom, I have good reason to believe, were drawn by the adverse current of the times reluctantly from their own principles to the support of those measures, and with it the Senator and his principles. Yes, I repeat, it would have brought in the Senator and his consolidation doctrines, which regard this Government as one great national republic, with the right to construe finally and conclusively the extent of its own powers, and to enforce its construction at the point of the bayonet; doctrines which, at a blow, sweep away every vestige of State Rights, and reduce the States to mere petty and dependent corporations. It would have also brought in his policy, bank, tariff, and all. Even now, when victory is uncertain, the Senator announces the approach of the period when he shall move the renewal of the protective system; a precious confession, that dropped out in the heat of discussion.

[Mr. WEBSTER. No, I spoke deliberately.]

So much, then, the worse. That justifies all I have said and done; that proves my foresight and firmness, and will open the eyes of thousands, especially in the South, who have heretofore doubted the correctness of my course on this question.

The victory would not only have been complete had I co-operated, but it would also have been permanent. The portion of the State Rights party, with which I acted, would have been absorbed—yes, absorbed; it is the proper word, and I use it in spite of the sarcasm of the Senator. The other would have been scattered and destroyed, and the Senator and his party, and their principles and policy, would have been left undisputed masters of the field, unresisted and irresistible. The first fruits of the victory would have been the re-union of the political and money power—a wedded union never more to be dissolved. The tariff would have been renewed—I may now speak positively, after the declaration of the Senator—to be again followed by an overflowing revenue, profuse and corrupt expenditures, heavy surplus, and overwhelming patronage, which would have closed the doors to wealth and distinction to all who refused to bend the knee at the shrine of the combined powers. All this was seen and fully comprehended by the Senator; and hence again, I repeat, his deep grief, his keen disappointment, and his attacks on me, for refusing to co-operate.

The Senator must have known that, in refusing, I acted on principles and opinions long entertained and fully declared years ago. In my reply to his associate in this joint war on me, in which I am attacked at once in front and rear, I demonstrated, to the satisfaction of the Senate, the truth of what I assert, so completely, that the Senator's associate did not even attempt a denial. And yet, such is the depth of the Senator's grief and disappointment, that it hurried him to a repetition of exploded charges which, in his cooler moments, he must know to be unfounded. He repeated the stale and refuted charge of a summerset, of going over, and of being struck with a sudden thought; and summoned up all his powers of irony and declamation, of which he proved himself to be a great master on the occasion, to make my Edgefield letter, in which I assigned my reason for refusing to co-operate, ridiculous. I see in all this but the disappointed hopes of one who had fixed his gaze intensely on power that had eluded his grasp, and who sought to wreak his resentment on him who had refused to put the splendid prize in his hands. He resorted to ridicule, because it was the only weapon that truth and justice left him. He well knows how much deeper are the wounds that they inflict than the slight punctures that the pointed, but feeble, shafts of ridicule leave behind; and he used the more harmless weapon only because he could not command the more deadly. That is in my hand. I brandish it in his eyes. It is the only one I need, and I intend to use it freely on this occasion.

After pouring out his wailing in such doleful tones, because I would not co-operate in placing him and his party in power, and prostrating my own, the Senator next attacks me because I stated in my Edgefield letter, as I understood him, that I rallied on General Jackson, with the view of putting down the tariff by Executive influence. I have looked over that letter with care, and can find no such expression.

[Mr. WEBSTER. It was used at the extra session.]

I was about to add that I had often used it, and cannot but feel surprised that the Senator should postpone the notice of it till this late period, if he thought it deserving reply. Why did he not reply to it years ago, when I first used it in debate? But the Senator asked what I meant by Executive influence. Did I mean his veto? He must have asked the question thoughtlessly. He must know that the veto can only apply to bills on their passage, and could not possibly be used in case of existing laws, such as the tariff acts. He also asked if there was concert in putting down the tariff between myself and the present Chief Magistrate? I reply by asking him a question, to which, as a New England man, he cannot object. He has avowed his determination, in a certain contingency, which he thinks is near, that he will move the renewal of the tariff. I ask, is there concert on that point, between him and his associate in this attack? And finally, he asks if I disclosed my motives then? Yes: I am not in the habit of disguising them. I openly and constantly avowed that it was one of my leading motives in supporting General Jackson, because I expected he would use his influence to effect a gradual, but thorough, reduction of the tariff, that would reduce the system to the revenue point; and when I saw reason to doubt whether he would accomplish what I deem so important, I did not wait the event of his election, but moved openly and boldly in favor of State interposition, as a certain remedy, which would not fail to effect the reduction, in the event he should disappoint me.

The Senator, after despatching my letter, concluded his speech by volunteering a comparison between his and my public character, not very flattering to me, but highly complimentary to himself. He represented me as sectional, in the habit of speaking constantly of the unconstitutional and oppressive operations of the tariff; which he thought very unpatriotic; of having certain sinister objects in view in calling on the South to unite, and of marching off under the State rights banner; while he paints himself in the most glowing and opposite colors. There is, Mr. President, no disputing about taste; such are the effects of a difference of organization and education, that what is offensive to one is often agreeable to another. According to my conception, nothing can be more painful than to pronounce our own praise, particularly in contrast with another, even when forced to do so in self-defence; but how one can rise in his place, when neither his motive nor conduct is impeached, and when there is nothing in the question, or previous discussion, that would possibly justify it, and pronounce an eulogy on himself, which a modest man would blush to pronounce on a Washington or a Franklin to his face, is to me utterly incomprehensible. But, if the Senator, in pronouncing his gorgeous piece of autobiography, had contented himself in simply proclaiming, in his deep tone, to the Senate and the assembled multitude of spectators, that he came into Congress as the representative of the American people; that, if he was born for any good, it was for the good of the whole people, and the defence of the Constitution; that he habitually acted as if acting in the eyes of the framers of the Constitution; that it would be easier to drive these pillars from their bases, than to drive or seduce him from his lofty purpose; that he would do nothing to weaken the brotherly love beween these States, and every thing that they should remain united, beneficially and thoroughly forever, I would have gazed in silent wonder, without uttering a word, at the extraordinary spectacle, and the happy self-delusion in which he seems to exist. But when he undertook not only to erect an image to himself, as an object of self adoration, but to place alongside of it a carved figure of myself, with distorted limbs and features, to heighten and render more divine his own image, he invited, he challenged, nay, he compelled me to inquire into the high qualities which he arrogates to himself, and the truth of the comparison which he has drawn between us. If the inquiry should excite some reminiscences not very agreeable to the Senator, or disturb the happy self-delusion in which he reposes, he must blame not me, but his own self-sufficiency and boasting at my expense.

Know yourself, is an ancient maxim, the wisdom of which I never before so fully realized. How imperfectly even the talented and intelligent know themselves! Our understanding, like our eyes, seems to be given, not to see our own features, but those of others. How diffident we ought to be of any favorable opinion that we may have formed of ourselves! That one of the distinguished abilities of the Senator, and his mature age, should form so erroneous an opinion of his real character, is indeed truly astonishing. I do not deny that he possesses many excellent qualities. My object is truth, and I intend neither to exaggerate nor detract. But I must say, that the character which he attributes to himself is wholly dissimilar from what really belongs to him. So far from that universal and ardent patriotism which knows neither place nor person, that he ascribes to himself, he is, above all the distinguished public men with whom I am acquainted, remarkable for a devoted attachment to the interest, the institutions, and the place where Providence has cast his lot. I do not censure him for his local feelings. The Author of our being never intended that creatures of our limited faculties should embrace, with equal intenseness of affection, the remote and the near. Such an organization would lead us constantly to intermeddle with what we would but imperfectly understand, and often to do mischief where we intended good. But the Senator is far from being liable to such a charge. His affections, instead of being too wide and boundless, are too concentrated. As local as his attachment is, it does not embrace all within its limited scope. It takes in but a class even there—a powerful, influential, and intelligent, but still a class which influences and controls all his actions, and so absorbs his affections as to make him overlook large portions of the Union; of which I propose to give one or two striking illustrations.

I must then remind the Senator that there is a vast extent of our wide-spread Union, which lies south of Mason and Dixon's line, distinguished by its peculiar soil, climate, situation, institutions, and productions, which he has never encircled within the warm embraces of his universal patriotism. As long as he has been in public life, he has not, to the best of my knowledge, given a single vote to promote its interest, or done an act to defend its rights. I wish not to do him injustice. If I could remember a single instance I would cite it; but I cannot, in casting my eyes over his whole course, call to mind one. As boundless and ardent, then, as is his patriotism, according to his own account, it turns out that it is limited by metes and bounds that exclude nearly one half of the whole Union!

But it may be said that this total absence of all manifestation of attachment to an entire section of the Union is not to be attributed to the want of an ardent desire to promote its interest and security, but of occasion to exhibit it. Unfortunately for the Senator, such an excuse would be without foundation. Opportunities are daily and hourly offering. The section is the weakest of any, and its peculiar interest and institutions expose it constantly to injustice and oppression, which afford many and fine opportunities to display that generous and noble patriotism which the Senator attributes to himself, and which delights in taking the side of the assailed against the assailant. Even now, at this moment, there is an opportunity which one professing such ardent and universal attachment to the whole country as the Senator does, would greedily embrace. A war is now, and has been for years, systematically and fiercely carried on in violation of the Constitution, against a long-standing and widely-extended institution of that section, which is indispensable, not only to its prosperity, but to its safety and existence, and which calls loudly on every patriot to raise his voice and arm in its defence. How has the Senator acted? Has he raised his mighty arm in defence of the assailed, or thundered forth his denunciation against the assailants? These are searching questions. They test the truth of his universal and boasted attachment to the whole country; and in order that the Senate may compare his acts with his professions, I propose to present more fully the facts of the case and his course.

It is well known, then, that the section to which I refer is inhabited by two races, from different continents, and descended from different stocks; and that they have existed together under their present relation from the first settlement of the country. It is also well known that the ancestors of the Senator's constituents, (I include the section,) brought no small portion of the ancestors of the African, or inferior race, from their native home across the ocean, and sold them as slaves to the ancestors of our constituents, and pocketed the price, and profited greatly by the traffic. It is also known, that when the Constitution was formed, our section felt much jealousy lest the powers which it conferred should be used to interfere with the relations existing between the two races; to allay which, and induce our ancestors to enter the Union, guards, that were deemed effectual against the supposed danger, were inserted in the instrument. It is also known that the product of the labor of the inferior race has furnished the basis of our widely-extended commerce and ample revenue, which has supported the Government and diffused wealth and prosperity through the other section. This is one side of the picture. Let us now turn and look at the other.

How has the other section acted? I include not all, nor a majority. We have had recent proof, during the discussion of the resolutions I offered at the commencement of the session, to what great extent just and patriotic feelings exist in that quarter, in reference to the subject under consideration. I then narrow the question, and ask, how has the majority of the Senator's constituents acted, and especially a large portion of his political supporters and admirers? Have they respected the title to our property, which we trace back to their ancestors, and which, in good faith and equity, carries with it an implied warranty, that binds them to defend and protect our rights to the property sold us? Have they regarded their faith plighted to us on entering into the constitutional compact which formed the Union, to abstain from interfering with our property, and to defend and protect us in its quiet enjoyment? Have they acted as those ought who have participated so largely in the profits derived from our labor? No; they are striving, night and day, in violation of justice, plighted faith, and the Constitution, to divest us of our property—to reduce us to the level of those whom they sold to us as slaves, and to overthrow an institution on which our safety depends.

I come nearer home. How has the Senator himself acted? He who has such influence and weight with his constituents, and who boasts of his universal patriotism and brotherly love and affection for the whole Union? Has he raised his voice to denounce this crying injustice, or his arm to arrest the blow of the assailant, which threatens to dissever the Union, and forever alienate one-half of the community from the other? Has he uttered a word in condemnation of violated faith, or honor trampled in the dust? No: he has sat quietly in his place, without moving a finger or raising his voice. Without raising his voice, did I say? I mistake. His voice has been raised, not for us, but our assailants. His arm has been raised, not to arrest the aggressor, but to open the doors of this chamber, in order to give our assailants an entrance here, where they may aim the most deadly blow against the safety of the Union, and our tranquillity and security. He has thrown the mantle, not of protection over the Constitution, but over the motive and character of those whose daily avocation is to destroy every vestige of brotherly love between these States, and to convert the Union into a curse, instead of a blessing. He has done more. The whole Senate has seen him retire from his seat, to avoid a vote on one of the resolutions that I moved, with a view to rally the patriotic of every portion of the community against this fell spirit, which threatens to dissolve the Union, and turn the brotherly love and affection in which it originated into deadly hate, which was so obviously true he could not vote against, but which he dodged, rather than throw his weight on our side, and against our assailants. And yet, while these things are fresh in our recollection, notorious, and known to all, the Senator rises in his place, and proclaims aloud that he comes in as the representative of the United States; that, if he was born for any good, it was for the good of the whole people, and defence of the Constitution; that he always acts as if under the eyes of the framers of the Constitution; that it would be easier to drive these pillars from their bases, than him from his lofty purpose; that he will do nothing to destroy the brotherly love between the States, and every thing that the Union may exist for ever, beneficially and thoroughly for all! What a contrast between profession and performance! What strange and extraordinary self-delusion!

But this is not the only instance. There is another in which the contrast between the course of the Senator and his lofty pretension of unbounded and ardent patriotism is not less astonishing. I refer to the protective tariff, and his memorable and inconsistent course in relation to it.

Its history may be told in a few words. It rose subsequent to the late war with Great Britain. The Senator's associate in this attack was its leading supporter and author. Its theory rested on the principle, that all articles which could be made in our country should be protected, and it was an axiom of the system that its perfection consisted in prohibiting the introduction of all such articles from abroad. To give the restrictions on commerce necessary to effect its object a plausible appearance, they were said to be for the protection of home industry, and the system itself received the imposing name of the American System. Its effects were desolating in the staple States. The heavy duties imposed on their foreign exchanges left scarcely enough to the planter to feed and clothe his slaves, and educate his children, while wealth and prosperity bloomed around the favored portion of the Union.

The Senator was at first opposed to the system. As far back as the autumn of 1820, he delivered a speech to the citizens of Boston, in Faneuil Hall, in opposition to it, in which he questioned its constitutionality, and denounced its inequality and oppression.

His speech was followed by a series of resolutions embodying the substance of what he had said, and which received the sanction of himself and constituents, who, at that time, were less interested in manufactures than in commerce and navigation, which suffered in common with the great staple interests of the South. I ask the Secretary to read the resolutions:

Resolved, That no objection ought ever to be made to any amount of taxes equally apportioned and imposed for the purpose of raising revenue, necessary for the support of Government; but that taxes imposed on the people for the sole benefit of any class of men, are equally inconsistent with the principles of our Constitution, and with sound judgment."

"Resolved, That the supposition that until the supposed tariff, or some similar measure, be adopted, we are and shall be dependent on foreigners for the means of subsistence and defence, is, in our opinion, altogether fallacious and fanciful, and derogatory to the character of the nation.

"Resolved, That high bounties on such domestic manufactures as are principally benefited by that tariff, favor great capitalists rather than personal industry, or the owners of small capitals; and therefore that we do not perceive its tendency to promote national industry.

"Resolved, That we are equally incapable of discovering its beneficial effects on agriculture, since the obvious consequence of its adoption would be, that the farmer must give more than he now does for all he buys, and receive less for all he sells.

"Resolved, That, in our opinion, the proposed tariff, and the principles on which it is avowedly formed, would, if adopted, have a tendency, however different may be the motives of those who recommend them, to diminish the industry, impede the prosperity, and corrupt the morals of the people."

What can be more explicit or decided? They hold the very sentiments and language which I have so often held on this floor. That very system was then pronounced to be unconstitutional, unequal, oppressive, and corrupting in its effects, by the Senator and his constituents, for pronouncing which now he accuses me as being sectional, and holding language having a mischievous effect on the rising generation.

Four years after this, in April, 1824, the Senator delivered another speech against the system, in reply to the then Speaker, and now his associate on this occasion, in which he again denounced the inequality and oppression of the system with equal force in one of the ablest arguments ever delivered on the subject, and in which he completely demolished the reasons of his then opponent. But an event was then fast approaching, which was destined to work a mighty and sudden revolution in his views and feelings. A few months after, the Presidential election took place; Mr. Adams was elected by the co-operation of the author of the American system, and the now associate of the Senator. Those who had been enemies came together. New political combinations were formed; and the result was a close alliance between the East and the West, of which that system formed the basis. A new light bursted in on the Senator. A sudden thought struck him; but not quite as disinterested as that of the German sentimentalist. He made a complete summerset, heels over head; went clear over; deserted the free trade side in a twinkling, and joined the restrictive policy, and then cried out that he could no longer act with me, whom he had left standing where he had just stood, because I was too sectional! At once every thing the Senator had ever said or done was forgotten; entirely expunged from the tablets of his memory. His whole nature was changed in an instant; and thereafter no measure of protection was too strong for his palate. With a few contortions and slight choking, he even gulped down, a few years after, the bill of abomination—the tariff of '28; a measure which raised the duties so high as to pass one-half of the aggregate amount in value of the whole imports into the public Treasury. I desire it to be noted and remembered that, out of an importation of sixty-four millions of dollars, including every description of imports, the free and dutied articles, the Government took for its share thirty-two millions under the tariff of 1828, and that the Senator, yes, he, the defender of the Constitution and equal protector of every section and interest, voted for that measure, notwithstanding his recent denunciation of the system as unconstitutional, unequal, and oppressive! But he did more, and things still more surprising, as the sequel will show.

The protective tariff did not change the character of its operation with the change of the Senator. Its oppressive and corrupting effects grew with its growth, till the burden became intolerable under the tariff of '28. Desolation spread itself over the entire staple region. Their commercial cities were deserted. Charleston parted with its last ship, and grass grew in her once busy streets. The political condition of the country presented a prospect not less dreary. A deep and growing conflic between the two great sections agitated the whole country, and a vast revenue, beyond its most extravagant wants, gave the Government, especially the Executive branch, boundless patronage and power, which were rapidly changing the character of the Government, and spreading corruption far and wide through every condition of society. Something must be done, and that promptly. Every hope of reformation, or change through this Government, had vanished. The absorbing force of the system had drawn into its support a fixed majority in the community, which controlled irresistibly every department of the Government. But one hope was left short of revolution, and that was in the States themselves, in their sovereign capacity as parties to the constitutional compact. Fortunately for the country and our institutions, one of the members of the Union was found bold enough to interpose her sovereign authority, and declare the protective tariff, that had caused all this mischief, and threatened so much more, to be unconstitutional, and, therefore, null and void, and of no effect within her limits; and thus an issue was formed which brought events to a crisis.

We all remember what followed. The Government prepared to assert by force its usurped powers. The Proclamation was issued, and the War Message and Force Bill followed, and the State armed to maintain her constitutional rights. How, now, I ask, did the Senator act in this fearful crisis; he who had, but a short time before, pronounced the system to be unconstitutional, unequal, unjust, and oppressive? Did he feel any sympathy for those who felt and thought as he did but a brief period before? Did he make any allowance for their falling into the same errors (if such he then considered them) into which he himself had fallen? Did he show that ardent devotion to preserve the brotherly love between the members of the Union he now so boastingly professes? Did he, who calls himself the defender of the Constitution, feel any compunction in resorting to force, to execute laws which he had pronounced to be in violation of the Constitution? Did he, who manifested such deep distrust of those in power, who had been foremost in proclaiming their usurpa-tions, and calling on the patriotic of all parties to oppose them, show any dread of consigning to them unlimited power to crush one of the members of the Union, and which, after accomplishing that, might be so readily turned to crush the liberty of all? Quite the reverse. A sudden thought again struck him. He again, in a twinkling, forgot the past, and rushed over into the arms of power; and took his position in the front rank, as the champion of the most violent measures, to enforce laws at the point of the bayonet, which he had pronounced unconstitutional, unjust, and oppressive! And this, too, at the hazard of civil war, and the manifest danger of subverting the Constitution and liberties of the country; refusing all terms of adjustment, and resisting to the last with violence the bill which compromised and settled the conflict! And yet, with all this fresh in the recollection of himself and all present, he can rise in his place and proclaim himself the universal patriot; the defender of the Constitution, and benefactor of every portion of the Union; the man who has done every thing to preserve brotherly love between its members, and who is ready to make every sacrifice to make it beneficial to all the parties!

But what is more extraordinary, what is truly wonderful and astonishing is, while these words were on his tongue, he, in the same breath, with a full knowledge of all the disastrous consequences which have and must necessarily follow the renewal of the protective system, should declare that he anticipates the speedy arrival of the time when he will again undertake to revive the system! More cannot be added. The contrast between the Senator's course and the character which he ascribes to himself cannot be rendered more striking. I shall not add another instance, as many of them as are at my command. A volume could not more conclusively prove how unfounded are his pretensions to that lofty, universal, and ardent patriotism which he claims for himself, and how strong the delusion under which he is in regard to his true character.

Let us now turn and inquire what has been my course; I whom he represents as sectional, whose course he pronounces to be unfriendly to the Union, because I now call the protective system unconstitutional and oppressive; who, he intimates, desire to unite the South for no patriotic purpose, and represents as going off under the State rights banner. And here, Mr. President, let me say, I put in no claim to the lofty destiny to which the Senator says he was born. Instead of coming here, like the Senator, as the representative of the whole people, I appear in the more humble character of the representative of one of the States of this Union, sent here to watch over her particular interests, and to promote the general interest of all, as far as the Constitution has conferred power upon us, and as it can be done without oppression to the parts. These are my conceptions of my representative character, with the trust confided to me, and the duties attached to it, which I endeavor to discharge with industry, fidelity, and all the abilities which it has pleased my Creator to confer on me. Instead of falling short of what I profess, I trust my public life, if examined with candor, will show that I have ever so interpreted my duty to my State, as to permit it in no instance to interfere with the just claims of the Union. It is my good fortune to represent a State which holds her character far above her interest, and which claims the first place, when a sacrifice is to be made for the safety and happiness of all, and would hold me to strict account, if, in representing her interest, I should forget what is due to her honor among her confederates. All her acts prove that she is as liberal in making concessions, when demanded by the common good, as she is prompt and resolute to resist aggression to promote the interest of others at her expense. Acting in the same spirit, as her representative, I have never failed to meet and repel aggressions, while, I trust, I have, on no occasion, been unmindful of her honor and the general interests of the whole Union. Having made these remarks, I shall now proceed to show that, as humble as my pretensions are, and as sectional and unpatriotic as he has thought proper to represent me, my course for liberality and a just regard to the interest of every portion of the Union, will not suffer in comparison with his, as lofty as are his pretensions.

In making the inquiry I have, into the course of the Senator in relation to the section to which I belong, I called on him to point out a single instance, with all his boasted patriotism, in which he had given a vote to promote its interests, or done an act to defend its rights; but now, when the inquiry is into my course in relation to his section, I propose to reverse the question, and to apply to myself a much more severe test than I did to him. I ask, then, from what measure, calculated to promote the interests of his section, have I ever withheld my support, except, indeed, the protective tariff, and certain appropriations, which, according to my mode of construing the Constitution, I regard as unconstitutional, and would of course be bound to oppose, wherever the benefit should fall? I call on the Senator to point out a single instance; and, if he desires it, I will yield him the floor in order to give him an opportunity to do so. Will the Senator call, on his part, for instances in which I have supported the interest of his section? I can point to numerous; to my early and constant support of the Navy; to my resistance to the system of embargoes, non-importation and non-intercourse acts; to my generous course in support of manufactures that sprung up during the war, in which my friends think I went too far; to the liberal terms on which the tariff controversy was settled, and the fidelity with which I have adhered to it; and to the system of fortifications for the defence of our harbors, which I projected and commenced, and which is so important to the two great interests of commerce and navigation, in which his section has so deep a stake. To which I might add many more; but these are sufficient for one represented as so sectional, against the blank list of the Senator in relation to my section, with all his claim to ardent and universal patriotism. If we turn to the West, my course will at least bear comparison with his for liberality towards that great and growing section of our country. To pass over other instances, I ask him what measure of his can be compared to the cession I have proposed of the public lands to the new States on the liberal conditions prooposed? It is a measure above all others calculated to promote their interest, to elevate their character, to terminate their political dependence, and to raise them to a complete equality with the old States for the mutual benefit of us and them, but which, sectional as I am represented to be, proved too liberal for the Senator, with all his wide-extended and ardent attachment to the whole Union.

But it seems that I mean something very sinister in my call on the South to unite, and the Senator very significantly asks me what is meant. I have nothing to disguise, and will readily answer. If he would look at home, and open his eyes to the systematic and incessant attacks made on our peace and quiet by his constituents; if he would reflect on his threat to renew the system of oppression from which we have freed ourselves with such difficulty and danger, and bear in mind that we are the weaker section, and, without union among ourselves, we cannot resist the danger that surrounds us, he will see that there is neither mystery nor danger in the call. I go farther. Our union is not only necessary to our safety and protection, but is also to the successful operation of our system. We constitute the check to its over-action; and, as experience proves, the only power through which, when disordered, reformation can be peaceably effected. Our union is dangerous to none, and salutary to all. The machine never works well when the South is divided, nor badly when it is united.

The Senator next tells us that I declared I would march off under the State Rights banner, which he seized on to impugn my patriotism and to boast of his own. It is an easy task, by mis-stating or garbling, to distort the most elevated or correct sentiment. In this case the Senator, by selecting a single member of the sentence, and throwing a strong emphasis on "off," gave a meaning directly the opposite of what I really did say; but it afforded him an opportunity of representing me as abandoning the cause of the Constitution and country, and himself as being their champion, which it seems was sufficient for his purpose. The declaration is taken from my opening speech at the extra session; and, that the Senate may judge for itself, I shall give the entire passage:

"We are about to take a fresh start. I move off under the States Rights banner, and go in the direction in which I have been so long moving. I seize the opportunity thoroughly to reform the Government; to bring it back to its original principles; to retrench, economize, and rigidly to enforce accountability. I shall oppose strenuously all attempts to originate a new debt, to create a National Bank, to re-unite the political and money power, (more dangerous than Church and State,) in any form or shape."

This is what I did declare, and which the Senator represents as deserting the Constitution and country; and this is the way I am usually answered. I know not whether I have greater cause to complain or rejoice at the fact that there is scarcely an argument or sentiment of mine, which is attempted to be met, that is not garbled, or misstated. If I have reason to complain of the injustice, I have at the same time the pleasure to reflect that it is a high implied compliment to the truth and correctness of what I say.

There still remains an important chapter to complete the comparison between the public character of the Senator and myself; I mean the part which we took in the late war between Great Britain and this country. I intended at one time to enter on it, and to trace the rise and progress of the war, with its various vicissitudes of disasters and victories, and the part which the Senator and his political associates acted at that important period; but these are by-gone events, belonging to the historian, in whose hands I am content to leave them, and shall not recur to them, unless the Senator should provoke me hereafter by a renewal of his attack.

Having now despatched the personalities of the Senator, I turn next to his argument, which, as I have stated, consists of three parts: the preliminary discourse on credit and banks; the discussion of the question at issue; and the reply to my remarks at this and the extra session. I shall consider each, as I have begun, in the reverse order. The argument of the Senator is indeed so miscellaneous and loosely connected, that it is a matter of but little importance in what order it is considered.

When he announced his intention to reply to my remarks, both at this and the extra session, I anticipated that they would be met fully, if not satisfactorily, point by point. Guess, then, my surprise, on finding him pass by, without even attempting an answer to the numerous objections which I made to the union of the political and money power, as affecting the morals, the politics, the currency, the industry, and prosperity of the country, which, if the fourth part be true, is decisive of the question, and noticing but two out of the long list, in his reply. If we may judge of the strength of those which he has passed over by his inconclusive answer (as I shall presently show) to the two which he selected, my argument may be pronounced to be impregnable. I shall begin with his reply to my remarks at the present session.

It will be remembered, among other objections against the connection with the banks, I urged that the Government had no right to make a general deposite in bank, or receive the notes of banks in the public dues. I placed the first on the ground, that when public money was placed in deposite in banks, and passed to the credit of the Government, it was, if ever, in the Treasury; and that it could not be drawn out and used for any purpose, unless under an appropriation made by law, without violating an express provision of the Constitution, which provides that no money should be drawn out of the Treasury, but in consequence of appropriation by law. I then argued, that to place money in general deposite in banks, with the implied understanding always attached to such transactions, that they should have the right to draw it out and use it as they please, till called for by the Government, was a manifest violation of this provision of the Constitution.

In support of the other objection against receiving of bank notes in the public dues, I laid down the known and fundamental rule of construction on all questions touching the powers of this Government, that it had no right to exercise any but such as are expressly given by the Constitution, or that may be necessary to carry into effect the granted powers. I then insisted that no such power was granted, nor was its exercise necessary to carry any granted power into effect, and concluded, that the power could not be exercised unless comprehended under one or the other head. To which I added the further objection, that if we had the right to receive the notes of State banks in our dues as cash, it would necessarily involve the right of taking them under our own control and regulation, which would bring this Government necessarily into conflict with the reserved rights of the States; and to this I added, that the receipt of bank notes by the Government tended to expel gold and silver from circulation, and depreciate and render their value more fluctuating, and, of course, could not be reconciled with the object of the express power given to Congress to coin money, and regulate the value thereof, to which it is as repugnant in its effects, as the debasing or the clipping the current coin would be. I, at the same time, conceded that the practice of the Government had been the opposite from its commencement. Such are my reasons, and how have they been met?

The Senator commenced by stating that he would consider the two objections together, as they were connected; but, instead of that, he never uttered another word in relation to the right of making a general deposite. That was surrendered without an attempt to meet my objections, which at least proved his discretion. He next undertook to show that precedents were in favor of receiving bank notes, which I had conceded, and no one disputed. Among other things, he stated, I was the first to authorize the receiving of bank notes by law, and, in proof, referred to my amendment to the joint resolution of 1816, which authorizes the receipt of the notes of specie paying banks in the dues of the Government. He stated, that the resolution, as proposed by himself, provided that nothing but gold and silver and the notes of the United States Bank should be received, and that my amendment extended it to the notes of State banks. This is all true, but is not the whole truth. He forgot to inform the Senate that, at the time, the notes of non-specie paying banks, as well as specie-paying, were received in the dues of the Government, and that my amendment limited, instead of enlarging, the existing practice. He also forgot to state that, without my amendment, the notes of the United States Bank would have been exclusively received in the public dues, and that I was unwilling to bestow a monopoly of such immense value on that institution, which would have been worth ten times the amount of the bonus it gave for its charter.

After bestowing much time to establish what none denied, the Senator at length came to the argument; and what do you suppose were the convincing reasons he urged against my positions? Why, simply that he had no time to reply to them! with which, and the erroneous assertion that I had denied that the Government could exercise any incidental power, he passed over all the weighty objections I had urged against the constitutionality of receiving and treating bank notes as cash in the public dues. It was thus he met the only argument he attempted to answer of the many and strong ones which I have urged in support of my opinion on this important question, and to which he proposed to make a formal reply!

I shall next notice the reply he attempted to my remarks at the late session. And here, again, he selected a single argument, and to which his answer was not less inconclusive and unsatisfactory than to that which I have just considered. Among other objections to the union of the Government with the banks, I stated that it would tend to centralize the circulation and exchanges of the country; to sustain which, I showed that no small portion of the credit and circulation of the banks depended on the public deposites, and the fact that the Government received and treated their notes a cash in its dues. I then showed that it was that portion which pre-eminently gave a control over the circulation and exchanges of the country. In illustration, I asked if the Government, when it first went into operation, had selected a merchant of New York, and entered into a contract with him that he should have the free use of the public revenue from the time it was collected till it was disbursed, and that nothing but his promissory notes, except gold and silver, should be received in the public dues, whether it would not give him a great and decided control over the circulation and exchanges of the country, accompanied with advantages to the port where he resided over all others? I next asked whether the location of a Bank of the United States at the same place, with the same privileges, would not give equal control and advantages? Nay, much greater; as, in addition, it would concentrate at the same place an immense amount of capital collected from every portion of the country.

Such was my argument, which the Senator, months after it was delivered, undertakes to controvert; but, I must say, for my life, I could not understand his reasons. He lost his usual clearness, and became vague and obscure, as any one must who attempts to refute what is so perfectly evident. To escape from his difficulty, he, with his usual address, confounded what I had said on another subject, with another point, which he thought more easily answered, and against which he directed his attack. He stated that I proposed a Government paper, and that my notion is, that all the paper that circulates should be Government paper; and then insisted that it would be the union of the political and money power, and would do more to centralize the currency and exchanges than the connection of the Government with the banks.

Now, unfortunately for the Senator, I proposed no such thing, and expressed no notion of the kind, nor any thing like it. He may search every speech I have delivered at this and the extra session, and he can find nothing to justify his assertion. To put this beyond all dispute, I will quote what I did say, and the only thing that I ever did that could afford him even a pretext for his assertions. The extracts are taken from my remarks at the extra session.

"I intend to propose nothing. It would be impossible, with so great a weight of opposition, to pass any measure without the entire support of the Administration; and if it were, it ought not to be attempted when so much must depend on the mode of execution. The best measure that could be devised might fail, and impose a heavy responsibility on its author, unless it met with hearty approbation of those who are to execute it. I then intend merely to throw out suggestions, in order to excite the reflections of others," &c.

"Believing that there might be a sound and safe paper currency founded on the credit of the Government exclusively, I was desirous that those who are responsible and have the power should have availed themselves of the opportunity of the temporary deficit in the Treasury, and the postponement of the fourth instalment intended to be deposited with the States, to use them as the means of affording a circulation for the present relief of the country and the banks during the process of separating them from the Government," &c.

Here is not a word about proposing; on the contrary, I expressly stated, I propose nothing; that I but threw out suggestions for reflection. Instead of excluding all paper from circulation, I suggested the use, (not of Treasury notes, as he stated, or any other paper containing a promise to pay money,) but simply one which should contain a promise to be received in the dues of the Government; and that, too, only to the extent necessary to meet the temporary deficit of the Treasury, and to alleviate the process of separating from the banks; and this he has arbitrarily construed and perverted to suit his purpose in the manner I have shown!

It is a great misfortune that there should be brought into this chamber the habits contracted at the bar, where advocates contend for victory, without being scrupulous about the means; while here the only object ought to be truth and the good of the country. All other considerations ought to be forgotten within these walls, and the only struggle ought to be to ascertain what is true and calculated to promote the honor and happiness of the community. Great individual injustice is done by such misstatements of arguments. The Senator's speech will be published, and circulated, in quarters where my correction of his statements will never reach; and thousands will attribute opinions to me that I never uttered nor entertained.

The suggestions which he has so perverted have been a favorite topic of attack on the part of the Senator, but he has never yet stated nor met what I really said truly and fairly; and, after his many and unsuccessful attempts to show what I suggested to be erroneous, I now undertake to affirm positively, and without the least fear that I can be answered, what heretofore I have but suggested; that a paper issued by Government, with the simple promise to receive it in all its dues, leaving its creditors to take it or gold and silver at their option, would, to the extent that it would circulate, form a perfect paper circulation, which could not be abused by the Government, that would be as steady and uniform in value as the metals themselves; and that if, by possibility, it should depreciate, the loss would fall, not on the people, but on the Government itself; for the only effect of depreciation would be virtually to reduce the taxes; to prevent which, the interest of the Government would be a sufficient guaranty. I shall not go into the discussion now; but, on a suitable occasion, I shall be able to make good every word I have uttered. I would be able to do more: to prove that it is within the constitutional power of Congress to use such a paper in the management of its finances, according to the most rigid rule of construing the Constitution; and that those at least, who think that Congress can authorize the notes of private State corporations to be received in the public dues, are estopped from denying its right to receive its own paper. If it can virtually endorse by law on the notes of specie-paying banks, "receivable in payment of the public dues," it surely can order the same words to be written on a blank piece of paper.

Such is the character of the paper I suggested and which the Senator says would do more to centralize the circulation and exchanges than the union of the Government and the banks, which, however, he signally failed to prove. That it would have a greater tendency than the exclusive receipt in its dues of gold and silver, I readily acknowledge, and to that extent I think it objectionable; for I do not agree with the Senator that there should be some one great emporium, which should have control of the commerce, currency, and exchanges of the Union. I hold it desirable in neither a political nor commercial point of view, and to be contrary to the genius of our institutions and the spirit of the Constitution, which expressly provides, among other things, that no preference should be given to the ports of one State over another. But that a receivable paper, such as I suggested, would have a greater, or as great tendency to centralize the commerce and currency of the country as the union with the banks, I utterly deny; and, if I had no other reason, the vehement opposition of the Senator, who approves of such tendency, would be conclusive; but there others that are decisive.

The centralizing tendency of such a paper would result exclusively from the facility it would afford to remittance from distant portions of the Union, in which respect it would stand just on a par with bank notes when received in the dues of the public; while the latter would, in addition, give to the favored port, where the mother bank might be located, (or the head of the league of State banks,) the immense profits from the use of the public deposites, and the still greater from having their notes received in Government dues. The two united would afford unbounded facilities in the payment of custom-house bonds, and give millions of profit annually, derived exclusively from the use of Government credit. This great facility and vast increase of profit would give a great and decided advantage to the commerce of the section where the head of the system might be located, and which, in a great measure, accounts for the decay of the commerce of the South, where there were no banks, when this Government was established, and which, of course, gave to the other section exclusively all the benefit derived from the connection. If specie had from the first been exclusively received in the public dues, the present commercial inequality would never have existed; and I may add, it never will cease till we return to the constitutional currency. What the Senator has said as to the union of the political and money powers, and the tendency to extravagance from the use of Treasury notes and their depreciation, is so clearly inapplicable to the description of paper I suggested, that I do not deem it necessary to waste words in reply to it.

Having now repelled his reply to my remarks at this and the extra session, I shall next proceed to notice his argument on the question under discussion, which, extraordinary as it may seem, constitutes by far the most meagre and inconsiderable portion of his speech. The structure he reared with so much labor is composed of a little centre building, of some twenty or thirty feet square, with an extended wing on each side, and a huge portico in front. I have, I trust, effectually demolished the wings, and propose next to go through the same process with the centre building.

As long as was the speech, it contained but three, or, at the utmost, four arguments, directly applicable to the question under discussion; of which two have again and again been repeated by him every time he has addressed the Senate; another was drawn from an argument of mine in favor of the bill, which the Senator has misstated, and pressed into his service against it; and the other is neither altogether new, nor very well founded, or, from its character, of much force. I shall begin with it.

The Senator objected to the collection of the public dues in gold and silver, because, as he conceives, it would be exceedingly inconvenient; in proof of which, and in order to present as strong a picture as possible, he went into minute calculations and details. He first supposed that the average peace revenue would be equal to thirty millions annually, and the average deposites to twenty-one. He then estimated that this vast sum would have to be counted at least five times in the year, and then estimated that it would require eight hundred thousand dollars to be counted daily, which would require a host of officers, in his opinion, to perform the task. The answer to all this is easy. In the first place, the Senator has overestimated the average receipts by at least one hundred per cent. Fifteen millions ought to be much nearer the truth than thirty. Even that I regard as exceeding what the expenditure ought to be; and I venture to assert, that no Administration which expends more on an average for the next few years can maintain itself, unless there should be some unexpected demand on the Treasury. In the next place, twenty-one millions is at least five times too large for the average deposites. Should this bill pass, three millions would be much nearer the truth. We shall hear no more of surpluses, when the revenue is collected in gold and silver. This would make a great deduction in his estimate of the trouble and labor in counting. But I give the Senator his own estimate, and ask him if he never heard of other and shorter modes than counting, of ascertaining the amount in coins? Does he not know that it can be ascertained with as much certainty and exactness by weight as by counting, and with more despatch, when the amount is large, in coins than in his favorite bank notes? If I am not misinformed, it is the mode adopted at the English Exchequer, and that it is done with the greatest possible promptitude by experienced individuals; so that this formidable objection vanishes.

But the Senator next tells us, that I stated, in my remarks, that the bill, should it pass, would place the banks and the Government in antagonist relation to each other, which he considers as a very weighty objection to it. I again must correct his statement. I made no such remark. I indeed said, when the banks were connected with the Government, they had a direct interest in increasing its fiscal action. The greater the revenue and expenditures, and the larger the surplus, the greater would be their profit, but, when they were separated, the reverse would take place. That the greater amount of gold and silver collected and withdrawn from circulation, the less would be left for banking operations, and, of course, the less their profit; and that in one case they would be the allies, and, in the other, the opponents of the Government, as far as its fiscal action was concerned; or, to express it more concisely, when united with the Government, they would be on the side of the tax-consumers, and, when separated, on that of the tax-payers. Such were my remarks; and I now ask, is it not true? Can any one deny it? Or, admitting its truth, can its importance be disputed? Were there no other reasons in favor of the bill, I would consider this of itself decisive. It would be almost impossible to preserve our free institutions, with the weight of the entire banking system thrown on the side of high taxes and extravagant disbursements, or to destroy it if thrown into the opposite scale.

But the Senator regards the expression of tax-consumers and tax-payers as mere catch-words, of dangerous import, and tending to divide society into the hostile parties of rich and poor. I take a very different view. I hold that the fiscal action of the Government must necessarily divide the community into the two great classes of tax-payers and tax-consumers. Taking taxation and disbursements together, and it is unavoidable that one portion of the community must pay into the Treasury, in the shape of taxes, more than they receive back in disbursements, and another must receive more than they pay. This is the great disturbing principle in all Governments, especially those that are free, around which all other causes of political divisions and distractions finally rally. Were it otherwise, if the interest of every portion and class of the community was the same in reference to taxation and disbursements, nothing would be more easy than to establish and preserve free institutions; but as it is, it is the most difficult of all tasks, as history and experience prove. This principle of disorder lies deep in the nature of men and society; and extends equally to private associations as to political communities. There will necessarily spring up in both a stockholding and direction interest; the latter of which, without wise provisions and incessant vigilance, will absorb the former, of which the winding up of many a bank will prove.

The two remaining arguments of the Senator have been often asserted, and as often refuted; and I shall despatch them with a few words. He tells us, as he has often done, that we are bound to regulate the currency; and that the Constitution has given to Congress the express power to regulate it, with many other expressions of similar import. It is manifest that the whole argument turns on the ambiguity of the word currency. If by it is meant the current coin of the United States, no one can doubt that Congress has the right to regulate it. The power is expressly given by the Constitution, which says, in so many words, that it shall have power to coin money and regulate the value thereof; but if it is intended to include bank notes, as must be the intention of the Senator, there is no such express power given in the Constitution. It is a point to be proved, and not assumed; and every attempt of the Senator to prove it has ended in signal failure. He has not, and cannot, meet the answer which he received from the Senator from Pennsylvania at the extra session; and his repetition of the assertion, after so decisive an answer, serves but to prove how much more easy it often is to refute an argument than to silence him who advanced it. But I do not despair even of silencing the Senator. There is one, whose authority on this point I am sure he must respect: I mean himself. When the bill granting a charter to the late United States Bank was under discussion in the other House in 1816, he then took the opposite side, and argued with great force against the very right for which he now so obstinately contends. He then maintained that the framers of the Constitution were hard money men; that currency meant the current coin of the United States, and that Congress had no right to make any other. But the Senator shall speak for himself; and that he may be heard in his own words, I shall read an extract from his speech, delivered at the time:

"Mr. WEBSTER first addressed the House. He regretted the manner in which this debate had been commenced, on a detached feature of the bill, and not a question affecting the principle, and expressed his fears that a week or two would be lost in the discussion of this question, to no purpose, inasmuch as it might ultimately end in the rejection of the bill. He proceeded to reply to the arguments of the advocates of the bill. It was a mistaken idea, he said, which he had heard uttered on this subject, that we were about to reform the national currency. No nation had a better currency, he said, than the United States: there was no nation which had guarded its currency with more care; for the framers of the Constitution, and those who enacted the early statutes on this subject, were hard money men; they had felt, and therefore duly appreciated, the evils of a paper medium; they therefore sedulously guarded the currency of the United States from debasement. The legal currency of the United States was gold and silver coin; this was a subject in regard to which Congress had run into no folly.

What, then, he asked, was the present evil? Having a perfectly sound national currency, and the Government having no power in fact to make any thing else current but gold and silver, there had grown up in different States a currency of paper issued by banks, setting out with the promise to pay gold and silver, which they had been wholly unable to redeem: the consequence was, that there was a mass of paper afloat, of perhaps fifty millions, which sustained no immediate relation to the legal currency of the country—a paper which will not enable any man to pay money he owes to his neighbor or his debts to the Government. The banks had issued more money than they could redeem, and the evil was severely felt, etc. Mr. W. declined occupying the time of the House to prove that there was a depreciation of the paper in circulation; the legal standard of value was gold and silver; the relation of paper to it proved its state, and the rate of its depreciation. Gold and silver currency, he said, was the law of the land at home, and the law of the world abroad; there could, in the present state of the world, be no other currency. In consequence of the immense paper issues having banished specie from circulation, the Government had been obliged, in direct violation of existing statutes, to receive the amount of their taxes in something which was not recognised by law as the money of the country, and which was, in fact, greatly depreciated, etc. This was the evil."

What can be more decisive? What more pointed? They are the very doctrines which he is in the daily habit of denouncing under the name of Loco Foco. The Senator may hereafter be regarded as the father of the party; and I deem it not a little unnatural that he should be so harsh and cruel to his offspring.

But it may be said, that I then advocated the opposite side. Be it so, and it follows that his authority and mine stand as opposing quantities on the opposite side of an equation; and I feel confident that the Senator will readily admit that his will at least be sufficient to destroy mine.

I readily acknowledge that my opinion, after the lapse of upwards of twenty years, with the light which experience in this long period has shed on the banking system, has undergone considerable changes. It would be strange if it had not. I see more clearly now, than I did, the true character of the system and its dangerous tendency; but I owe it to myself and the truth of the case, to say I was, even at that early period, far from being its advocate, and would then have been opposed to the system had it been a new question. But I then regarded the connection between the Government and the banks indissoluble, and acquiesced in a state of things that I could not control, and which I considered as established. The Government was then receiving the notes of non-specie paying banks in its dues, to its own discredit and heavy loss to its creditors. The only practical alternative was at that period between a league of State banks and a Bank of the United States, as the fiscal agent of the Government. I preferred then, as I now do, the latter to the former, as more efficient and not a whit more unconstitutional; and, if I now were again placed in the same state of things that I then was, with all my present feelings and views, I could hardly have acted differently from what I then did.

The Senator greatly mistakes, in supposing that I feel any disposition to repudiate or retract what I then said. So far from it, I have, I think, just cause to be proud of the remarks I made on the occasion. It put the question of the bank, for the first time, on its true basis, as far as this Government is concerned, and the one on which it has ever since stood; which is no small compliment to one then so inexperienced as myself. All I insist on is, that the report contains but a very hasty sketch—a mere outline, as the reporter himself says—of my remarks, in which four-fifths is omitted, and that it would be doing me great injustice to regard it as containing a full exposition of my views. But, as brief as it is, what is reported cannot be read, in a spirit of fairness, without seeing that I regarded the question at the time as a mere practical one, to be decided under all the circumstances of the case, without involving the higher questions which now, that the connection between the Government and the banks is broken, come rightfully into discussion. At that time the only question, as I expressly stated, was, not whether we should be connected with the bank, for that was existing in full force, but whether it was most advisable, admitting the existence of the connection, that the United States, as well as the separate States, should exercise the power of banking. I have made these remarks, not that I regard the question of consistency, after so great a change of circumstances, of much importance, but because I desire to stand where truth and justice place me on this great question.

The last argument of the Senator on the question at issue was drawn from the provision of the Constitution which gives to Congress the right to regulate commerce, and which he says involves the right and obligation to furnish a sound circulating medium. The train of his reasoning, as far as I could comprehend it, was, that, without a currency, commerce could not exist, at least to any considerable extent; and, of course, there would be nothing to regulate; and, therefore, unless Congress furnished a currency, its power of regulating commerce would become a mere nullity; and from which he inferred the right and obligation to furnish, not only a currency, but a bank currency! Whatever may be said of the soundness of the reasoning, all must admit that his mode of construing the Constitution is very bold and novel. To what would it lead? The same clause, in that instrument, which gives Congress the right to coin money and regulate the value thereof, gives it also the kindred right to fix the standard of weights and measures. They are just as essential to the existence of Congress as the currency itself. The yard and the bushel are not less important in the exchange of commodities than the dollar and the eagle; and the very train of reasoning which would make it the right and duty of the Government to furnish the one, would make it equally so to furnish the other. Again: commerce cannot exist without ships and other means of transportation. Is the Government also bound to furnish them? Nor without articles, or commodities, to be exchanged, cotton, rice, tobacco, and the various products of agriculture and manufactures. Is it also bound to furnish them? Nor these in turn, without labor; and must that, too, be furnished? If not, I ask the Senator to make the distinction. Where will he draw the line, and on what principles? Does he not see that, according to this mode of construction, the higher powers granted in the Constitution would carry all the inferior, and that this would become a Government of unlimited powers? Take, for instance, the war power, and apply the same mode of construction to it, and what power would there be that Congress could not exercise—nay, be bound to exercise? Intelligence, morals, wealth, numbers, currency, all are important elements of power, and may become so to the defence of the Union and safety of the country; and, according to the Senator's reasoning, the Government would have the right, and would be in duty bound, to take charge of the schools, the pulpits, the industry, the population, as well as the currency, of the country; and these would comprehend the entire circle of legislation, and leave the State Governments as useless appendages of the system.

Having now, I trust, taken down to the ground the little centre building, with its four apartments, nothing remains of the entire structure but the huge portico in front, and on which I shall next commence the work of demolition. The Senator opened his discourse on credits and banks, by asserting that bank credit was, in truth and reality, so much capital actually added to the community. I waive the objection, that neither credit, nor the banking system, is involved in the question; and that those who are opposed to the union of the political and money power, oppose that union, with other reasons, on the ground that it is unfavorable to a full development of the credit system: and dangerous to the banks themselves, which they believe can only be saved from entire destruction by the separation; and it follows, of course, that all he said in relation to them is either a begging of the question, or irrelevant. But, assuming what he said to be applicable, I shall show that it is either unfounded in fact, or erroneous in conclusion.
